It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

ERRATUM.

April 16. Insert following Questions and Answers:—

THE CLERK TO THE HURSLEY UNION.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether it is the fact that Mr. John P. Moss, Clerk to the Guardians of the Hursley Union, was, in or about the year 1885, dismissed from his office; whether any and what reason was assigned for such dismissal; was any Departmental inquiry held before his dismissal; and, if not, why was the usual practice of the Board in this respect departed from; was the Department at the time aware that the Chairman of the Union had signed two valuation lists for the same parish differing from one another, but bearing the same date; was this allegation ever brought to the knowledge of the Department; and, if so, was any inquiry held into the matter; and will he now cause a Departmental inquiry to be held into the circumstances above stated?

MR. RITCHIE: I cannot consent to re-open a question which was settled so many years ago. Mr. Moss was dismissed from his office in consequence of the passing of a Resolution by the Guardians of the Hursley Union to the effect that he no longer possessed their confidence. The Local Government Board were satisfied as to the propriety of this Resolution, which was a unanimous one, and they held no inquiry, for they did not consider that course to be necessary.

MR. CONYBEARE: I presume there has been a correspondence on the subject.

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, Sir.

MR. CONYBEARE: May I have an opportunity of seeing it?

MR. RITCHIE: No, Sir; I do not think it is at all necessary. The question was settled 36 years ago, and ought not now to be re-opened.

MR. CONYBEARE: In connection with the office of the Local Government Board, is there any limitation against the redress of injustice?

MR. RITCHIE: No, Sir; none.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

IN THE

SIXTH SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND
APPOINTED TO MEET 5 AUGUST, 1886, IN THE FIFTIETH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

FOURTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1890-91.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 7th April, 1891.

The House met at Two of the clock.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LONDON AND NORTH WESTERN RAIL-WAY (ADDITIONAL POWERS) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

*(2.10.) SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield) rose to move—

"That this House declines to consider any Bill to give further powers to the London and North Western Railway Company until the said Railway Company has made arrangements with Her Majesty's Government to open a telegraph office for the public at each and every one of its passenger stations."

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not think that the Amendment of the hon. Member is in order. It proposes to introduce a question of general policy as an objection to a particular Private Bill when the Company promoting the Bill are simply asking for further powers. The course which the hon. Baronet ought to take is to make a Motion for an alteration of the general policy applicable to all railways. There is nothing in this Bill which can fairly raise the question which he desires to introduce. As a matter of fact the Amendment is altogether irrelevant to any part of the Bill, and it would be impossible for this Railway Company to comply with the conditions that ought to be imposed. The initiation does not rest with them but with the Postmaster General, who can exercise compulsory powers in the direction indicated. Under the circumstances, I do not think the Amendment of the hon. Member is in order.

B

VOL. CCCLII. [THIRD SERIES.]

*(2.13.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: Shall I be in order in moving that the Bill be read a second time on this day six months?

MR. SPEAKER: Yes.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: Then I beg to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time on this day six months; and in drawing attention to the matter I wish to bring the subject of these telegraph offices before the House. When we ask for more telegraphic accommodation we are told by the Postmaster General, from the Treasury Bench, that the entire cost of new telegraph offices must be borne by those who require them. The only way, therefore, to meet the requirements of the public is to secure that all the railway stations shall be converted into telegraph offices.

*(2.14.) MR. SPEAKER: I am bound to say that the hon. Member is now founding an objection to the Bill upon the point on which I have already ruled him to be out of order. He must confine himself to any other objection he may have to urge against the Bill.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: Then I will refer simply to Clause 34 on page 26, and Clause 37 on page 27. The present Bill proposes to put aside the general law of the country and asks for exceptional powers. By the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act if a Railway Company seeks to take a portion of land or of a building they are compelled to take the whole. The company asks to have this general law of the country set aside, and an exceptional law introduced in their favour. They seek in this Bill to be allowed to take a portion of the property interfered with, and not the whole, and I think that in such a case the public have a right to ask that the Telegraphs Act, which will be affected by this Bill, shall be revised. By former Acts of Parliament the company are allowed to send telegrams free over the Post Office wires, and in order to give the House some idea of the enormous extent to which this privilege is made available I may say that in 1870, the year after the Government acquired the telegraph wires, 5,286 messages were sent by the London and North Western Company over the Government wires without payment, while in 1890 the number was increased 48 fold, having been 245,838. I think, at all events, the time has now arrived, when Railway Companies coming to this House for exceptional powers, should have revised the bargain made between them and the Postmaster General in 1868 for the benefit of the public. I submit that, when the Directors of a Railway Company decline to establish a telegraph office at a railway station—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is not now speaking to the Amendment, but is again dealing with the question which I have already ruled to be out of order.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: I beg to apologise to you, Sir, if I have said anything that is irregular. Under the circumstances, I will content myself with moving that the Bill be read a second time on this day six months.

MR. SPEAKER: Does any hon. Member second the Amendment?

As there was no response the Amendment fell to the ground.

Question, "That the Bill be now read a second time," put, and agreed to.

NEW WRIT.

ARMY AND NAVY EXPENDITURE, 1891-2.

Return ordered—

"Showing the net estimated Expenditure for the year 1891-2 on the Army and Navy; and the provision made for it."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

SCOTCH PRISONS.

MR. FRASER - MACKINTOSH (Invernessshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, in the last inquiry regarding prisons in Scotland, none of the warders or officers employed were called for examination; whether in England an inquiry into the grievances of prison officials has lately been ordered; and whether, in these circumstances, he will see his way to granting a thorough inquiry into the grievances of the Scottish prison officials, as also how far the present administration of the Prisons Board of Scotland can be amended in the direction of capacity, economy, and general good management?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): With regard to the first part of the question, I am informed by the Secretary for Scotland that he does not know to what inquiry the question of the hon. Member refers. With regard to the second question, I understand that some inquiry as to the conditions of English prison service is now proceeding; and with regard to the last part of the question, the Secretary for Scotland sees no reason at present for instituting such an inquiry as is suggested by the hon. Member.

PUBLIC HOUSE APPEALS.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether in appeals or suspensions of public house and Excise cases, originally prosecuted by the Procurator Fiscal, the services of the Advocate Depute are at the command of the Fiscal; whether the Advocates are paid for appearing in such appeals; and, if so, from what fund; and whether there is any statutory authority for granting costs against appellants in these quasi-criminal proceedings?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative. Appearing in such proceedings does not form part of the duties of the Advocate's Depute, even when the Procurator Fiscal in the Sheriff Court is a party. But, as a rule, public house cases are instituted by the Procurator Fiscal of the Justices of the Peace, while Excise cases are prosecuted by an officer of Inland Revenue. The expenses of appeals and suspensions in public house cases come out of the county or borough funds; and in Excise prosecutions out of moneys provided by Parliament for the charges of collection and management. The summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875, confers express power on the Court to award costs in cases falling under that statute; and, as regards suspensions, the Court has, I believe, always and without question exercised the right of dealing with expenses by virtue of its inherent powers in such proceedings.

INFANTICIDE.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children have, in their investigation of baby farming and its attendant infanticide, obtained and could supply to the Home Office, if necessary, a practically complete list of the London and Provincial newspapers which have inserted the advertisements of those who trade in unwanted children; and whether he will issue from the Home Office a Circular Letter to all such newspapers, drawing the attention of the publishers and editors to the improper use of their columns by such advertisements, and to the frequent cases of cruelty and death arising therefrom, and urging them to exclude, so far as possible, advertisements of this nature?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The Society in question have not communicated to me a list; but, as I have already stated in my answer to the hon. Member's previous question on March 23, I do not see my way to interfere with advertisements of the class described. I am doubtful whether such a Circular would have any influence on the newspapers, even if I had the authority to issue it, these advertisements not being, as I have already stated, necessarily illegal.

REGISTRATION OF PARCELS.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can now state what decision has been arrived at with reference to the registration of Inland parcels, and the granting of compensation or loss or damage on registered packets ; and, if so, the probable date when the same will come into operation ?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member, I am glad to state that I have obtained the assent of the Treasury to a scheme for the registration of Inland parcels and the granting of compensation for loss or damage in respect of registered packets. The scheme will probably come into operation on the 1st June.

FRENCH CONVICTS AND THE AUSTRALASIAN COLONIES.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the apprehension which exists in Australia, especially in the Colony of Queensland, in consequence of the announcement that the Supreme Colonial Council at Paris has recommended to the French Government that "colonising and trading companies in the Pacific shall be allowed to employ convicts;" whether he is aware that convicts are continually escaping from the French penal settlement at New Caledonia and finding their way to the Queensland coast, to the great annoyance and alarm of the residents in the coastal towns, and that some of such convicts are still at large in Queensland; and whether Her Majesty's Government intends to take any, and, if so, what steps to prevent a further influx of French convicts into Her Majesty's colonial possessions?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The attention of the Secretary of State has not been called to any such announcement as is quoted by the hon. Member. His attention was, however, called last year to the allegation that no less than 60 convicts had escaped lately from New Caledonia, but, on inquiries being instituted through Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, M. Ribot was able to give the assurance that though 25 convicts had recently succeeded in escaping from New Caledonia, all but five of these had been recaptured. It is hoped that, under existing arrangements, such escapes will be effectually checked; but Her Majesty's Government will at once call the attention of the French Government to any new facts that may be brought to their knowledge.

THE CENSUS.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that, in filling up the Census Papers, difficulty has been very generally experienced as to the columns headed "employer" and "employed"; whether he can state in general terms, in order to assist the enumerators in completing their work, what is intended to be included in the expressions trade or industry; and whether (to give instances) a stockbroker employing clerks, or a married woman carrying on a farm for her own separate profit or loss, should be marked as "employers," and a bank clerk should be marked as "employed?"

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am not myself aware that difficulty has been generally experienced in filling up the columns headed "employer" and "employed" in the Census Paper. I may, however, say that the question of the hon. Member comes rather late, inasmuch as the Census Papers have now been filled up by the householder. It is for the householder, and not for the enumerator, to determine whether a particular person comes within the classes referred to. The particular instances, however, mentioned in the question do not appear to me to present any difficulty. A stockbroker employing clerks, and a married woman carrying on a farm on her own account, and employing labourers would clearly be employers, and a bank clerk should be regarded as employed.

MR. COBB: May I ask whether it is the duty of the enumerators to go through the papers, and if they see anything on the face of a Return that is incorrect to return it to the householder so that it may be amended? There is a general impression that that is part of the enumerator's duty.

*MR. RITCHIE: My own impression is that that is no part of the enumerator's duty to do so. At the time he collects the paper if he sees that there is anything wrong he may have the power to correct it at the time, but I do not think that, having taken it away, he has any power to return with it.

GRIEVANCES OF CUSTOM HOUSE OFFICERS.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has yet concluded his inquiry into the alleged grievances of Custom House Officers; and, if so, whether any Report will be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The hon. Member will find that the Paper has been circulated this morning.

MOTION.

FIRE INQUESTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Brookfield, Bill to provide for the holding of Fire Inquests, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Brookfield, Mr. Noble, Mr. Bruce, and Mr. Octavius V. Morgan.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 264.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ELECTORAL DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL.—(No. 182.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(2.30.) Amendment proposed, in Clause 2, page 1, line 7, to leave out the word "man," in order to insert the word "person."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question, "That the word 'man' stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

MR. T. ROBINSON (Gloucester) rose to move the following new Clause:—

"That the receipt of alms (other than parochial relief) shall not disqualify any person from being placed upon the Parliamentary or municipal list of voters if in all other respects he is entitled."

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment which appears in the name of the hon. Member is outside the scope of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be reported to the House."

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Before the Bill is disposed of I must be allowed to express my astonishment that hon. Friends of mine who, thinking the Bill will do much harm, have placed Amendments on the Paper, are not now in their places to move them.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered to-morrow.

SAVINGS BANKS BILL.—(No. 220.)

As amended, considered.

New Clause—

(Section three of "The Post Office Savings Banks Act, 1874" (which relates to the presentation of accounts to Parliament) shall have effect as if the last day of July were therein substituted for the last day of April.)

—(Mr. Jackson,)

—brought up, and read the first and second time.

(2.34.) DR. CLARK: I should like to have an explanation of the reasons which induce the Government to propose this clause. The general impression is that, owing to some bungling upon the part of the Postmaster General and an omission on the part of the officials of the Savings Banks, these accounts are not presented sufficiently early; and, further, that the office is undermanned. I should like to know whether this is the reason why the Treasury are anxious to have the time extended?

(2.35.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I have already explained the reason, but probably the hon. Gentleman was not in his place. The object of altering the date is to give a little more time for the presentation of the accounts than that prescribed by the Act. It has been found absolutely impossible to get the accounts sent in by the date named. There have also been difficulties in the past in meeting the increase of work owing to a want of accommodation. The proposed alteration will prevent future delay and inconvenience.

(3.36.) MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): Surely the last day of June ought to give time enough without going to the last day of July. At present the House of Commons is seldom able to get anything like a Return in time to enable them to discuss it in the current year, and they have sometimes to discuss the Returns when they are two years old instead of being only one year old at the very latest. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consent to substitute the last day of June for the last day of July, and I beg to move an Amendment to that effect.

Amendment proposed, in line 3, to leave out the word "July," and insert the word "June."—(Mr. Howell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'July' stand part of the Clause."

(2.36.) MR. JACKSON: I hope the hon. Member will not press his Amendment. I do not think the question, whether the date should be June or July, is one of extreme importance, but we have taken the earliest date at which we think the Returns can be supplied. I will undertake that every effort shall be made to present the accounts within the month of June. That is our intention, but we have thought it right to give a little latitude. The date has been fixed after consultation with the authorities of the Savings Banks Department.

(2.37.) MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I feel it my duty to support the Amendment, because I think it most desirable that June should be substituted for July.

The House divided:—Ayes 77; Noes 45.—(Div. List, No. 116.)

Clause added.

*(2.45.) MR. A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I beg to move, in Clause 3, page 2, line 10, after "unnecessary," to insert "having regard to the then present and prospective reasonable requirements of the Bank."—(Mr. Jackson) prospective reasonable requirements of the Bank." The object of the Amendment is to define more clearly the word "unnecessary" when applied to expenditure. Under the measure as it stands the Committee of Inspection would be able to say what expenditure is or is not necessary. I acknowledge that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has done a great deal to meet the wishes of the banks; and I only ask him to go one step further, and to prevent the possibility of a doubt arising as to the interpretation of this clause. Suppose, for instance, new bank buildings are required. Some members of the Committee might look upon the expenditure as unnecessary for the requirements of the moment, but another view would be that the business was capable of development, and that proper care and regard should be had to the necessities of the future. I may mention a case in which considerable loss was sustained owing to the narrower view being taken by the National Debt Commissioners in their interpretation of the word "necessary." It was proposed to erect a new building for the Glasgow Savings Bank, and provision was made for an anticipated large increase of business. The National Debt Commissioners, however, said the trustees were looking too far forward, and a smaller building was decided upon and erected. This was in 1868; but the anticipated increase of business has since taken place, and it is now found necessary to make further provision, with the result that much will have been expended to little or no purpose. The object of this Amendment is to indicate clearly to the Inspection Committee that the narrow view of looking only at the requirements of the moment is not a correct view in relation to the encouragement of thrift among the people. The introduction of these words can do no harm, and will merely make the matter clearer.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 10, after the word "unnecessary," to insert the words "having regard to the then present and prospective reasonable requirements of the bank."—(Sir Albert Rollit.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(2.47.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): I think the words proposed by my hon. Friend are really too wide, and altogether unnecessary. Undoubtedly the Inspection Committee would be taking a very narrow view of their duties if they neglected prospective requirements; but this is a matter that may be properly left to the discretion of the Committee, and I hope my hon. Friend will not divide the House. My hon. Friend seeks to open a door which might lead to some rather premature building operations. Very considerable concessions have been made, and I trust the clause will be allowed to remain unaltered.

*MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): There is, undoubtedly, a feeling amongst the trustees of savings banks that the terms of this clause are somewhat harsh, and I should have been glad if the Chancellor of the Exchequer could have seen his way to making some mitigation of this expression. At the same time, I wish to express my recognition of the manner in which he has met the representations made to him on behalf of those who are concerned with the Trustee Savings Banks; and though I could have wished that he could have seen his way to do something towards meeting this Amendment I should not myself be inclined to press it against his opposition.

(2.48.) MR. HOWELL: I am not desirous to prolong the discussion upon this Bill; but I am anxious that no loophole shall be left for actuaries, secretaries and others connected with savings banks to incur unnecessary expenditure such as has been incurred in the past. At the same time the Committee of Inspection will, under the clause, have sufficient power to define what is necessary in connection with these banks, and I think they would take into account the circumstances of a bank such as that at Glasgow, which the hon. Gentleman opposite has mentioned. What we have to guard against is the misuse of the money of the depositors; but I am afraid that what the hon. Gentleman has in his mind is not the interests of the depositors, but the view of the actuaries and managers. I want the Bill to be made as stringent as possible, in order to prevent such a misuse of the funds of the depositors as has been brought to light by inquiries upstairs and outside this House. I hope the Government will stand firm and resist every kind of Amendment that may be brought forward to give additional powers to actuaries and other officers to expend money. I shall certainly oppose this Amendment.

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I would press the Government to adhere to the wording of the Bill. The proposed Amendment is quite unnecessary, and would afford a loophole for improper expenditure, which it is most important to prevent.

*SIR A. ROLLIT: I will not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(2.50.) Amendment proposed,

In Clause 4, page 3, line 27, to leave out all after "Bank," to end of clause, and insert "and in respect of money invested in the names of the National Debt Commissioners may be deducted by those Commissioners from the interest payable to the Trustees of the Bank on the money so invested, and in respect of money otherwise invested shall be paid by the Trustees of the Bank on the requisition of the said Commissioners."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*(2.53.) SIR A. ROLLIT: I quite agree that an Amendment in this clause is necessary, in order that the whole of the invested funds may bear a proportion of the expense; but I would suggest that the words should not be introduced where they are proposed to be inserted, but after the word "Commissioners," in line 28. If not, the effect will be greatly to increase the levy. It is properly proposed to extend the area of contribution, but it is a different matter to make a much larger sum available for expenditure.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

On Clause 5, which is as follows:—

"If on any Report by the Committee of Inspection or any of its officers any question arises as to what constitute the necessary expenses attending the management of a Trustee Savings Bank within the meaning of Section 2 of the Trustee Savings Banks Act, 1863, the decision of the National Debt Commissioners on the question shall be final."

*(2.56.) SIR A. ROLLIT said: I have given notice of my intention to move the omission of Clause 5, but the banks think the Amendment which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to move will fairly meet the merits of the case. It recognises the obligation to Trustees and others who voluntarily undertake duties which are to encourage thrift among the people; but, on the other hand, the interests of the depositors must not be disregarded. Nothing can be more destructive to thrift than for the poor to find that their savings have disappeared owing to fraud. It is, therefore, desirable that there should be a due audit and inspection of the accounts. At the same time, the banks strongly object to being under a control which may unduly limit their operations. It is now felt by the banks that the Chancellor's and my own Amendments on this section reconcile these points and are conceived in a proper spirit, and do justice to the banks on the one hand and the depositors on the other.

(3.0.) Amendment proposed, in Clause 5, page 3, line 31, to leave out from "Committee" to "officers," in line 32, inclusive, and insert "Inspection Committee."—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. HOWELL: I am strongly averse to the introduction of anything which, although ostensibly for the protection of the depositors, will really give a latitude to the banks themselves. I feel bound to say that during the five years I have been a Member of the House the banks have never displayed any anxiety to protect the money of the depositors, but have had more regard for their own interests as officials of the banks.

(3.1.) DR. CLARK: I hope that my hon. Friend will give way upon this point. The decision will not be left to the officers of the bank, but to the National Debt Commissioners.

MR. BARTLEY: I would suggest that the words should run: "If on any Report by the Inspection Committee either of its own members or of its own officers."

*(3.2.) MR. GOSCHEN: This is not a question of a Report from the officers to the Committee of Inspection, but rather one of whether the officers may communicate with the National Debt Commissioners without such a Report.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford Central): I regard the Amendment as one of considerable importance. It enables the officers to go direct to the National Debt Commissioners, and it also enables the Commissioners to override the decision of the Inspection Committee.

*(3.4.) SIR A. ROLLIT: I have already indicated that I have a strong objection to the words as they stand. The Committee of Inspection is to be representative and independent, and it will rest with them as a matter of duty to properly embody and formulate any Report presented to them by their officers, and to forward it to the National Debt Commissioners, if they consider the terms of any such Report justify them in adopting or forwarding it.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words 'Inspection Committee' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

*(3.5.) MR. GOSCHEN: I now beg to move the omission of Sub-section 2 of Clause 5, which is—

"The National Debt Commissioners shall have power to determine what expenses may be deducted by the trustees or managers of a Trustee Savings Bank, in pursuance of Section 29 of the Trustee Savings Banks Act, 1863."

I am anxious to remove any cause of friction, and thus to secure the smooth working of the Bill. I should not have consented to this omission had it not been for the fact that at an earlier stage of the Bill the Government accepted words from the opposite side of the House which will safeguard the interests of the depositors in providing that no application to the National Debt Commissioners for any payment out of the surplus fund shall be entertained unless sanctioned by the Inspection Committee.

That will be sufficient to check any abuses, and I think that it substantially meets the necessities of the case. Some hon. Members may think that I have given way too much, but I was anxious to remove any possible objection, and to secure that the saving banks should be worked in the best manner possible.

Question proposed, "That Sub-section 2 stand part of the Clause."

(3.6.) MR. HOWELL: I am unwilling to take any action in opposition to the right hon. Gentleman if he thinks that he has secured the safety of these banks. Like him, I am anxious that all friction should be avoided, as far as is practicable, between the National Debt Commissioners, the Inspection Committee, and the depositors. My only anxiety has been to ensure the safety of the banks; and it is because I know that the right hon. Gentleman and the Government have at heart the securing of the depositors in that perfect safety which the Act of Parliament was intended to give them, that I rely upon the assurance he has given in regard to this clause. At the same time, I regret to see the sub-section omitted from the Bill, because I think that it constituted another element of safety in regard to the conduct of these banks. I shall not oppose the omission of the sub-section.

(3.9.) DR. CLARK: In giving up this clause the Government have struck out the most valuable part of the Bill, because it was one which enabled some restriction to be maintained on the expenses which are charged. The Trustees will now be able to draw upon a special fund, and in that way unnecessary expenditure may be incurred. I do not see why the National Debt Commissioners, who are responsible for all losses, should not have power to determine what expenses may or may not be incurred by banks in carrying on their business. It is not really banking business at all. They merely take in the savings of the people, and do not lend them out again as other banks do. The money is invested under special restrictions. I will not put the House to the trouble of a Division, but I cannot help expressing my regret that the Government has withdrawn the sub-section.

(3.10.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I differ from the hon. Member, and entirely agree in the omission of the sub-section, which I look upon as dangerous, and opposed to the principle of the Bill. The object is not to give to the National Debt Commissioners or the Government full control over the banks, but to interpose between the Government and the banks an independent Committee who should practically have control. As the matter now stands the Inspection Committee will be an independent authority in coming to a conclusion that there has been unnecessary expenditure, and there is to be no independent authority or power on the part of the National Debt Commissioners to direct the banks to enter into any expenditure which may be deemed undesirable.

Question put, and negatived.

(3.12.) MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I have an addition to propose to Clause 5—

"That where a Trustee Savings Bank has, to the satisfaction of the National Debt Commissioners, carried out the law, the trustees and managers of such bank shall be absolved from all responsibility in reference to past transactions of the bank."

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not think that the words suggested by the hon. Member can properly be regarded as an amendment of the clause. They are, rather, a new clause altogether.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: The object of my Amendment is to give effect to the audit, and I submit, as a point of order, that that is relevant as an amendment of the clause.

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not think that it is pertinent to the clause.

Clause 7 (Office of Trustee to be vacated for non-attendance at meetings.)

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 17, after "vacant," to leave out from "and," to "reappointed," in line 19, inclusive, and insert, "And he shall not, unless he has in the meantime explained to the satisfaction of the Inspection Committee his absence or the non-performance of his duties be eligible for re-appointment until the expiration of one year from the end of that period."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

(3.15.) MR. HOWELL: I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman has not made a further concession. What does the Amendment mean? Does it mean that a man in Cardiff, if he happens to live near the bank, may sign a cheque or two during the 12 months, and that that fact will constitute him a manager and trustee, capable of looking after the bank? Surely the managers and trustees ought to be required to put in an appearance now and then in order to see that the business of the bank is properly conducted. I fancy that this is simply a method whereby a man's name may be kept on the list of trustees and managers. He may reside at a distance, and yet be able to do some little act as an apology for the due performance of his duties. These banks were established to receive the savings of the poorer classes; and managers and trustees have been placed over the officials of the banks for a specific purpose. My view is that they fail to perform their duty if they do not attend as often as is practicable in order to see that the law is fully carried out. What can be the object of keeping the name of a man upon the list of managers and trustees unless he is prepared to do his duty? In all other instances if a trustee neglects his duty he has to pay the penalty. When the law of 1863 was discussed the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, owing to pressure from without, established the Post Office Savings Banks as a protest against the action of the trustees and managers of the ordinary savings banks. From all time the trustees have endeavoured to shirk their duty, and here we have another stepping-stone that will enable them to continue in the same course. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will stand firm by the Bill as it is, and if a trustee cannot attend to his duties, let his name be dropped out of the list.

*(3.20.) MR. GOSCHEN: We fully recognise the principle that if one of these trustees has not attended to his duties he is not to remain a trustee. The whole modification now proposed lies in the words "unless he has, in the meantime, explained to the satisfaction of the Inspection Committee his absence or the non-performance of his duties." All that is done is to give to the Inspection Committee power to ascertain whether a satisfactory explanation can be given. I have introduced the general amendment into the existing law in deference to the public wish, that if a man does not attend in the course of a year he shall be ineligible for re-appointment; but there may be circumstances, such as illness or otherwise, which may have prevented him from attending, and, in that case, he ought to be re-eligible.

SIR A. ROLLIT: I think the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Howell) dwelt somewhat too strongly upon the failure of trustees and managers to perform their duty. There have been such cases in the past, and the whole object of the Bill is to limit them in future. Trustees and managers have on the other hand done much for the people, and in the case of numberless banks, they have devoted an infinite amount of time to the discharge of their offices. Under their care and supervision there has grown up a means of saving which but for them would have been altogether impossible. There are other duties to perform of a routine character besides attending meetings, and in connection with them they sacrifice a large amount of time. On the other hand, there are only one or two meetings in the course of the year, and it may happen that one of these gentlemen who may have done good service in other respects, may, from illness, have been unable to attend such meetings. All that is asked is that persons who have done so much for these banks shall be eligible for re-appointment if they can give a satisfactory explanation of the reason of the non-performance of certain their duties.

(3.28.) DR. CLARK: This is another attempt to whittle down the value of this Bill. As the clause originally stood, if a trustee did not attend a single meeting he would be disqualified. That proposal was modified by allowing him to remain if he had signed cheques or performed any duty during the 12 months. It is now proposed further to modify the clause by providing that a trustee who has not attended a meeting or signed a cheque shall remain, if the Inspection Committee are satisfied that his reasons for the non-performance of his duties are satisfactory.

MR. GOSCHEN : It is not to rest with the trustee, but with the Inspection Committee.

DR. CLARK : I think that if a trustee does not attend for a year, and performs no functions, he ought to retire. He can rejoin the bank afterwards. I am afraid that the Amendments the Government are inserting in the Bill will make the measure useless, as far as its original intention is concerned.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE : I cannot agree that the Amendment will render the Bill useless. It is one of a most limited character, and I cannot see that any possible harm can arise from adopting it. I can imagine cases in which a trustee is unable to attend to his duties for a year, but in regard to which he may satisfactorily explain the reason of his absence.

*(3.25.) MR. BARTLEY : I think it is highly important that we should give the Inspection Committee a discretionary power.

*MR. LENG (Dundee) : I am of opinion that we ought to keep in view the desirability of not deterring gentlemen of influence and business habits from becoming trustees of savings banks. It does not seem to me that any real objection has been brought to bear against the Amendment. It simply gives an opportunity to a trustee to explain, to the satisfaction of the Inspection Committee, the cause of his absence and of the non-performance of his duties. It is quite conceivable that a trustee may be prevented by accidental causes from being able to perform his duty, and he ought not to be shut out from all opportunity of giving a satisfactory explanation. I am afraid that we are indulging in a little hypercriticism ; and when the responsible Government are endeavouring to avoid possible friction I think they ought to receive more support.

(3.27.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) : I am not quite clear that the words proposed to be inserted will carry out exactly what the Chancellor of the Exchequer means. My doubt turns on the words "in the meantime." If in the course of 12 months the trustee has not attended or performed his duties the office is to become vacant, unless "in the meantime" he has given a satisfactory explanation to the Inspection Committee. Now, I submit that the words "in the meantime" would cause that office to terminate until a re-appointment took place. I presume it is intended that if the trustee makes a satisfactory explanation during the 12 months he is to be eligible, otherwise, according to the natural interpretation of the words "in the meantime," there must be a vacancy in the office, and he must at some subsequent time be re-appointed. Moreover, the vacancy must be notified to the National Debt Commissioners. I would suggest that the words should be "unless he has during that period."

(3.30.) MR. GOSCHEN was understood to say he would look into the matter, and have any defect rectified in another place.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

*MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth) : I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 10, page 5, line 2, at end, to insert "Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall prevent the continuance of special investments in behalf of any person who is already a depositor under section sixteen of the Trustee Savings Bank Act, 1863."—(Mr. C. S. Parker.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GOSCHEN : I accept the Amendment.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE : Will this Amendment permit the continuance of special investments? Some of the special investments take the form of mortgages, and there are persons who think it is desirable they should cease.

Are we to understand these mortgages are to be allowed to continue?

*MR. C. S. PARKER: Perhaps as the Mover of the Amendment I may be allowed to reply to the right hon. Gentleman. This is a proviso to the subsection only, and, therefore, it leaves operative all the other sub-sections, and amongst them that which prevents the continuance of investments in land. There are a large number of my constituents who have at present special investments not amounting to £50, and all I ask is that we should not disturb that existing state of things. It is a small affair, and I am grateful to the Government for accepting an Amendment which will beneficially affect a large number of the working classes in the City and County of Perth.

Question put, and agreed to.

(3.46.) MR. HOWELL: I hoped I might induce the House to make some little advance in regard to the amount which might be deposited in these banks. While desiring to increase the stability of these banks I have always recognised the fact that there is a growing disposition on the part of many depositors to increase their little savings, and I believe the limit as fixed many years ago is now too small. The Government of 1882, I think, actually carried a Bill in this House for the purpose of increasing the limit, and increasing it beyond what I propose. Surely we ought not to go back on what was proposed at that time. We ought to afford greater instead of fewer facilities for thrift among the working classes. This does not merely affect Trustee Savings Banks, but also the Post Office. In my opinion, Trustee Savings Banks will be immensely benefited. Supposing they always do their duty, if you give them a larger margin in order to meet the expenses, many of them that cannot now be said to be in a state of absolute solvency would be able to put themselves in a position of solvency. It cannot be said the amount of interest is any obstacle to this increase, because the interest is now reduced to a minimum. The great objection to any increase comes from the poor bankers. Surely the Government need have no fear of danger if the working classes had an opportunity of investing £60 instead of £30 in any one year. There is a very peculiar state of things at present. If a man owing to any cause draws out £60 at the earlier part of a year he is unable to re-invest a similar amount during the year: no trustee or Post Office Savings Bank could receive more than £30, and that is supposed to be an encouragement of thrift. The poor bankers of the country will not undertake to receive the small sums deposited in Post Office and Trustees Savings Banks, or, if they do, instead of giving interest they charge something for keeping the account. I find some gentlemen do not object to the increase in the total deposit from £150 to £200 if the extra £50 is interest. Why should the increase not be capital if a man has it? I am sorry to have to refer to the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to be terribly afraid that the Government of the country would be placed in some difficulty if it had an enormous number of millions sterling belonging to the working classes placed at its disposal. I fail to understand the danger of such a state of things, indeed I think it is a state of things much to be hoped for. If the House will not accept the whole of my proposal, I hope they will permit a man to deposit in any one year £60 instead of £30. At any rate, I appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has shown some sympathy in this matter, whether provision cannot be made whereby a man who draws out, owing to some accidental circumstances over which he has no control, £50 or £60 in a year, may, if he is able to do so, re-invest in the course of the same year a like amount. I do not see how this would be a disadvantage to the banking interest of the country. I think we should really be increasing the clients of the bank. Any man who had £300 or £400 would, no doubt, feel himself man enough to apply to a commercial bank where he could possibly be better served for general commercial purposes than he could by the savings bank or the Post Office. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 7, to leave out the words "two hundred pounds," and insert the words

"in any one year the sum of sixty pounds, and not exceeding in the whole, inclusive of interest, the sum of four hundred pounds."—
(Mr. Howell.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'two hundred pounds' stand part of the Bill."

(3.45.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: As to the total deposit I do not think the suggestion of my hon. Friend is of very great importance, considering that now after the £200 has been deposited it is open to invest £300 through the Post Office or savings banks in Consols or other security. But the proposal as to the amount which may be deposited in any one year appears to me to be very important. Many of those, including the late Mr. Fawcett, who were connected in past times with the Post Office, have come to the conclusion that the annual minimum ought to be increased. I can see no possible objection to the proposal, and I trust the Chancellor of the Exchequer will see his way to yield on that point. I believe that officers of the savings bank not unfrequently point out to depositors a way in which they may evade this special provision. They tell intending depositors they have already deposited the amount allowed, but they may deposit another £30 in the name of the wife or of one of the children. I know cases in which persons have withdrawn £40 or £50, and desired to re-invest it in the same year, but have not been allowed to do so. The point raised by my hon. Friend does not affect the private banks or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and, therefore, I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give way.

*(3.49.) SIR A. ROLLIT: I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will favourably consider the Amendment. The practice does exist of investing money in the names of various members of a family. I do not regard that as an evasion. On the contrary, I know it is frequently a mode of inducing the younger members of a family to commence being depositors. There was a time when probably the limitation was justifiable, because when savings banks were instituted the State gave bonuses for thrift. But for some time that rule has ceased to exist with the successive reductions of interest, and the State is now practically the gainer. In view of the immensely increased earnings of the people, is it not right that the facilities for saving should be increased? Our duty is to cultivate that habit of saving which these banks are intended to foster; and, according to the reports of the banks, the largest savings are those which have been of long and gradual accumulation. I hope that facilities will be afforded for the increase of the amounts of deposits. Mr. Lyulph Stanley, a severe critic, in the evidence he gave before the Committee, said, "I shall be glad to see the limit raised to £300." And he said also, in answer to another question, "I should not call £300 a very high maximum." The maximum proposed by the hon. Member opposite is something more than that; but it is, I think, a very moderate limit, having regard to the change of conditions that has taken place. One argument with regard to the bankers has, I think, been answered by themselves, because I remember the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir J. Lubbock) saying that the savings banks were of advantage to them. The savings banks in Rochdale were the pioneers of the co-operative movement in that town, and there is no other town which presents the co-operative movement in a more successful aspect. I believe that in the end the bankers will gain as much as the community by the raising of the maximum.

*(3.52.) MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Gentleman has divided his Amendment into two parts, one dealing with the increase of the permanent maximum, and the other with the increase of the maximum of the year. Let me first remark that if the position of the working man in regard to the amount that may be saved is different from what it was 30 or 40 years ago, the facilities for investment are far greater. I can understand the evidence given by officials of the Post Office and others in this matter. The more business the Post Office transacts, the better satisfied the officials are; they are very ambitious to extend its transactions. As Chancellor of the Exchequer, I am bound to say that, although it is an advantage that there should be these deposits in the banks of the State, and that large numbers of the working classes should be interested in the stability of the State, there are limits to the amount which ought to be held by the Government. The Post Office holds now £110,000,000 of deposits, and an advance from £200 to £400 would be very large, and might attract to the Post Office people who cannot be considered to belong to the working classes at all. I am bound to say that the terms given by the State of 2½ per cent. are higher than it would be right to grant to persons other than those in whose thrift the State is specially interested. To extend the limit would be very costly. We have given very handsome terms, but these terms ought to be strictly limited to the classes for whom they are intended. With regard to the annual deposit, I shall be prepared to consider whether a sub-section cannot be introduced in another place to provide that in hard cases of sudden withdrawal the depositor shall be allowed, as has been suggested by the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), to replace the amount withdrawn. But a current account cannot be kept on the terms we are now granting in regard to these deposits. As the House has been reminded by the right hon. Gentleman, the deposits can be invested in Stock at 2½ per cent. On the whole, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, I am adverse to any measure which would largely increase the already gigantic amount standing to the credit of depositors in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners, and on which the Government is bound to pay large interest.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "two hundred pounds," and insert the words "in any one year the sum of sixty pounds."—(Mr. Howell.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'two hundred pounds' stand part of the Bill."

(3.59.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I wish, Mr. Speaker, to ask whether you can put the Amendment in two parts so as to raise the two questions? If you would first put the part up to the words "in any one year a sum of £60," and that is agreed to, the House can afterwards divide on the second part.

*MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member for Bethnal Green withdraw his Amendment?

MR. HOWELL: If it will facilitate matters I shall be glad to do so. I wish the Chancellor of the Exchequer would go a little further, though I admit he has endeavoured to meet me to some extent. But I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 7, after the words "two hundred pounds," to insert the words "but may receive in any one year the sum of sixty pounds."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(4.3.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer carried the House with him in his argument on the aggregate amount to be allowed to stand in any one name, but I did not hear from the right hon. Gentleman any argument to sustain the objection to allowing a depositor to attain more quickly this maximum amount. When a man is in good work and receiving good wages it is quite possible he may be able to attain this desirable limit of £200 in a shorter time than the yearly amount provided now will allow, and I cannot see how the State would be damaged by his so doing. I should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to allowing the aggregate amount to be reached at the rate of £60 a year. There are many mechanics who when in full work earn from £2 to £5 a week, and are quite able to put by 25s. a week, and in three years, or a little more, could accumulate £200. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will recognise this.

*(4.5.) MR. GOSCHEN: I am sorry I do not find myself able to meet hon. Gentlemen on this point. In a case where a man is so fortunate as to save more than this amount, it is open to him to invest his money in Consols where there is not the same limitation. My objection is that by carrying the limit beyond that laid down you increase the operation of the savings banks for a large class for whom these facilities were never intended. These banks are intended for the encouragement of thrift among the working classes. If a man has more savings to invest than £30 in one year, then it is open to him to invest in Consols where he gets larger interest with quite as good security as the savings banks.

(4.6.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I do not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer quite meets the case of the working man who uses the machinery of the savings banks for investment. There are classes of working men whose gains in the year vary almost as much as the profits of traders. Fishermen, for instance, may have much larger gains at one time than at another, and to these men, who are accustomed to use the savings banks for their savings, it will be a difficult operation to go through the form of investment in the funds.

MR. GOSCHEN: But the machinery is provided by the Post Office Savings Banks, and by this a man can invest the smallest amount, and the whole thing is arranged for him at a trivial charge.

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman's Amendment follows after the "two hundred pounds?"

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Yes, Sir; it is better to retain those words, and then I propose the insertion of the words.

*(4.11.) MR. MOWBRAY (Lancashire, Prestwich): I think, Sir, the difficulty found in putting the Amendment shows the inconvenience of raising the question in this manner. As has been pointed out, this clause refers to the limit of the aggregate amount which I understand the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford does not desire to increase beyond the amount provided for in the Bill. But I venture to think that if we are now going to alter the sub-section of a clause which deals with the aggregate amount in order to deal with another point, that is the amount of annual investment, we shall get into great confusion. It will be necessary, if we insert the Amendment in this shape, to make an alteration in the Preamble to the clause, and to make an alteration in the Schedule with regard to the repeal of the existing section of the Act of 1863. I think the difficulty we are under shows that it will be wiser to accept the suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this question should be left over in order that it may be raised in a manner in which it can be satisfactorily dealt with in another place, and with the intention of meeting as far as possible the object the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Howell) has in view.

*(4.8.) MR. BARTLEY: No one can accuse me of not wishing to promote thrift among the working classes if I oppose the Amendment; but candidly I must say I think it would be unwise to allow Post Office and trustee banks to increase this amount. People who desire to invest larger amounts may, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer says, avail themselves of Consols or other stock where they have good security. A man and his wife are allowed to invest £400, and where there are five members of his family, the family can invest £1,000, which is independent of all fluctuations incident to the financial position of the country. I think the State has done all that can reasonably be expected, and, beyond this, I think investments should be subject to the ordinary fluctuations of commerce. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not consent to this change being made. To do so will alter the object of the Bill materially. It forms no part of the Bill, the object of which is to make savings banks safer and prevent some of the difficulties they have fallen into, and we shall be travelling outside the lines of the Bill if we insert this Amendment.

Other Amendments made.

MR. GOSCHEN: I hope the House will now agree to take the Third Reading.

cellor of the Exchequer, I am bound to say that, although it is an advantage that there should be these deposits in the banks of the State, and that large numbers of the working classes should be interested in the stability of the State, there are limits to the amount which ought to be held by the Government. The Post Office holds now £110,000,000 of deposits, and an advance from £200 to £400 would be very large, and might attract to the Post Office people who cannot be considered to belong to the working classes at all. I am bound to say that the terms given by the State of 2½ per cent. are higher than it would be right to grant to persons other than those in whose thrift the State is specially interested. To extend the limit would be very costly. We have given very handsome terms, but these terms ought to be strictly limited to the classes for whom they are intended. With regard to the annual deposit, I shall be prepared to consider whether a sub-section cannot be introduced in another place to provide that in hard cases of sudden withdrawal the depositor shall be allowed, as has been suggested by the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), to replace the amount withdrawn. But a current account cannot be kept on the terms we are now granting in regard to these deposits. As the House has been reminded by the right hon. Gentleman, the deposits can be invested in Stock at 2½ per cent. On the whole, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, I am adverse to any measure which would largely increase the already gigantic amount standing to the credit of depositors in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners, and on which the Government is bound to pay large interest.

MR. HOWELL: I will adopt the view of the right hon. Gentleman.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "two hundred pounds," and insert the words "in any one year the sum of sixty pounds."—(Mr. Howell.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'two hundred pounds' stand part of the Bill."

(3.59.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I wish, Mr. Speaker, to ask whether you can put the Amendment in two parts so as to raise the two questions? If you would first put the part up to the words "in any one year a sum of £60," and that is agreed to, the House can afterwards divide on the second part.

*MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member for Bethnal Green withdraw his Amendment?

MR. HOWELL: If it will facilitate matters I shall be glad to do so. I wish the Chancellor of the Exchequer would go a little further, though I admit he has endeavoured to meet me to some extent. But I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

MR. GOSCHEN: I hope the House will now agree to take the Third Reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I offer no objection to that; but I think we may now ask the names of the Commissioners who are to be appointed under the Bill.

MR. GOSCHEN: I have already stated the names.

(4.23.) MR. HOWELL: I quite agree to the Third Reading being taken now, and I am very glad the Bill has reached that stage. But may I remind the right hon. Gentleman there is still his promise that in another place an attempt shall be made to insert a provision whereby a depositor who makes a withdrawal may make up the amount of such withdrawal in the course of the year. I hope this will be provided for.

*(4.24.) MR. LENG: I desire to emphasise this appeal of my hon. Friend. I know that among the depositors in the bank with which I am connected there is a very strong desire on this point that the limit of £30 should be plus the replacing of the amount that may be drawn out to meet the needs that may arise in families resulting from death, or marriage, or the starting of a son or daughter in life. It is a great convenience to draw out £10 or £20 to meet such emergencies; but a depositor might well be allowed to replace such amount as the year goes on.

MR. GOSCHEN: I will do my best, and I have no doubt I shall be able to devise some sub-section to meet the point.

(4.25.) DR. CLARK: I hope the other House will adopt the recommendation of the right hon. Gentleman. I raise no objection to the Third Reading, though I think we do not want these trustee savings banks at all. We shall have the two systems of trustee banks and Post Office banks in competition. I know we are trying to get rid of the notion that the State is security for depositors; but the popular belief is, and will be, that the Government are security. Now that we have the Post Office Savings Bank system, I do not think that these trustee banks are required. I make an exception in such cases as the Glasgow Bank, which performs very useful functions; but, economically, there is an inconvenience, and even danger in all the small savings being drawn away to the central towns.

*(4.26.) SRA A. ROLLIT: I cordially support the Third Reading, and take the opportunity of thanking the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the courteous consideration he has given to the suggestions which have been made on either side of the House. I join in the hope that the point in reference to withdrawals will be satisfactorily dealt with in another place, and I hope the question I raised on the contribution clause will not be overlooked, for the maximum of expenditure is greatly raised by the clause as amended by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

(4.26.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I heartily support the Third Reading. It is highly probable that the tendency of the Bill will be to displace the smaller savings banks in country districts, while it will not interfere with the larger banks which do useful work in Glasgow, Edinburgh, and elsewhere. The progress in the towns I have mentioned shows there is room for these larger banks as well as for the Post Office banks. Since 1861 the increase in the annual deposits in the trustee banks in Glasgow and Edinburgh has been from £1,000,000 to £3,600,000, and during the same time the increase in the Post Office banks has been £190,000. These figures show the utility of the banks I have mentioned, and the effect of the Bill will not, I trust, be to interfere with the progress of these large banks, though probably it will be to reduce the number of smaller banks, not carried on to such advantage.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC HEALTH (LONDON) LAW AMENDMENT BILL.-(No. 231.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(4.29.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The House will observe that there are two Bills dealing with this subject, the first of which is an Amendment Bill, the second a Consolidation Bill. I hope that, as was done in the case of the Housing of the Working Classes Bills of last Session, these two Bills will be referred to a Standing Committee, and discussed in a businesslike manner. The state of the law in regard to public health in London is very unsatisfactory. Whereas the law as to public health in the provinces has been amended and consolidated by the Act of 1875, the public health law of the Metropolis is scattered over a number of Acts, beginning with Michael Angelo Taylor's Act of 1817, and is contained in 29 separate statutes. There can be no doubt that such a condition of things is greatly to the disadvantage of the public health of London. It enhances the difficulties of the Local Authorities and prevents them from carrying out the provisions of the law as they would desire to carry them out. It is probable that the Local Authorities are often blamed for not discharging their functions in matters affecting the public health as efficiently as they ought to do, when as a matter of fact it is the Statute Book which is to blame. The Consolidation Bill before the House consolidates the whole of the Public Health Acts, but the Bill is not absolutely a Consolidation Bill, because it does this—wherever the clauses in the existing law are of a similar character to the clauses of the Public Health Act of 1875 the provisions of that Act have been adopted in the Consolidation Bill. Certain Amendments, then, are proposed to be made in the existing law, but I do not think they are Amendments which are likely to create much criticism, or which cannot easily be disposed of in Committee. As there has been some misapprehension with regard to Clause 61, I would point out that under the present law the Sanitary Authorities may contract with the managers of the Metropolitan Asylums Board for the provision of hospital accommodation. In that case the Sanitary Authorities are liable for expenses to the Asylums Board, but the patients, or those responsible for their maintenance, can be made to pay in cases in which the Sanitary Authority thinks them able to do so. The only alteration which the Bill before the House makes is to extend this provision to hospitals which are built by the Sanitary Authorities, so that in that case also the cost of the patients may be recovered. We propose, however, not only to consolidate and simplify the law, but also to very largely amend the law with regard to public health in London. Last year I sent round to the various authorities in London the proposals with regard to consolidation, and those authorities went carefully into the matter, and made suggestions which the Government have found themselves largely in a position to adopt; and I have to express my obligation to those bodies, as well as to the London County Council, for the assistance they have rendered to the Department over which I have the honour to preside. The Amendment Bill, in the first place, greatly strengthens the law both as to the prevention and definition of nuisances. The Bill provides for the immediate abatement of a nuisance, not only where it is actually proved to be injurious or prejudicial to health, but also where it is dangerous to health. At present only the persons affected by the nuisance or the Local Authority can move in the matter, but the Bill provides that any person may give information of a nuisance with a view to its removal, and under these provisions any person found guilty of allowing a nuisance to exist will be held responsible for doing any work necessary to abate it. The House will see that to require the work necessary to be done to be specified, as at present is the case, may easily give rise to delay and appeals; but where a nuisance ought to be summarily and quickly abated it is very desirable that that should not be so. If the charge is considered by the Magistrate to be proved, the author of the nuisance will be held responsible for doing whatever may be required to abate it. The Bill also imposes—and this is new—on the London County Council the duty of making bye-laws for the cleansing of streets and the prevention of nuisances. It is thought that these matters will be much better dealt with by a body representative of the whole of London, and it is quite clear that the County Council is the proper body. This will throw upon the County Council the duty of making bye-laws to put a stop to a particular nuisance as to which considerable complaint has justly arisen, namely, the throwing of salt on the streets of the Metropolis in snowy and frosty weather. Great evil arises from that cause during the winter, and we think it very desirable to deal with the matter. The Bill next deals with offensive trades, and several Amendments of an unimportant character are introduced, one of them being to do away with the distinction at present existing between slaughter-houses and knackers' yards. All these places will be put under the same Local Authority. There is one very important Amendment in the law which we make with regard to the proceedings of Sanitary Authorities. The House must be aware that many complaints are made by persons residing in the Metropolis of nuisances alleged to be caused by the Sanitary Authority themselves. These complaints are of a two-fold character. One is that the Sanitary Authorities carry on offensive operations at wharves and other places where refuse is deposited, and the Bill includes these operations in the category of offensive trades, so that the Local Authorities will be compelled to take every practicable means to reduce any offensive effluvia or nuisance which might be created by the removal of refuse. The Local Authorities will be liable to prosecution if they fail to avail themselves of such means. The second is generally known as the destructor nuisance. The Bill provides that where a Sanitary Authority causes a nuisance, or does anything injurious or dangerous to health, it may be prosecuted, and all the provisions as to nuisances shall apply. Destructors to destroy refuse brought from the area of one authority are sometimes situate within the area of another authority, and we propose to prevent nuisances arising from this operation by the means I have stated. With regard to the smoke nuisance, at present both the Sanitary Authorities and the Commissioner of Police are charged with the enforcement of the law. It is thought that this dual authority is not a good thing, and therefore it is proposed to intrust the carrying out of the law to the Local Authorities; and in the case of nuisances arising on the River Thames to the Port Sanitary Authority. As to scavenging and cleansing the streets, particularly after a fall of snow, the law at present is that the occupier, or, in the case of empty houses, the owner is liable to keep the footway and the water course in front of his house properly swept and cleansed. It has been maintained that this is a duty which should be undertaken by the Local Authorities; but I am not disposed to agree altogether with that view, and I do not propose to relieve individuals of the duty which thus falls on them. In my opinion, if such a heavy additional duty were cast upon the Local Authorities, it would be almost impossible for them to carry out the law, and render the last state of things worse than the first. If the occupier does not perform his duty after a short interval, it will be performed for him by the Sanitary Authority, and the cost may be put upon him; besides which, he will be also liable to a fine for the non-performance of his duty. Another difficulty which will be got rid of by casting upon the Sanitary Authority the duty of keeping the streets clean is that in connection with empty houses, and squares, and gardens. Nobody can fail to be struck, after a fall of snow, with the numerous cases in which a large amount of pavement is left untouched for days and days; and in nine cases out of ten this is in connection with unoccupied houses or gardens and squares. Clearly it should be the duty of the Sanitary Authority to see that this state of things should not exist; and they are now given the power, and the duty is imposed upon them of either enforcing the performance of the work by the person who is liable, or of doing the work for him and making him pay wherever it is possible to do so. With regard to streets, the Bill requires the Sanitary Authority to perform its duty of sweeping and cleansing, and the Sanitary Authority is made liable to a fine if it does not perform its duty as far as is reasonably practicable. If an occupier is bound under a penalty to perform the duty which is cast upon him, for my own part I think that there is a corresponding duty towards the occupier on the part of the Sanitary Authority, and that the same method of enforcing the duty should be applicable with regard to the Local Authority as against the individual; and, therefore, we provide that a penalty shall be imposed in case of neglect.

*MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): To whom will the penalties go, and who is to receive them?

*MR. RITCHIE: I will come to that point later on. The next point in the Bill is as to the removal of house refuse. The duty of the Local Authority in this matter is at present an implied one; but the Bill will make it perfectly clear, any default subjecting the authorities to prosecution and fine. The Bill does not set out a period within which the removal must be made; but the Sanitary Authority will be bound to fix some proper and reasonable period for clearing away dust and house refuse, and they will be liable to a fine if, proper notice being given, they do not at once comply with the request of the occupier. The Bill also provides for the proper regulation and examination of sanitary conveniences, and for seeing that they are properly constructed and in proper order. The next portion of the Bill deals with the question of unsound articles of food. We propose to extend the existing law, which applies only to particular articles and to those who expose such articles for sale. This Bill applies to every article used for food, and gives power both of search and destruction. We propose to apply the existing enactment to every article of food, and we punish the sale as well as the exposure. By the law as it stands at present it is only the individual who exposes the article for sale who is punishable by law. We now propose to make the person from whom the food is bought, as well as the person selling it, punishable for the offence. Then comes the question of proper water supply to houses. In my opinion a house without a water supply is a nuisance, and we now declare that the being without a proper supply is a nuisance that renders a house unfit for habitation, and the Bill absolutely prohibits a new house from being occupied until the Sanitary Authority shall have certified that there is a proper supply. We further strengthen the law with regard to polluted sources of water. We also amend the law with regard to infectious diseases. The provision of the present law with regard to disinfection is entirely permissive. We propose to make it the duty of the Sanitary Authority to provide proper premises for disinfecting bedding, clothing, &c., and also vehicles for carrying these articles to and fro. I am sure the House will see that unless some proper provision be made in this direction, it will be impossible to carry out the Act which the House has recently passed with regard to infectious diseases. We think it right that it should be in the option of the Local Authority whether they shall make a charge for the performance of this duty or not. Obviously there are many cases where it is right that there should be no impediment to the carrying out of such an important matter as disinfection. We also provide that the Sanitary Authority may relieve poor persons by disinfecting, not only bedding and clothing, but also their houses free of charge. Representations have been made to the Local Government Board, especially from Maidstone, as to persons picking fruit who have been found manifestly suffering from infectious disease. It is eminently desirable to prevent a person suffering from an infectious disease from handling articles of food at all, and, therefore, the Bill imposes a penalty upon anyone milking, picking fruit, or otherwise engaging in an occupation connected with food who knows himself to be suffering from an infectious disease. We propose that the Sanitary Authority may make a reasonable allowance to a poor person if he be taken away from his occupation on this account. In order to avoid what may be very considerable hardship, the Sanitary Authority may, at their discretion, give what they think right and just without the person having to apply to the Guardians. We also propose, with regard to the notification of infectious diseases, that the Return of cases of those diseases required to be sent by the Metropolitan Asylums managers to the County Council shall be sent by them to every Sanitary Authority in London, and to the London School Board and to the managers of every public elementary school in London. With regard to mortuaries we provide that Sanitary Authorities must erect them, either separately or in combination. At present the law is only permissive, and considerable scandals have arisen in this respect. Every Sanitary Authority must also, if required by the County Council, provide a building for post-mortem examinations. One very important matter with which we deal in this Bill is the question of underground or cellar rooms. No one who has any knowledge of the conditions under which poor persons exist in these rooms can fail to be aware of the enormous disadvantage to the public health which arises from the condition of many of the rooms at present occupied. The law on the subject has been modified from year to year, and has been considerably strengthened with the view of doing away with the evils acknowledged to exist in this respect. But the law in London still remains far behind that which prevails in the provinces. By the Public Health Act of 1875 very stringent regulations were made to secure ventilation, &c. In London, however, so far as underground dwellings are concerned, the provisions with regard to the preservation of health are comparatively few and weak. By this Bill ample provision is made with regard to height, drainage, and ventilation. Our proposal is to apply to underground rooms the principal provisions of the Public Health Act of 1875, and also some additional provisions. Then there arises the question as to whether these provisions should apply only to new buildings. The Local Government Board have received many representations, both from the London County Council and from London Vestries, requesting that any provisions which are made shall be applicable to buildings both old and new. Looking at the legislation which has been passed in this matter, we do not think we should be justified in perpetuating the exemptions which exist at the present time. Therefore the proposals in the Bill will apply to all underground rooms, with the reservation that the London County Council may, by general regulations or on the applications of the owner of particular rooms, dispense with or modify the provisions as far as they involve structural alterations, having due regard to the necessities of the case. The Bill also amends the law where it is at present undoubtedly faulty. It provides that where two or more underground rooms are occupied together they shall be considered by the law to be separately occupied. It has been shown that the existing law has been interpreted to be that, in order to bring rooms within the law, each room must be separately occupied, and [thus the occupier of two rooms escapes. The provisions with regard to underground rooms will not apply to cases where an underground room merely forms part of the premises in occupation. It is also necessary to strengthen the means by which the law affecting the public health is enforced. One of the proposals of the Bill refers to the Inspectors of Nuisances and Medical Officers of Health. Means are provided by which an adequate number of proper persons shall be appointed as Inspectors of Nuisances, henceforth to be called Sanitary Inspectors. Complaint has been made that the number of these Inspectors in some parts of London is not nearly adequate for the area over which they exercise their jurisdiction, and it is quite impossible for the Sanitary Authorities to carry out the law unless they have a sufficient staff of Inspectors. The Bill provides that the Local Government Board, if satisfied, on the representation of the London County Council, that a Sanitary Authority has not appointed a sufficient number of Inspectors, may order that Sanitary Authority to appoint as many more as may be deemed necessary. It is also provided by the Bill, with a view to secure fit and proper persons as Inspectors, that their appointment shall be subject to the regulations of the Local Government Board; and with regard to the Medical Officers of Health and Sanitary Inspectors, it is provided that they shall be removable by the Sanitary Authority only with the consent of the Local Government Board. This provision has been asked for from many quarters, and there is much force in the argument that, unless these officers are to a certain extent independent of the Local Authority, they cannot perform their duties with absolute freedom. There is a precedent for this in the Scotch Local Government Act. It is said, "Will your law be carried out?" I believe that the action or inaction of the Sanitary Authorities has been very largely caused by the complexity of the law with regard to the public health; and the mere simplification of the law will enable the authorities to perform their duties in a much more efficient manner. I am greatly encouraged in this belief by the action of the Local Authorities under the Housing of the Working Classes Act. It is a matter for congratulation that in London the Local Authorities have almost with one accord endeavoured to make the best possible use of the powers given them by Parliament last year. Undoubtedly, however, it is the duty of the Local Government Board to take some guarantee for the due performance of the duties imposed on the Local Authorities. I have already said that the Sanitary Authorities, just as the individual, are liable to be fined for the non-performance of their duties. The Bill provides that the London County Council may prosecute the Local Authority, and also that the Local Government Board may, on complaint by the London County Council that the Local Authority is neglecting its duty, and after satisfying itself that the complaint is just, make an order fixing a limit of time within which the duty must be performed; and, if it be not then performed, may transfer the duty from the Local Authority to the County Council. It has been represented that some Local Authorities regard this provision as an attack upon themselves. Such a view arises from a misapprehension of the existing law. With regard to the prosecution of offenders, the existing law is that any aggrieved person may prosecute. Therefore the Bill is only placing the London County Council in the position of every private individual in the Metropolis. So with regard to the non-performance of duty by the Sanitary Authority. At present in London any person may make complaint against the Sanitary Authority to the Local Government Board, and the Local Government Board may hold a local inquiry, and if satisfied that the complaint is just, they may appoint persons to perform the duty which ought to have been performed by the Sanitary Authority. They may, under that law, appoint the London County Council; but we make a modification of the law in favour of the Vestry. We say that in future it shall not be in the power of any individual to put the Sanitary Authority to all the trouble of a local inquiry; but, that when a complaint is made to the Local Government Board it shall be made by some properly constituted authority. We say that the London County Council must satisfy themselves that the Local Authority has made default in the performance of their duty before the Local Government Board can be set in motion. It is needless to say that in many matters the London County Council have already very extensive powers. They are the absolute authority in regard to the disposal of sewage, and under the Housing of the Working Classes Act of last year they have large power of interference where the Local Authority does not carry out the Act. It seems to me right and proper that in regard to the great question of public health in London, the County Council ought to be charged with the performance of duty, which, in the opinion of the Local Government Board, after inquiry, has not been adequately and properly performed by the Local Authority. I think the House will see that, at any rate, we have prepared this Bill in a very large and liberal spirit. We shall consider fairly all representations made to us by Local Authorities to strengthen and simplify the law and enable it to be properly carried out. If the House will give its assent to the Second Reading of this, and the Bill which stands next on the Order Paper, I will propose to refer them to one of the Standing Committees, which will undoubtedly go through the Bills in a businesslike way, and make them even better than they now are.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

(5.15.) MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I and my hon. Friends have no opposition whatever to offer to these Bills. The right hon. Gentleman has done rightly in endeavouring to consolidate the law affecting the sanitation of the Metropolis, as he last year consolidated the law affecting the housing of the poor. The only misfortune is that this consolidation did not take place earlier. When the Local Government Act of 1888 was being passed we called attention to the necessity of this consolidation, for the distraught condition of the Public Health Acts, as they affect the Metropolis, has been rather a bar and hindrance to the proper execution by Sanitary Authorities of their duties. In regard to the Bill now before us I think it right to say that all the clauses are not of equal merit and cannot all meet with the same amount of approval, but on the whole we recognise in them an endeavour to bring the law up to the requirements of the present time. The right hon. Gentleman with much reason impressed on the House the propriety of giving the County Council power to take up the matters in which the Local Sanitary Authority may be in default. I believe I shall be supported by all my hon. Colleagues who sit on the Opposition Benches in the view that the relation in which the right hon. Gentleman places the County Council to the Vestries or Sanitary Authorities in London is not only a right and proper one, considering the circumstances of the case, but is one which is almost absolutely necessary. The health of the Metropolis is a matter which concerns the whole Metropolis, and therefore any case in which a Sanitary Authority is in default ought to be dealt with by the Representative Body of the Metropolis as a whole. I am glad to see the right hon. Gentleman has given the County Council power to frame bye laws in certain cases where it has not to supersede the Local Authority. It is quite evident the right hon. Gentleman does not share that distrust of the County Council which some hon. Members representing Metropolitan constituencies have, or, at least, profess to have. I think that in respect to the housing of the poor and other work it has been called upon to perform, the County Council has shown very great power of self organising, especially considering the enormity of the work, and the freshness of most of its members to that work. Indeed, there are very few matters in regard to which holes can be picked in the action of the London County Council. I am glad the President of the Local Government Board emphasises his satisfaction at the way the London County Council has done its work by the position he assigns to the Council under this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman has endeavoured to deal with the question of underground dwellings in a fair way; but I want particularly to call his attention to one matter in which I think the Bill ought to be improved in Committee. The Lancet pointed out about a week ago, that the London County Council ought to have the same powers as to open spaces about houses, which are possessed by every urban authority in England and Wales. While the right hon. Gentleman confers powers upon the County Council in respect to Sanitary Authorities in default, I trust he will grant them such powers as the Lancet points out they ought to have. With regard to the question of water supply, I think it is perfectly right that a house should be regarded as an insanitary place if it be improperly supplied with water. The right hon. Gentleman provides that to damage the water supply shall be punishable by a fine. I wish the right hon. Gentleman would consider who they are who mostly damage the water supply of London to the great detriment of the public health of London; they are the water companies themselves who have the power to damage the sanitary condition of London by cutting off the water. Such a power ought not to be allowed. All the companies ought to be allowed to do is to recover their expenses or the debt due to them by the ordinary means. As was the case in the Bill for the housing of the working classes, there are two great omissions in this Bill. In the first place, in order to carry out properly the sanitation of London, we require to have additional funds placed at the disposal of the Public Authorities—funds other than those immediately got from the occupying ratepayers. In the second place, until the Local Government of London is completed by the establishment of efficient and properly constituted Local Authorities, who shall also be the Sanitary Authorities, we shall be constantly in difficulty in respect to the enforcement of legislation such as this and the Housing of the Working Classes Act. There is no doubt, as the right hon. Gentleman has said, some Local Authorities have taken active steps in respect to the housing of the poor, but others have not done so. I urge on the right hon. Gentleman the great necessity for the completion of the District Government of London.

*(5.30.) MR. KELLY: I desire to say a few words on this Bill. The hon. Member for Shoreditch commenced by eulogising the London County Council, then went on to advocate the taxation of ground rents, and wound up by complaining of the delay in the production of the District Councils Bill. I cannot see how the question of the taxation of ground rents has any connection with the health of London, but this I may say that the delay in bringing forward the District Councils Bill has been due to the action of hon. Members opposite, for the right hon. Gentleman told us that years ago he had the Bill drafted and ready to be produced. Now, I beg to thank the President of the Local Government Board for the extremely careful manner in which he has explained the provisions of this measure, and especially its technical clauses. But I am sorry it contains several proposals which will be found to be exceedingly unacceptable. There is, for instance, that wretched being the common informer brought to the fore again. I admit you cannot offer too great facilities for enabling a person aggrieved or a sanitary officer, to deal with existing nuisances, but I regret to see that one of the clauses of this Bill brings to the front that most dangerous and abominable of all nuisances—that pest, the common informer—to whom, in some cases under this Bill, a bribe of £25 is offered to show zeal in his odious calling. Then I come to my next objection to this Bill. We are subject in our great cities to the mistaken zeal of officials. Now, I think it is desirable that when a sanitary officer serves a notice upon a householder he should specify what work is required to be done. But Sub-section 2 of Clause 5 provides that the notice need not specify the work to be executed unless the Sanitary Authority think it desirable, obviously that Authority will be guided by the advice of its own officer, who may be ignorant of what should be done in a given case, and who might shelter himself under the cover of a general notice, putting the unfortunate householder to a considerable amount of unnecessary expense. Other provisions of the Bill are, I think, equally unfortunate. Take, for instance, the burdens thrown upon owners and occupiers with reference to our streets. I do not think it wise or really in the public interest that we should continue the antiquated system of casting upon the occupier of a house the duty of sweeping away the snow from the pavement in front of his tenement. The present system of placing that duty upon him, subjects the unfortunate householder to have blackmail levied upon him by street loafers. If the work were undertaken by the Local Authority it could be done systematically, and hundreds of poor men would get an honest day's work, whereas it is now done by idle men in a most inadequate fashion, and paid for on a most extravagant scale. Who I should like to know will cleanse the pavements in front of chapels and churches? Who, too, is to be responsible in the case of unoccupied houses? I am afraid the names of defaulters in such cases could only be obtained at great expense, and certainly it would not be possible to ensure the snow being swept away within 24 hours. Another fault of the present system is that the snow is invariably swept into the road without regard to the necessity of securing a crossing for pedestrians. If the Vestry did the work that matter would be attended to. Now, one feature in the Bill is the clause with reference to underground rooms. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the warnings of the Acts of 1855 and 1875. What is the law now?

*MR. RITCHIE: I said distinctly that the Metropolis Management Act did contain a provision with regard to light, ventilation, &c., but it was not to be compared with the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875.

*MR. KELLY: What are the provisions of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855? One is that no underground room shall be occupied unless it is 7ft. high and 1ft. above the surface of the street adjoining. In this Bill the 1ft. limit is altered to 3ft. Again, the Act of 1855 says there shall be an open area 3ft. wide all round the room. Will the House believe that that is to be altered to 4ft.? And who is to be punished for infringing this law? I admit that the owner who lets underground rooms which ought not to be let in the interests of the public health should be promptly punished; but why should the ignorant, uneducated occupier be included along with the owner as liable to punishment? Let me point out the class of houses it will be impossible to let if this Bill becomes law. I admit frankly that if the London County Council had proper time to investigate these cases no great injustice would be done. I have not a word to say against the County Council. I do not think we are justified in distrusting our Local Representative Body. But undoubtedly the duty of dealing with these questions will be delegated to officers, some of whom are not too well paid, and to whom pecuniary inducements may be offered to neglect the proper discharge of their duties. Now, in the neighbourhood in which I live a large number of flats have been built. The upper floors bring in large rents, averaging about £200 a year, and the basement floors, of course, not so much, probably about £90 yearly. I have visited several of those houses, and I found that the area round one side of the room was 4½ft. to 5ft., while on the other side it was about 3ft. If those rooms are untenanted at the passing of this Bill they cannot afterwards be let. Some of these flats, too, are built on a slope, the effect of which is that the rooms at one end of the block are lettable, and those at the other end unlettable. It would be much better to say to what kind of buildings the restrictions shall apply, instead of spreading the net so widely, because many buildings will be included within the scope of the measure that are airy, perfectly healthy, and constructed on the newest principles. I confess I feel that London has very little to gain from the Bill. There are provisions so harassing in their character, the machinery of the common informer is so foreign to our English spirit, there is so little done to relieve the unfortunate Metropolitan householders from the foolish burdens cast upon them, that I should feel disposed, if any hon. Member were to move the rejection of the Second Reading, to support him. It is true the Bill is going to a Committee; I should like to know which?

*MR. RITCHIE: The Standing Committee on Law.

*MR. KELLY: I can only say I am sorry it is not going to the Trade Committee instead of the Law Committee. The Bill deals with questions of common sense, not nice points of law, and those questions can be much better dealt with by men of the world than by lawyers. No doubt it deals with something like 29 Acts of Parliament, but it is necessary that a measure of this kind should be clearly understood by the people, and it is more likely to be couched in plain terms if dealt with by the Committee on Trade. I can only repeat that it will require most careful supervision in Committee.

(6.47.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): The hon. Member, in the course of his speech, made an observation which I think ought not to be passed by without notice. He said that the District Councils Bill had been delayed by the action of hon. Members on this side of the House. Now, that is a statement of an altogether Party character, and out of place in discussing this measure. But that is not all. It is absolutely, and even ridiculously, without even a shadow of foundation, because hon. Members on this side of the House have always met the proposals of right hon. Gentlemen in so fair a spirit that the President of the Local Government Board has himself repeatedly expressed his obligations and acknowledgments of the reception which has been given to them. Therefore, I do think that the observation ought never to have been made. Now, I am entirely in accord with the hon. Member in his condemnation of the impolicy of continuing and even extending the system of harassing householders in connection with the cleansing of footways in front of their houses. At present the duty is imposed on the householder of clearing snow away from the pavement fronting his house—and that is work, I think, which ought to be undertaken by the Local Authority rather than by individual ratepayers. There is another important change introduced in this Bill to which I think sufficient attention has not been drawn, and that is that power is given to enable the managers of the Metropolitan Asylums Board or the Sanitary Authority to charge not merely a patient for his maintenance in hospital, but also the friends of that patient. That is quite a new power.

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Member is slightly in error. The law at present is that the Sanitary Authority or the Asylums Board may in the case of non-pauper patients charge the cost of maintenance on those legally responsible for the maintenance of the patient, and, consequently, the Asylums Board can sue not only the patient, but they can also sue his friends.

MR. PICKERSGILL: That may be the case with regard to London, but I trust I am not precluded from going into the question, as it affects the country at large, and in that direction I think it must be admitted that at present the expense can only be recovered from the patient. This Bill will extend the liability. Now I come to the question of making bye-laws. I think that one of the most important objects of this Bill is that of allowing the London County Council to make bye-laws, and I wish to submit that subordinate authorities in London should be equally subjected to these bye-laws.

*MR. RITCHIE: They are.

MR. PICKERSGILL: That is not so, for I find that the City of London is exempted from the operation of this provision. Now, we know that large and important areas, such as Chelsea and Kensington, are to be brought under the operation of this provision, and I think it is most unfair to exempt the City of London. I quite agree with the hon. Member for Shoreditch in his views as to the desirability of empowering the London County Council to pass bye-laws in terms similar to those which are contained in Section 157 of the Public Health Act. That section provides that an Urban Authority may make bye-laws with regard to sufficiency of space for buildings, and to secure the circulation of air, &c. It is true that in the Metropolis Buildings Act there is a clause which deals with this subject, but it is by no means in terms so broad as those which are contained in the Public Health Act. Take, for instance, the case of the notification of disease. There is a provision in this Bill which entitles the managers of every elementary school to receive a list of cases of infectious diseases. Of course, it is desirable to isolate, and the House has on various occasions recognised the desirability of isolating cases of infection in the interest of the health of the general community. But, at the same time, it is extremely desirable that undue publicity should not be given to the prevalence of infectious disease, and it seems to me that in this provision the Bill is doing that which may lead to considerable difficulty, because it insists on the intimation to a large number of persons, who, not being officials, are not bound to secrecy, that disease is prevalent in a particular house. I do hold that it is important that unnecessary publicity should not be given to the fact that infectious disease has broken out in a particular house. With reference to the provision dealing with Coroners' Court Houses, I certainly advocate the substitution of the word "shall" for "may" in the clause, for I hold that it is most undesirable that inquests should be held in public houses. I also think that as a Town Council is empowered to provide a market subject to the consideration of private rights, similar power ought to be given to the London County Council. Again, the injury which results to health and property from smoke in the Metropolis is becoming a question of grave public importance, and I would suggest that this is a good opportunity for making the Smoke Acts more stringent than they are at present. I think the Bill contains many good features, and I have no doubt that in Committee it will be very much improved.

(5.58.) SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I desire, at the request of the Local Authority in my constituency, to say one or two words in regard to these Bills. No doubt many of their provisions are required, and they will introduce valuable amendments in the law. Provisions relating to public health are at present scattered up and down many Statutes, and so ingeniously concealed from the people; and I venture to think it would be a great advantage to have them consolidated in one measure. I think, too, it is very important that both owners and occupiers should know their obligations, rights, and remedies, and should take a personal part in securing the sanitary condition of the Metropolis. In regard to the amending Bill, I think it is also necessary. It is almost incomprehensible that London should be content to continue to be governed under an Act which is in a very great degree obsolete. It is almost a caricature that Michael Angelo Taylor's Private Act should be the public law of London—an Act under which arrests, for instance, can be made for only minor nuisances.

MR. RITCHIE: Without warrant.

SIR A. ROLLIT: Yes, without warrant. These Bills will undoubtedly improve the law, and bring it in accord with modern requirements. But I am asked by the Local Authority of my district to call attention to one or two points. One is the disposition of the two Bills to subordinate Local Authorities to what I may call the Central Authority. I am one of those who sympathise with and do not distrust the County Councils. I have had too much experience of Provincial Municipal Councils to think that these matters cannot be safely entrusted to the County Councils. Still, one of the defects of the London Council has been that it has scarcely been able to cope with the immense amount of work imposed upon it. Yet these Bills give it additional powers of control and additional duties which it will hardly be able to fulfil adequately. Take, as an instance, a portion of the work which has been done in Islington, and which the County Council is now to be asked to undertake. Islington has a population equal to that of any of our large towns, save, perhaps, some four or five. I may mention, as an illustration of its public work, that during the last decennial period no less than 293,565 inspections of houses have been made. No complaint has been made of the manner in which that duty has been performed, notwithstanding the complexity of the law under which it has been discharged. Yet the right hon. Gentleman asks that power and control should be given to the Central Authority, though he has made no allegation of neglect of duty in these matters by the Local Authorities. On the contrary, I always like to look upon the parish as the unit in dealing with these matters. We must also always remember that the Local Authorities have great experience of details and great knowledge of local requirements, and it would be dangerous, in my opinion, to attempt to supersede them by conferring powers upon the Central instead of the Local Authority. I do not hesitate to say that there is too much tendency towards a Central Authority rather than to the development of Local Authority in the Bills before the House. Again, some of their provisions are too drastic. One imposes a penalty of £50 for not keeping the streets clear of snow, with a continuing penalty of 5s. a day. But, in regard to such emergencies, the Local Authorities have many things to consider, including the question of the unemployed, and whether they should keep a large staff of officials, at great extra cost to the public, for the purpose of meeting those emergencies. Another provision, following the precedent of the Scotch Bills, makes the Medical Officers and Sanitary Inspectors irremovable, except with the consent of the Local Government Board. I think such a provision exhibits the dangerous tendency of distrust of the Local Authority; and I am disposed to think that the sense of responsibility is decreased by these over-riding and appeal provisions. The tendency to centralisation in these Bills will deprive localities of the services of the best men; and while I welcome some of their provisions, I think in Committee that exception will have to be taken to others of them.

(6.10.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I think this Bill will do a great deal to remove some of the minor miseries under which Londoners have lived for so many years, and add greatly to the health and convenience of the community. I am bound to say that I think the Committee on Law requires to be strengthened before such a Bill can be threshed out. This Bill notably does one thing, it abolishes that most detestable custom of putting salt on the snow in the streets—thus lowering the temperature, producing a mixture which finds its way through any shoe leather, and causing great pain to horses which have to stand in it. I am glad also to find that the Bill abolishes the emptying of dust bins at all hours of the day. The other day, in Grosvenor Square, at 11 in the forenoon, I found dust bins being emptied, and the air all around thickened with the dust, probably laden with germs, or bacilli, which spread over the Metropolis, thus causing epidemics, which the Local Government Board, with all its skill, would probably be unable to run to the ground. We have heard nothing about fog, which is a difficult matter to deal with. I am glad to see that the responsibility of removing snow slush is to be taken from the householder, who does not do it well, and imposed upon the Local Authority. With some of the right hon. Gentleman's observations regarding the prevention of infectious diseases, I warmly agree. I think the schoolmaster will be able to put his fingers on infected areas, and probably prevent the outbreak of disease, not only in the school but in the locality. As to the dismissal of Medical Officers of Health, their duties, if properly discharged, are so likely to excite prejudice, that I think their dismissal should only be with the consent of the Local Government Board. I do not intend to say more upon this Bill, which appears a very good one, and which I have no doubt, when put into shape in Committee, will confer great benefit upon the Metropolis.

*(6.15.) MR. ISAACS (Newington, Walworth): In the few words I have to offer in connection with this Bill, for which I thank the right hon. Gentleman, I am rather disposed to follow the line of argument adopted by the hon. Member for Hoxton (Mr. Stuart), when he said that possibly the better course to have pursued would have been for the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to have addressed himself in the first place to the completion of the Government plan, discussed some years ago, by the introduction of a Bill for establishing Municipal Councils. No doubt if such a course had been pursued a considerable amount of the time that will be necessary for the consideration of the two measures which the right hon. Gentleman has now thought it necessary to introduce, would have been saved. I think, however, that there are in those two measures many elements which are likely to be productive of great benefit to the people of London. With regard to the second Bill, which is a measure of consolidation, I think that measure is one which will be found to be of the greatest service to those who are interested in the carrying out of the sanitary work required in the Metropolis. It is an important measure, having a wide scope, and embracing no fewer than 29 other measures, all of which deal with the government of the Metropolis. With regard to the measure immediately under discussion, I would say that I think there is great cause for congratulation, although some of its provisions are such as will have to be very carefully considered when the Bill is sent to the Committee upstairs. I fully share with the hon. Member for North Camberwell (Mr. Kelly) the dread he has expressed lest the Bill should prove to be the means of finding undue employment for that most unpleasant, disagreeable, offensive, and obnoxious person, the common informer. If the House looks carefully into the measure, I think it will see how large are the inducements it offers to that person to put in force the provisions of the Bill. The penalties imposed by some of the clauses are exceedingly severe. One of them has already been referred to, namely the clause which imposes a penalty of £50 on the Local Authority for neglecting to cleanse the roadways, and, in addition to this, inflicts further penalties of a continuous character. These, however, are details, which, no doubt, would be better considered upstairs. In addition to the objections I have urged to the provisions which may offer inducements for a large employment of the common informer, there is another matter which I think is likely to meet with grave opposition on the part of the existing Local Authorities. I refer to the provision for calling into requisition the action of the London County Council on matters which, in my opinion, are not the proper subjects with which they ought to deal. If I correctly estimate the duties of that body, they are of a general and metropolitan character. The London County Council are called upon to deal with London street improvements, with main drainage, with the means of inter-communication between the north and the south sides of the Thames, and with other matters of a large and comprehensive character, and I do not think that the London County Council would have its time usefully employed in the settlement of bye-laws as to the manner in which the streets are to be cleansed. Admitting that it may be desirable there should exist some means of dealing with this question, it cannot be contended that a great body like the London County Council should be called upon to lay down rules for every district of the Metropolis as to the hours at which the cleansing of the streets should be performed. I think that the right hon. Gentleman will find that he will have to forego a good many of the references he has made in this Bill to that body. At any rate, I have little doubt that he will meet with a considerable amount of opposition on the part of the existing Authorities against what they may consider to be an undue interference in matters coming within their province. I would also say that, as the Bill now stands, it is simply a piece of patchwork, that is to say, it can hardly be regarded as a complete measure. With regard to one provision relative to the cleansing of the footpaths, I venture to think that even on the score of economy the householders of the Metropolis would greatly welcome provisions under which the cleansing of the footways, as well as of the roadways, should be undertaken by the Local Authorities. At present, whenever there is a heavy fall of snow, the householders are subject to the enforcement of blackmail in order to get the work of clearing the snow away from the front of their premises performed; and this alone would, I think, induce them to go a long way towards supporting a proposal which might even involve a slight extra addition to the rates, by throwing this work upon the Local Authorities. As it is, we call upon the Local Authorities to cleanse the roadways, and they do it; but we leave it to the option of the householders to cleanse the footways at such times as they may think fit; and the result is, that after the Local Authority has rendered the carriage-ways clean, the householder gets to work, and undoes what has already been effected by the Local Authority. With regard to the portion of the Bill which deals with underground dwellings, I am in entire accord with the right hon. Gentleman, and I also particularly approve of those clauses which deal with the sale of unwholesome food; but, on the other hand, I think that the provision with regard to making known the existence of infectious diseases to the whole of the Local Authorities of the Metropolis is, perhaps, a little too drastic, and may need some amendment upstairs. However, taking the Bill as a whole, and having regard to the general scope of the measure, I think the right hon. Gentleman has shown the House how completely he has mastered the subject, and how eminently capable he is of dealing with this important matter in a lucid and practical manner. To these few observations I have only to add that I shall give the measure my most cordial support.

(6.21.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): In supporting the Second Reading of this Bill I hope its passage may not be taken as an excuse for any further delay in the introduction of the District Councils Bill. I agree with the hon. Member opposite who has said that the District Councils Bill ought to have been introduced in preference to this; because much of the work the House is now doing will have to be gone over again when that Bill is brought forward. Reference has been made by my hon. Friend to the desirability of introducing upon the Grand Committee, which will have to consider this Bill, the scientific element, and I hope the Committee of Selection will not forget the London Members who ought to be appointed on the Committee, and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hoxton reminds me, particularly those who sit on this side of the House. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board whether he can relieve the anxiety which is felt by certain Medical Officers of Health and Sanitary Inspectors who now hold appointments in the Metropolis with regard to the protection to be afforded them under this Bill? By Clause 35, Sub-section 8, the Bill provides that Medical Officers and Sanitary Inspectors appointed after the commencement of the Act shall be removable by the Local Authority, with the consent of the Local Government Board; but there is no provision for the protection of the officers who now hold these appointments. They are anxious to know whether they have been intentionally omitted from the clause, or whether they have only been omitted by accident. I hope it will be thoroughly understood that although we are going to vote, as I trust, most cordially, for the Second Reading of this Bill, there are many details which will have to be thoroughly threshed out in Grand Committee.

(6.26.) MR. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I have only risen to express a hope that my right hon. Friend will permit the introduction of a clause preventing auctioneers and house agents from selling or letting unhealthy houses. We know that such houses are let. An instance occurred only a short time ago in the neighbourhood of Grosvenor Square where my hon. Friend has told us he saw the dust cart. A house was sold by an auctioneer, and when it was examined it was found to contain five open cesspools. It took some considerable time to cart away what proved to be no less a quantity than 500 cart-loads of polluted soil, which, of course, had to be done at considerable cost. I might mention another case of a resident in the neighbourhood of Regent's Park, where the house had not been occupied more than three or four weeks before the father and daughter and five servants were laid up with fever. There was another case in Bayswater where something of a similar character occurred. What I want my right hon. Friend to do is to insist that every auctioneer and house agent, when submitting for sale or for letting residential premises, shall produce an agreement to which shall be attached a sanitary document certifying that the house is fit for habitation, and in good sanitary condition. Hon. Members have probably little idea of the amount of trouble that has been caused by the letting of unsanitary houses. I could mention the names of celebrated people who have met an early death through inhabiting unsanitary dwellings, and I shall be glad, if my right hon. Friend will permit me, on the Third Reading of this Bill, to put down an Amendment to the effect that every house, before it is sold or let by an auctioneer or his agent, shall be officially certified as being in a fit sanitary condition. I hope before the Third Reading of the Bill my right hon. Friend will see his way to accept this suggestion, and meanwhile I am glad to support the Second Reading of the Bill.

*(6.30.) MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea). With other Metropolitan Members I thank my right hon. Friend for the introduction of this Bill, but I desire to emphasise the remarks which have been made as to the undesirability of diminishing the responsibility and independence of the Local Bodies, the Local Vestries, or the District Councils of the future. Representing as I do a district which has always been honourably distinguished for its sanitary administration, I feel bound to give expression to the very strong feeling that there exists, the feeling of anxiety that some of the provisions of the Bill will diminish the direct responsibility of the Local Bodies. I cannot help putting this question to my right hon. Friend. The new District Councils, as we all hope, will be more able Administrative Bodies than the present Vestries, but, after all, does not the secret of all successful administration depend on the personnel of those who are the administrators? The question then is, how to attract to the new District Councils a worthier class of men than those who have managed local affairs in London heretofore? One method of doing this is to give to the new bodies large and important functions, and to make them feel themselves directly responsible to the ratepayers. I cannot help thinking that just at this very moment, when we are all hoping for better local government in the future, a step is being taken by some of the provisions of this Bill which will tend to discourage really responsible people from going on the Local Bodies, and therefore it will be necessary in Grand Committee to watch most carefully those clauses which seem to fetter unnecessarily the powers of the present District Bodies, and to give unnecessarily increased powers of supervision to the County Council. Subject to these criticisms, I thank the Government for the introduction of a most important and excellent measure.

*(6.34.) MR. RITCHIE: Though I have no right to trouble the House with any further remarks, I hope I may be allowed, with the indulgence of the House, to acknowledge the sympathetic manner in which the proposals of the Government have been received, and especially by the London Members. It is not surprising that objection should be taken to certain details, considering that the Bill deals with so many important and difficult questions. When the Bill gets into Grand Committee I think it will be found that the fears expressed with regard to the possible interference of the County Council with the Local Authorities are in most cases exaggerated, if not altogether groundless. The Bill does not go one bit further than the existing law. At the present moment it is open to any ratepayer in London to make a representation to the Local Government Board that a certain Vestry is not performing its duty with regard to a particular question, and the Local Government Board, if satisfied that there is ground for such complaint, may hold a local inquiry and call upon the Local Authority concerned to perform their duty within a limited time, and, unless it is so performed, may appoint any person or body of persons, including the London County Council, to perform it. Therefore, the Bill is not going beyond the existing law. In some respects, indeed, it modifies the existing law, because it provides that it shall not be in the power of any individual to put that machinery in motion but the County Council alone; and the County Council even will not be at liberty to interfere until they have obtained the previous assent of the Local Government Board.

Mr. Whitmore

We must be satisfied that the Local Body is in default. We believe that in the vast majority of cases no such power will have to be exercised, but I think the House will see that, having regard to some possible miscarriage in the administration of the law, it is desirable that such power should exist. If in any matter of form or language the Bill is thought to create undue powers of interference, the Government will be glad to consider Amendments to remove doubts or difficulties in that connection. I should be the last person to do anything calculated to prevent good men from coming forward to serve on these Local Bodies. Allusion has been made to the cleansing of footpaths with the suggestion that this should be a duty cast upon the Local Authority; and though I have not seen my way to altering the responsibility that now lies with the occupier, I shall be perfectly ready to consider any proposal made in Committee. Then a question has been raised by the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Causton) as to the position of Medical Officers and Sanitary Inspectors. There are a large number of these, and in the great majority of cases they are appointed from year to year, and the position is this—that at the end of the term of their present appointment they will become officers under this Bill; until the present appointments cease they will not. Clearly, it would be most injudicious that we should impose upon Local Authorities the obligation of maintaining every one of these officers in their position irrespective of their qualifications for permanent occupation of their posts. When the new appointments are made at the end of the year or in three years they will become officers under this Bill, but until their period of appointment is passed they will not.

*MR. MORTON (Peterborough): Will the right hon. Gentleman say what he means by re-appointment? I am not aware of the practice in London.

*MR. RITCHIE: I refer to officers who hold their posts for a year and are re-appointed.

*MR. MORTON: That, so far as I know, is only done by the Commissioners of Sewers for the City of London.

MR. CAUSTON: Many officers are not subject to re-appointment.

*MR. RITCHIE: I am not aware of cases in which they are not re-appointed; but, in any event, existing appointments may be terminated by mutual consent and a new appointment made. But it would be impossible to impose an absolute duty on the Local Authority to keep on a man without an opportunity of considering whether he is a fit and proper person to be appointed permanently. I am afraid it would be impossible to carry out the suggestion about certificates for sanitary houses. In order to certify every house to be in a perfectly sanitary condition it would be necessary virtually to pull the house to pieces, and I am afraid it might be found that there were very few houses in London faultless in that respect. I will only say in conclusion that the Government do not regard this Bill as a Party one, or, in a political sense, a contentious one; and we shall be glad to listen to any suggestions in Committee, and to consider dispassionately, and I hope favourably, all proposals which we think will be improvements in the Bill.

Resolution 2.

"That a sum, not exceeding £78,904, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens."

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): May I ask the First Commissioner a question I was unable to put to him last night with regard to the use of Constitution Hill and the desire that the drive should be continued: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the road from behind Carlton House Terrace to Trafalgar Square will be continued, opening up what is now a pavement as a roadway?

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): That is part of the plan recommended by the Committee three years ago on the Admiralty Buildings, and it is intended to carry out that proposal as soon as the Admiralty Buildings are completed.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution 3.

"That a sum, not exceeding £29,625, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892, for Houses of Parliament Buildings."

*MR. MORTON (Peterborough): In this Vote occurs the charge for lamp oil, and in regard to this I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman how long the present contractor has held the contract, and if any other contractors have been asked to tender during the last 20 or 30 years? I am informed that the contract has been in the hands of one individual for a great many years.

*MR. PLUNKET: The contract is from year to year, and I know that for the last three years it has been in the hands of one contractor. I rather think others have been invited to compete for it, but of that I am not sure. But I have undertaken to give a Return fully explaining the whole circumstances.

Resolutions 4 and 5 (see pages 1872-3) agreed to.

Resolution 6.

"That a sum, not exceeding £28,461, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892, for Expenditure in respect of Art and Science Buildings, Great Britain."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I take the opportunity to make one more appeal to the right hon. Gentleman in favour of lighting up the Natural History Museum in the evening and on dark days. I know the experiment at the British Museum has not been successful, but that is a museum of antiquities, and is not attractive for the people generally. The South Kensington Museum contains a collection of out of date out of the way gimcracks—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! it is now ten minutes to 7.

*SIR G. CAMPBELL: I was merely asking a question. I have no intention of opposing the Vote.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 8th April, 1891.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

HARES BILL—(No. 10.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.35.) COLONEL DAWNAY (York, N.R., Thirsk): In rising to move the Second Reading of this Bill, I wish to say that it should have been unnecessary to give an assurance that the Bill has nothing whatever to do with the preservation of rabbits; but, unfortunately, a number of persons who ought to know better have insisted on calling it a Hares and Rabbits Bill, and have thus unjustly created a great deal of opposition to it that would not otherwise have been shown. The object of the Bill is to provide a close time for hares only during the breeding season; and so far from wishing to interfere with the principle of the Ground Game Act, 1880, in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) is interested, the object in bringing in this Bill is to confirm that principle and to secure to the farmers the benefits granted to them by that Act, benefits which are now endangered. The provisions of the present Bill differ in one important particular from previous Bills on the subject. Although there is, and always has been, a large majority in the House in favour of a close time for hares, yet there does exist a strong feeling among a certain section that there should not be one hard and fast close time in all England, Scotland, and Wales. There is considerable force in this objection, because what might be a reasonable close time in Sussex and Dorset would not be equally reasonable for the Counties of Sutherland and Caithness in Scotland. To meet this objection, the present Bill, instead of giving the same close time for England, Scotland, and Wales, gives the County Councils in those countries power to grant a close time in their own respective counties during the breeding season.

VOL. CCCLII. [THIRD SERIES.]

The Bill also is on the same lines as that valuable measure, the Wild Birds Protection Act, but it substitutes County Councils for Justices of Quarter Sessions in fixing a close time. We do not ask the House to fix a particular close time, but that the occupiers of the land may, if they wish, through their representatives on the County Councils, have the power of fixing the close time during the breeding season. If the occupiers do not want the power they need not have it, and if, having obtained it, they find it injurious, the Bill will enable them to repeal it. I venture to say that a measure more free from possibility of abuse has never been submitted to Parliament, and I am not altogether without hope that we may secure the support of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby himself for the Second Reading. I earnestly hope that this may be so, or I believe that soon there will be no hares left to protect. In many parts of England hares are becoming almost extinct through the barbarous and unnecessary slaughter that is made of them at improper times. The right hon. Gentleman did not agree with me last Session, and as a proof that hares were plentiful in this country he told the House that Lord Durham had in one particular day had 360 killed on his estate. But even supposing that Lord Durham is in the habit of shooting 300 or 400 hares on his estate in one day it would only prove that there are a few great landowners who are able to afford the expense of keeping up a large supply of game. I have taken pains to ascertain the views of the trade in this matter, and have consulted many of the leading salesmen of the London game markets. They have informed me that there has been a marked decrease in the number of English hares since the Act of 1880 was passed, and that also after the beginning of March a very large number of the hares that are killed are with young or in milk. Very few buck hares come into the market after the end of February, and the slaughter of doe hares is simply barbarous. Nor is there any excuse for it, because there is an ample supply of foreign hares brought frozen into the market that are killed before the breeding season, and are therefore in a fit and proper condition. All the game salesmen agree that if some steps are not taken to prevent the present destruction the utter extermination of our whole stock of English hares is only a matter of time. This is the fifth Session that this Bill has been brought forward, and until this day we have not had the opportunity of a Debate on the Second Reading. Last year we succeeded in getting the Bill into Committee, when the right hon. Member for Derby stated his objections to it, and it is in order to satisfy and to remove those objections that the present Bill has been brought forward to-day in its altered form. I wish briefly to refer to some of the objections urged by the right hon. Gentleman. The first was that the Bill contravenes the principle of the Ground Game Act. This, however, is not the case, and the Bill simply seeks to put a stop to the senseless and indiscriminate slaughter that is now going on. Hares have a habit of wandering from one farm to another, and a farmer naturally says, "What is the use of my preserving hares that they may be shot by my next neighbour?" The result is, that the wretched hares are shot both in season and out of season to prevent any chance of escape. This Bill will prevent anything of the kind, because, if the majority of the farmers wish to have a close time, they will, through their representatives on the County Councils, be able to secure it. Another objection of the right hon. Gentleman was that this is a sportsman's Bill, and is brought forward in the interests of sportsmen. Well, I admit that if there were no hares there would be no coursing, and tens of thousands of the working classes, among others, in Lancashire and Yorkshire would be deprived of a sport in which they now participate, and which they enjoy just as much as the right hon. Gentleman himself does the Goodwood and Ascot races. For my own part, I should be extremely sorry to see any of the old English sports abolished, although, if the right hon. Gentleman will bring in a Bill to put a stop to such coursing as takes place at Kempton Park, I will willingly support it; but I say emphatically that this is not a sporting Bill. Lastly, the right hon. Gentleman says that this is a Bill which would create a new Game Law, and that it would warrant the gamekeepers in being always on the land of the occupiers. But if the tenant does not like the arrangement he would be able to take effectual steps to put a stop to it, because up to the period at which close time begins he could kill every hare in his district. Whatever the result of the Bill may be, I do not think it will add to the game preserves of this country. It is a Bill for preventing the extermination of a valuable animal. I desire to point out that by inadvertence I have omitted to insert a clause—which, however, I will move in Committee—expressly providing that the Bill is not to apply in cases where a hare or leveret has been killed, wounded, or taken inside a nursery or other garden. There is an almost unanimous feeling in the country in favour of the measure. Almost every Farmers' Club and Chamber of Agriculture has passed resolutions in favour of the Bill. Two years ago 2,000 Petitions were presented, containing 30,000 signatures in favour of it, and only one against it; and Mr. Rowlandson, who contested the North Riding of York in 1883, spoke in the Central Chamber of Agriculture strongly in support of it. No measure was ever more universally supported by all classes. Even the Society of Advocates at Aberdeen have petitioned in favour of it, and the names on the back of the Bill represent every single section of this House. Hon. Members for Ireland, besides having backed the Bill, have given a still more practical proof of their opinion upon the matter, because an Act fixing a close time for hares in Ireland was passed in 1879. Consequently, Irish hares already enjoy the blessing of Home Rule, and the present Bill will extend the blessing to their less fortunate fellow-creatures in England, Scotland, and Wales. I cannot think that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby will refuse them this small mercy. On what principle of justice should a Donegal hare enjoy the blessing of paternal government, while the Derbyshire hare remains without the pale, an alien and an outcast? Before I sit down I must again emphatically repeat that we do not wish to curtail or interfere with the existing rights of anyone. If the farmers really wish to exterminate the hares, they will, under the present Bill, have ample opportunities of doing so. But the supporters of the measure protest against the hares being barbarously slaughtered at a time when they are unfit for human food, and I appeal to the House to grant this small, but necessary, amendment of the Ground Game Act of 1880. In conclusion, I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Colonel Dawney.)

*(12.45.) MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): In rising to oppose the Bill, I desire to express a certain amount of sympathy with the object the hon. Member has in view; and if he had confined the measure to the prevention of the selling of hares in close time, I do not think I should have opposed him. My main objection to the Bill as it stands is that it is a new and an additional Game Act. I think we have already too many Game Acts, and, for my part, I am resolved to oppose any new game legislation until there has been a revision of the Acts now in force. I think the hon. Member has over-stated his case in saying that this will not be an interference with the rights of the farmers under the Ground Game Law, because he must be aware that it would be impossible to fix snares for rabbits in close time without the chance of catching hares in them, and if that should happen the farmer would render himself liable to penalties under this Bill. That would certainly be an infraction of the rights conferred on farmers by the Ground Game Act. Let me remind the House that the Ground Game Act was a compromise. There was an anxious desire on the part of many hon. Members that there should be a close time for hares; but, on the other hand, there was a desire that the rights of the farmer should not be prejudiced, and that consideration prevailed. The hon. Member has said that the farmers are almost unanimously in favour of the Bill. I do not think the hon. Member has had much support from the Scotch farmers. On the contrary, from everything I have heard, the Scotch farmers are opposed to the Bill. [An hon. MEMBER: No.] Is the hon. Member who dissents able to refer to any Petition from Scotch farmers in favour of the measure. For my part, I have not seen any; but even if it were the case, and a large number of sporting farmers were in favour of a close time for hares, I do not think that would be any justification for this Bill, or that a majority of the farmers should be allowed to preserve animals to eat up the crops of the minority. For it must be borne in mind that before the hares of the majority can eat the crops of the minority they must first trespass upon the land of the minority. It is not, however, a question between the majority and the minority, but a question whether a highly rented farmer is to be called upon to maintain in addition his neighbour's hares. This Bill proposes to disturb the compromise already arrived at, and to curtail the rights now enjoyed. If the hon. Member had brought forward a measure simply to prevent the selling of hares in close time, or if he had proposed that the farmers should have more liberty in dealing with hares and rabbits outside the close time, I should not oppose the Second Reading of the Bill. But under the circumstances, although I sympathise to some extent with the views of the hon. Member, I feel called upon, in the performance of my duty to my constituents, to move that the Bill be read a second time on this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Barclay.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*(12.56.) MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby), who seconded the Amendment, said: I have been in communication with a large number of tenant farmers in regard to this Bill, and it is obvious that it is a measure upon which a considerable diversity of interests arises. Indeed, it seems to me that in discussing any question of game it is impossible that a diversity of interests should not arise between the game preservers and the tenant farmers, whose crops feed the game. The present Bill is very largely a rich man's Bill. It is clearly a Bill in the interests of game preservers, and opposed to the interests of the tenant farmers. Tenant farmers did not always get their way, but after many years of fighting they obtained the boon which was conferred by the Act of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. There is no tenant farmer in the country who will say that that Act has not been of great service to him. There is not an argument which has been used to-day by the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Dawnay) in favour of the Second Reading of this Bill which was not used against the Second Reading of the Ground Game Act. I cannot understand on what principle the hon. and gallant Gentleman assumes that this Bill will not interfere with the Ground Game Act. This Bill is in direct opposition to the principle of that Act. The principle of the Ground Game Act is that a tenant farmer may do what he likes with the hares and rabbits on his land at all times. This Bill will prevent him doing what he likes with hares at a certain time of the year. It seems to me that tenant farmers would be foolish to give up the right which has been given them. Far too few rights have been granted to English tenant farmers; they are beginning to learn by experience, and they have not the same confidence in the landowning and game-preserving class they had 20 years ago. I imagine that no one wishes hares to become extinct, no one wishes to deprive those who enjoy sport with harriers and greyhounds of their sport; but as to the matter of food supply, I am satisfied that the damage done by hares in England vastly exceeds any amount of food which hares afford. The hon. and gallant Gentleman spoke of how very fairly tenant farmers had acted in carrying out the Ground Game Act. I ask him to trust them in the future. He says that he does, but his Bill seems to show that he does not. I am quite sure tenant farmers will not unnecessarily kill hares in close time. Of course, it may be absolutely necessary in the interest of his farming operations that a farmer should kill hares in the close time, but this Bill will prevent him doing so. It seems to me the people we really want to get at are the people who make a profit by the sale of hares in the close time. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Forfar (Mr. Barclay) that if the hon. and gallant Member would confine his Bill to prohibiting the sale of hares and the exposing hares for sale during certain times we might well withdraw our opposition. I understood the hon. and gallant Gentleman to say he only knew of one solitary instance of a tenant farmer being against the Bill. I have the honour to represent an agricultural constituency, and I have made it my business to ascertain the opinions of the tenant farmers in regard to this measure. About a year ago I was present when this matter was discussed by four gentlemen in Warwickshire. Two of the gentlemen were well-known Conservative farmers and one was a Radical doctor, who, I think, knew as much about hares as the Conservative farmers. The Radical doctor was at first strongly in favour of the Bill of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, but at the end of the discussion I made a note of what was agreed.

"That the present rights of tenants under the Hares and Rabbits Act, as to killing hares and rabbits at any time, ought not in any way to be encroached upon, but that hares ought not to be sold or exposed for sale out of season, so that their wanton destruction for profit might be stopped."

I firmly believe that represents the very general opinion amongst tenant farmers. Last Saturday there was a meeting of the Warwickshire Chamber of Agriculture. The Chamber discussed this Bill, and the Vice Chairman moved—and he pointed out that, so far as tenant farmers were concerned, this would be a retrograde movement. The motion was seconded by Mr. Macmillan, one of Lord Leigh's largest tenants, and a gentleman very well known in Warwickshire. He said the Bill would make the position of the tenant farmer worse than it now was. Another well-known tenant farmer said that all farmers seemed to be against killing hares during the close time, and he thought they might be trusted without an Act being passed. That is exactly my view. I second the rejection of the Bill, firstly, because I believe it to be an invasion upon the rights of the tenant farmers; and, secondly, because I believe the difficulty may be met in the very simple way I have already indicated.

* (1.12.) MR. HERMON - HODGE (Lancashire, Accrington): As having been a master of harriers in Oxfordshire and Berkshire, I may, perhaps, be allowed to say a few words. My experience of farmers, and it is naturally a very large one, is diametrically opposed to the experience of the hon. Member for the Rugby Division (Mr. Cobb). Warwickshire is not very far from Oxfordshire, and I venture to suggest as an explanation of the difference of opinion which apparently exists, that Chambers of Agriculture, when discussing questions of this sort, are very apt to catch a certain amount of colour from the Members of Parliament who attend the discussions. I hope my hon. and gallant Friend will persevere with the Bill. There are no animals more easily exterminated than hares. There is no question more often asked than when this Bill is going to be passed. The hare provides the only means of sport for thousands of the poor farmers, and there is no better means of promoting good-fellowship than to prevent its extermination. We do not want a large number of hares, because that would ruin sport. We only want two or three hares in a parish, and it is because we think they are going to be exterminated that we ask the House to pass this Bill.

(1.15.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): My chief objection to the Bill is that it will extend the Game Laws, and that I think in itself will be a great evil. I know that opinion is not held by everybody. There never yet has been a time when an owner of land could not kill hares on his own property for the protection of his crops. This Bill will for the first time restrict that right. In old days the right could not be exercised without a game licence; but about 20 years ago it was considered proper to remove that restriction. Then, in 1880, the occupier of lands was given an inalienable right to destroy hares for the protection of his property. The hon. and gallant Member opposite has said that everyone is in favour of a close time for hares; but that view is not borne out by the Debates of 1880, when the question was fully discussed. In that year a gentleman well known for his acquaintance with, and interest in, agriculture—Mr. Ruggles-Brise—and who sat on the Conservative Benches, moved an Amendment to the Ground Game Bill confirming the right of the occupier to kill hares in the months of February, March, and April; so that the time, according to Mr. Ruggles-Brise, when occupiers ought to be allowed to kill hares is exactly the time you would prevent them doing so. Mr. Ruggles-Brise said he agreed with the Home Secretary that a close time for hares was not necessary, and added that it would be an uncalled-for interference with the rights of farmers, who ought to be allowed to kill leverets as an article of food. Ultimately the Amendment was withdrawn. I remember that an objection I took at that time to a close time, was that it would have an injurious effect upon small holders. The present Minister for Agriculture (Mr. Chaplin) whom I am surprised not to see in his place to-day, took part in the discussion. It was in the days of the right hon. Gentleman's unregenerate condition, before he had sat at the feet of the Gamaliel of Bordesley; but even in those days he declared that, in connection with market gardens, there ought to be unlimited power to kill hares at all times. Mr. Hunter Rodwell, a very considerable authority, both upon sport and the feelings of tenant farmers in Cambridge-shire, was opposed to a close time for hares. Eventually, a definite Amendment was moved on the subject. It ran as follows:—

"No person shall kill or take hares between April 1 and August 1 in England and Scotland, and between April 20 and August 20 in Ireland."

That Amendment was rejected on a Division. Lord Wemyss, who sat in this House then as Lord Elcho, and who certainly was not an enemy of sport, said that, in the interests of sport, it would be reasonable to have a close time; but that if the intention was to promote good husbandry by keeping down game there ought to be no close time. Mr. Beresford Hope, among others, opposed the Amendment on the ground that hares injured plantations by eating the young shoots. The proposal is now made to establish a close time in spite of the decision arrived at in 1880. The promoters of the Bill urge in its favour that it provides for the intervention of the County Councils. For my part, I am not sure that this is a point to which much importance ought to be attached, for in some places the County Councils are very much what the old Quarter Sessions used to be. I hold, also, that it would be a great mistake to entrust the County Councils with game legislation. If there is anything that will certainly render them unpopular it will be to give them the power of making new Game Laws. It is urged as a reason for the introduction of this Bill, that hares are becoming extinct. I deny the truth of that statement; it is contrary to the evidence of my own senses. In the county in which I live, where there are no large estates and no special preservation, there certainly is no paucity of hares. The week before last a master of harriers in my neighbourhood found in one morning three or four hares, and a friend of mine in this House has told me that on an estate in Yorkshire 400 hares were recently killed in one day. For a moderate man surely that is enough. On another estate in the same county—not an estate of great dimensions—I understand that 250 hares were killed in a day. Therefore, there does not appear to be any paucity of hares in the county from which the hon. and gallant Member opposite comes. No doubt there are not as many hares now as there used to be, and I am glad of it. I remember the days when it was a common thing to see carts full of hares coming away from the coverts. The farmers all over the country very justly complained; and now, where there was great abuse in the preservation of hares, hares have been killed down. Then it is said the farmers universally desire this Bill, but I do not believe that. I have had a good many letters on the subject as well as my hon. Friend. I suppose we see the opposite sides of the shield, his correspondents approve of the Bill, mine disapprove of it. The hon. Member for Warwick has given us some valuable testimony as to the views of the farmers, in whom my hon. Friend believes. The argument of my hon. Friend is that farmers want protection against themselves, and against each other, and he used what seemed to me a rather amusing expression, that a man kills on his own land not only his own hares but other people's hares. But, how are they other people's hares when a man finds the animals on his own land eating his crops? Those are a man's hares which he finds on his own land. If I see a hare eating my carnations I do not ask whose hare it is, I destroy him, if I choose, because he is on my land eating my flowers; and the distinction my hon. Friend draws between a man's own hares and the hares of other people is one I do not understand. My hon. Friend seems to imagine that hares are domestic animals, forgetting, for the moment, his own remark that hares are great travellers. The rabbit may be considered a domestic animal, he does not go far from his burrow, his range is limited, but the hare travels far afield. This argument comes strangely from the Benches opposite. Whenever it is proposed to put down a public house, because it is unnecessary, and a temptation to the people around, then the remonstrance is raised that this is an interference with liberty and the right of property, but I wonder what the Property Defence Association say to a Bill of this kind, which undoubtedly is an interference with liberty and rights of property, for it declares that a man shall not kill his own hare—as I call it—on his own land when the animal is destroying his own property. But though gentlemen opposite are continually denouncing and attacking the principle of interference with the rights of property in reference to public houses, or Trades Unions, or anything else, because it may be an advantage to somebody else, all these fine principles disappear the moment you come to the question of game; then liberty and rights of property disappear, and there is no principle they are not ready to invade. If it were true that all farmers are in favour of the Bill, I, for one, should be extremely glad to hear it. I should be extremely glad to hear that farmers are so well off that the only thing they really need at the present time is more hares. That would relieve us from many terrible apprehensions of agricultural distress of which we have heard so much, and perhaps we shall have no more demands for Imperial subsidies in relief of local rates—especially after the admission by the Minister for Agriculture that the whole of such relief goes ultimately into the pockets of the landowners. This intimation that the farmers of England are in favour of more hares seems to me to indicate a sort of superabundance of wealth, a plethora of prosperity such as we hardly expected the class to possess. So far, no doubt, the statement is very satisfactory. But I confess to being a little sceptical on this subject, this unanimity in favour of the Bill. If it were only the big men I should care very little about it. I think the big farmers are quite able to take care of themselves, and will take care of themselves. But they will probably not be affected by the Bill, and I will say a word or two on another class of agriculturists directly. Then there is the great argument, the "food of the people," and this, I find, is put into the Preamble of this Bill. I hope my hon. Friend will not be offended if I say there is a slightly insincere Preamble to his Bill. I find there is another proposal for legislation before the House this Session, there is a "Possession of Game" Bill which is to prevent the importation of certain kinds of game from abroad, and that seems hardly consistent with this great anxiety about the "food of the people." But I do not find, nor does my hon. Friend even assert that there is any scarcity of hares in the market. I listened very carefully to what he said as to the evidence of salesmen, which entirely confirms the information I have. He said there was a diminution in the supply of English hares, and I am glad of it, but there is an increase in the importation of foreign hares, and, consequently, no decrease in this form of food for the people. There are hares which feed on the produce of English farms, and a very good thing for the food of the people that is. As I was driving from the station yesterday, I passed a poulterer's shop, in which was exhibited a placard "Hares are cheap to-day." That does not support the "food for the people" argument. But while on this point of food for the people I would ask, what are you going to do about leverets. We most of us know that in the "gameous months" of June and July the only game to be had is leverets. Is no leveret to be allowed to be killed during the months of May, June, and July? Really, I must again say that this argument of food for the people is insincere. Food for the people! Why, how much food do hares destroy? What do you think is the effect of half a dozen hares in a field of turnips in such a winter as we have had? We know when pieces are bitten out of the sides of turnips, and we have such frosts as we have had this winter, that these turnips are destroyed. How much food for sheep is in this way destroyed? To increase the number of hares on the ground of increasing the supply of food for the people is all nonsense; indeed, it tends to diminish the supply of food for the people. Then there is another favourite argument in favour of this Bill, which I may call the cruelty argument. Now, I confess I cannot help calling that with all respect to those who use it a hypocritical argument. I should like to know whether those tender-hearted gentlemen who are so indisposed to kill hares during the breeding season are going to cherish them as the poet Cowper did his hare when he watched the animal's gambols in his orchard. I do not think there is any such object in the preservation. No, these hares about which hon. Gentleman are so solicitous, are intended to perish by the mouth of chokebore or greyhound. The argument on the ground of humanity is carried almost to the limit of absurdity. I have in my time been fond of shooting, but I have always thought that it is a great drawback to hare shooting and extremely painful to a man of sensitive feelings to hear the scream of the wounded hare in the cover when the dog seizes it. I have never thought hare shooting the highest form of sport. I think we had better get rid of cant in these "food of the people" and "humanity" arguments, for these arguments do not concern the real object of this Bill. My hon. Friend objects to my calling it a Bill for the promotion of sport. Now in a legitimate way I am as little against sport as my hon. Friend is, but I am against that old abuse of game preserving which, I hope, has been put an end to by the Act of 1880. We have got rid of that enormous stock of hares kept up at that time, and I hope we shall not be allowed to return to that state of things under this or any other measure. I am extremely glad to hear what my hon. Friend has said in regard to coursing, and certainly not for such a purpose should we keep up the stock of hares in the country. I have no hostility whatever to keeping up a fair head of game, either of hares or any other kind of game, so long as this is done under conditions not injurious to the farming interest on small holdings, but I do object to a man being deprived of the right—of what was made an inalienable right by the Act of 1880—of doing what he likes on his own land for the protection of his own crops. It is because this Bill invades that principle that I am hostile to it. Now, I will say a word or two upon the operation of the Bill as affecting small landholders. I do not care about the large farmers, though I am glad to hear they are so prosperous that they do not care how many hares there are on their land. I am not concerned about such farmers as he in the story who, having had three days' hunting and two days' coursing, did not know how to occupy the sixth day. Not for the large farmers am I at all solicitous. We live in days when everybody is or professes to be in favour of the increase of the number of small holdings, even the Minister for Agriculture is now in favour of this principle. And how is this Bill going to operate as regards small holdings? I do not see the hon. Member for the Bordesley division present, who should be ready to protect the right of the small holder to protect his crops. We all hope or profess to hope that there will be a large increase in the class of petit cultivateurs, who will rear little crops of cabbages, carrots, cauliflowers, peas, and other produce by which they will turn a few shillings to aid them in the struggle for existence. Suppose a hare or two should get among these crops in the night just now when it is proposed to create a close time, and when after a dismal winter we are waiting to see the first blades shoot from the ground. There is no living creature that will discover the first appearance of crops sooner than the vagrant hare, and you are actually going at the very time when hopes of agriculturists are rising with the early growth, to prevent a man from killing the animal who is ready to commence its depredations. A more monstrous and absurd proposal it is impossible to conceive. If this Bill passes its Second Reading I shall propose an Amendment that every holder of 20 acres or under shall have the right to protect his crops; it is not a question of gardens, but of small holdings; and another Amendment I shall again propose, that no man shall be sent to prison for killing a hare on his own land for the protection of his own

crops. A greater scandal on the administration of justice was never exhibited than the sending a man to prison for an offence of that character. I look at this matter from the point of view of the small holder—pro aris et focis—and not from the view of the country squire educated at Eton who rendered the phrase "for his hares and foxes," which perhaps to some country gentlemen have the importance the ancient Roman attached to aris et focis. But depend upon it, there is a very strong feeling on this subject among small holders. I regard myself as a law-abiding man, yet I should certainly form a sinking fund to provide for the fines for my right to kill hares in defence of my own crops. There are others who may not be able to pay the pecuniary penalty, and are they to be sent to prison because in defending their crops against the depredations of hares they infringe a regulation of a County Council? I learn from this Bill that it is proposed to impose a penalty of 20s., and I am sure a magistrate's clerk must have suggested the words "and costs." Somehow they always manage to make the costs considerably exceed the fine. It is a practice against which, while I was at the Home Office, I laboured almost in vain. A fine of 2s. 6d. or 3s. may carry with it costs of 15s. or 20s.; therefore, it comes to this: that a man who destroys a hare devouring his crops may be fined 40s. or sent to prison, under this Bill. That is a sort of legislation you think will commend itself to small holders throughout the country? The Parliament of 1880 would not have it, and it will be a measure of the distinction between the Parliament of 1880 and the present, if this Bill is passed now. My hon. Friend has referred again to what I have said as to the operation of the Game Laws, and I attach great importance to that. I do believe that the Act of 1880 had no better effect than what it achieved in this—that it kept the gamekeeper a great deal off the land of the occupier. Formerly he was always there, and was regarded very much as a spy, and very often as a tyrant. I remember once in Yorkshire—a county to which, with my hon. Friend, I belong—talking with a farmer soon after the passing of the Act of 1880, and the farmer said—

"It is a very good thing in the Bill, Sir, that the keeper will now have to condemn us instead of inculc us."

That is a very favourable change in the relations between them, that the keeper has to pay some consideration to the occupier if he wants to preserve his game. Now my hon. Friend says, how will this Bill interfere with a keeper going on a man's land? Well, there are many lands on which there are no partridges or pheasants, and these can take care of themselves; but the gamekeeper in looking after hares in close time will be brought back on the land in a manner that I believe will be very objectionable. I do not know what is going to be the fortune of this Bill, and I must say that having a Minister for Agriculture, I think he ought to be here during a discussion of this kind. My hon. Friend has referred to the "Wild Birds" Act by which the decision of Quarter Sessions requires the sanction of the Executive Government through the Home Secretary, and that is a very proper provision, and I do not think that in a matter of this kind affecting the agricultural interests and the conditions of social life in the country, we should be without the opinion of the Minister for Agriculture. For my part I retain my opinion and am as strongly opposed to the Bill as ever I was. There is nothing I have seen during the last ten years with so much satisfaction as the marked diminution of crime throughout the country. Look at our criminal statistics and our prison returns. There are fewer people in prison and this is due to many causes, and is a satisfactory feature of our time. Well, it should be a warning to us not to create artificial offences. Conceive what happens to a man if he comes under the operation of a Bill such as this which creates what I call an artificial offence. He gets sent to prison, and his wife and children are ruined by it. He is a marked man ever after, for he has been imprisoned. But will you persuade that man or can you convince anybody that it is an offence in the sight of God or man deserving imprisonment, that a man has killed a hare on his own land? You cannot—it is not in the nature of things that you can. My hon. Friend, and those who support this Bill, cannot have given sufficient consideration to these things. Conceive the possible effects of this Bill.

If one man is sent to prison for killing a hare in close time, do you think that all the sport you can have can compensate for the evil done in that way, for the evil spirit you will have raised through the consciousness of injustice suffered, by the creation into an offence of an act which is not an offence, and for the purpose of promoting an amusement which, in itself, I do not condemn? You ought to be extremely careful of the consequences of legislation of this kind. One of the great causes of the diminution in crime is that there are not now those convictions for poaching offences which some 10 or 20 years ago were a reproach to the country. The Game Laws produced evils of the gravest character. I do not envy the feelings of that man on whose estate, and owing to over preservation, a murder has taken place in a poaching affray. The change that has taken place in this direction, I am happy to think, is due to the Act of 1880. Other causes have operated, no doubt, but do not let us, while we are talking of improving the conditions of life for small holders in the country, do anything by inconsiderate, not to say selfish, legislation of this kind, which may tend to restore a state of things we are all glad has ceased to exist. If people want to preserve hares they can do so, but if they do not want to preserve hares any penal legislation to compel that preservation will bring with it greater evils than any advantage that can possibly be gained. I entreat the House to consider this matter most carefully, and to reflect whether it is worth while to pass a Bill of this character, the benefits of which must, in any case, be comparatively small, but the social evils of which may be of the gravest kind. (2.0.)

hares. But such holdings would come naturally under the head of small gardens, which are exempted from the Bill. He also talked about a man doing what he likes with his own. I would remind him, however, of the Wild Birds Protection Act, under which a farmer near the sea would be prohibited from shooting at a flock of birds settling on his crops. The right hon. Gentleman is very anxious to protect men with small holdings. On Friday last, before I came up from Yorkshire, a yeoman of the old school, who owns about 50 or 60 acres, came to me and asked me to do what I could for this Bill. He told me that on the previous day he had seen the shepherd of a neighbouring farmer shoot two hares which came on to his ground and died there, and they were both does full of young. I myself farm nearly 1,000 acres in Yorkshire, and so I know pretty well what damage is done by hares, and it amounts to very little. Rabbits do a great deal of damage. Hares sometimes stand on their hind legs and eat off the shoots of young trees, but, with this exception, I consider them very harmless animals. One hon. Member said he would not oppose the Bill if it were directed against selling alone. He must bear in mind that the sale of young animals which are not fit for food takes place usually in public houses, and they are generally paid for in drink. No poulterer would buy a hare that is heavy with young or giving suck. The small holders in Yorkshire are among the men who are most anxious for the passage of this Bill, and I shall certainly go into the Lobby in its favour.

(2.20.) MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): As a representative of an agricultural constituency, I shall give this Bill my vote. I have listened to the very long and somewhat discursive speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. I suppose that, inasmuch as certain public matters do not appear to him to be of such vital importance as they used to be, he has spent the Recess in studying the provisions of this Bill, and I cannot help thinking he has discovered a great deal more in it than its promoters imagine to be there. He has declared that the Bill is an indication of an opinion on our part that what we regard as the agricultural depression is a mere myth, and that all the farmers want is more hares. He said that under this Bill, if passed, farmers would see their turnip crops gradually disappearing. He forgot, however, that under the Bill the farmer, or anyone else, could snare, or kill, or trap a hare during the month in which the turnip crop exists; unless, indeed, in Hampshire, agriculture is conducted differently from what it is in the rest of England. The two points on which the Division will shortly be taken are these: Is it true that under the existing legislation hares are, in many parts of the country, nearly extinct, and do the people who will be most affected by this Bill desire it? The right hon. Gentleman denies that in many parts of the country hares are nearly extinct. Respecting my own district, I can assert positively that a hare is now a very rare animal. Where formerly there were 50 there is now one. In the Island of Sheppey, which forms part of my constituency, the farmers combine to preserve hares for coursing purposes, and to shoot a hare there would be considered as great a crime as to shoot a fox in hunting counties. I believe that the reason why farmers do not generally preserve hares is that they find it difficult to combine, and they shoot those they find on their land because they think if they do not someone else will. I shall vote for the Second Reading, believing that the Measure is desired by the agricultural population and that it will be beneficial and useful.

(2.26.) MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I understood the hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the Second Reading to say that a large number of Petitions, numerous signed, have been presented in favour of the Bill, as contrasted with only one signature against it. I do not know when those Petitions were presented, but I find that during the present Session there have been only two presented in its favour, with 94 signatures.

COLONEL DAWNAY: I said when the Bill was first brought in five years ago.

MR. H. J. WILSON: I wonder the hon. and gallant Gentleman does not see what conclusion should be drawn from that. In past time there was a degree of feeling in favour of this Bill, but now that feeling has passed away, and during the present Session there have been only two small Petitions in support of it. Surely if it had been thought that hares were becoming extinct there would have been a general outcry. Farmers find that hares which have been preserved on their neighbours' lands descend upon them and devour their crops, doing enormous mischief. The hon. and gallant Gentleman said that Lord Durham had no difficulty in the mining district in Durham in preserving hares. Of course, if the population is unanimously in favour of preserving hares there would be no difficulty, but if not why should you pass a Bill which would enable hares to feed on the crops of those who do not desire it? The hon. and gallant Gentleman said he had received a communication from the Society of Advocates in Aberdeen in favour of the Bill, but I do not think he has shown that there is much popular sympathy with it. Statements are made upon this point which vary considerably. I remember that it used to be said that two hares would eat as much as one sheep, and nowadays when we hear so much about the absolute necessity of avoiding any interference with the food of the people, we find that hon. Gentlemen opposite have no hesitation in supporting a Bill which will have the injurious effect on the food of the country which has already been described. In my opinion the time of day for this sort of thing is past, and that if people owning or occupying land in any particular district desire to preserve hares for any purpose there is no difficulty in the way of their doing so, as has been pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. We, however, object to the passage of a Bill which will have the effect of producing an additional number of ground game at the cost of a far more than proportionate value of the people's food.

*(2.30.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Hallam, Sheffield): I wish to speak in the interests of those who may be designated as the moor-edge farmers, who will be specially affected by the passage of this Bill. A very large portion of my constituency extends up to the moor-edge in a large agricultural and pastoral district, and I may say that, speaking solely in my individual capacity, and as the mouthpiece of my own constituency, but not in any sense as representing the Government, I shall support the Bill in compliance with the urgent representations I have received. I wish to emphasise the fact that I do so in the interests of the humbler classes—the small moor edge farmers and the working men in the adjoining town, who follow the ancient, wholesome English practice of hunting the hare with harriers, following them on foot. The records of the organisation of packs of hounds for this purpose goes back for centuries, and the sport is regarded as ancient, honourable, and wholesome. Having regard to the urgent representations that have been made to myself, I cannot believe that the farmers in the constituency of the last speaker, which adjoins my own, wish to see the Bill defeated. These farmers think that a close time for hares is the only thing that will save their sport. There are two things which they say—first, that the sale of immature hares goes on in consequence of the absence of the close time, a fact which I recommend to the appreciative attention of the House in view of the circumstance that the Bill contains no clause dealing with the sale of hares. In the second place, they say that though the farmer has the fullest right to spare hares during the proposed close season, an unfortunate effect of the Act of 1880 is the production of a belief that hares are common property, and that any one may go anywhere and kill them as freely as he pleases. It was not foreseen that this would lead to the gradual extinction of the females during the proposed close season, and that this would involve the extinction of the sport. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has very properly invited the attention of the House to the case of the small men. It is on behalf of the small men that I now speak, and I cannot think the resources of draftsmanship would be unable to amend the Bill so as to meet the cases of farmers whose crops are being destroyed by the over-preservation of hares. If that objection were got rid of, there does not seem to be any other objection to the Bill which could not be dealt with in Committee. It may be right to give to County Councils such a discretion as was given to a Government Department with respect to wild birds; but the absence of a controlling authority in a State Department is no reason for objecting to the principle of the Bill. The right hon. Member for Derby asked whether masters of harriers had any difficulty in finding hares. It may be they have no such difficulty in the neighbourhood of the New Forest; but the smaller and humbler classes on the moor edge have sent me here to say that they do have great difficulty in finding hares. The House may judge from the absence of Ministers from the Treasury Bench that the Government will view the passing of the Bill in a philosophic spirit; and for myself I hope the House will give a Second Reading to a Bill the principle of which is that a tenant shall have the same rights as a landlord in ground game, and neither more nor less.

(2.36.) MR. C. WILSON (Kingston-on-Hull): I desire to say a few words for the purpose of explaining why I regard this Bill as a measure of a reactionary character. It has been said that the measure has the almost unanimous approval of the farmers of this country; but, for my part, I can hardly believe that you could get a meeting of the farming interest in any large agricultural district at which, if the question were put as to whether those present were in favour of this Bill or not, the unanimous vote of the farming interest would not be raised against it. [Several hon. MEMBERS: No, no.] Hon. Members say "No," but I have had a considerable amount of experience, and possess a certain amount of knowledge of what are the opinions of the farmers on this game question, and I maintain that my opinion is correct. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has made a somewhat lengthened speech on the subject, and has gone into almost every detail connected with the question. To my mind, at any rate, the arguments he has adduced against the Bill are such as it is absolutely impossible to confute. Perhaps the arguments which of all others would have most weight with me is that this Bill in reality proposes to create a new sort of crime or offence that will tend to bring the agricultural population under the ban of the law. To my mind, even if one man in a village should be convicted and punished for an offence under this Bill, that would be almost in itself a sufficient argument against the Bill. If it be true that a larger number of hares is wanted in different parts of the country, that is a matter which depends very largely on the good feeling of the farmers. If the farmers consider it to their advantage that hares should be preserved they have the means of keeping them up, the hardship resulting from the increase of ground game is one which is undoubtedly felt more keenly by those occupying the small holdings than by the occupiers of the larger and wealthier farms. If the farmers are to be deprived of the means of guarding themselves against the heavy damage which may otherwise be done to their crops at such a season as this, the result may be almost the entire ruin of the poorer class of agriculturists. We see, however, now that the question is being fully argued, that hon. Members on the opposite side of the House are ready almost as a solid body to support this measure, though I trust that on this side we shall find very few who are willing to vote for it. I think I have seen it stated in the public Press that the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has introduced this Bill does not propose to stand again for a seat in Parliament. Therefore his action in this matter may be of little moment with regard to his constituency, but I very much doubt whether several hon. Members who are supporting this Bill will not find when they go before their constituencies in the agricultural districts that those electors will take a very different view of what is for the benefit of the agricultural interests from that which is taken on the other side of the House. There can be little doubt that any good landlord who is desirous of preserving ground game can easily obtain the good will of his tenants, and thus obtain as many hares as he may desire. My own experience is that such, as a rule, is the good nature of the tenant farmers that they would rather suffer from an excess of game than willingly disoblige their landlords. One of the difficulties which has to be faced in dealing with this question is that of selling hares out of season. We know that there is a large and constant importation of foreign hares from Russia, Hungary, and Germany. They are brought here in considerable quantities, and sold at very reasonable rates. Only last week the question was brought before the Hull Chamber of Commerce, and a serious complaint was made against the passing of a Bill making it illegal to sell game at this season, because such a measure would have the effect of depriving a portion of the population of a cheap article of food. It must be remembered that times have greatly changed in regard to the means of furnishing food for the people. Communication between this country and the Continent is now so rapid that we can obtain game from Norway, Sweden, Russia, and other countries by steam vessels which bring that game to us at the cheapest rates. This sort of thing did not exist in former years. One of the arguments in favour of this Bill is that it will increase the food of the people. The tendency of legislation of this kind is in the opposite direction. It imposes restrictions on the importation of food, and is a Protectionist measure which operates against the commoner. Foreign game is extremely cheap. At the Hull Chamber of Commerce, two or three days since, one of the members made a long statement on the subject. He said in the Port of Hull alone he had imported 89,000 head of game—partridges, ptarmigans, hares, and black game. Ptarmigans cost 1s. 8d. a brace; partridges, 2s. and 2s. 6d.; hares, 1s. 3d. to 3s. All this game was distributed in a perfectly sound condition. The tendency of all legislation of this sort is to interfere with the natural course of trade, and it is a false argument to say that it would increase the source of food, because the Bill would prohibit the sale of hares during the close season, and in consequence would prohibit the sale of foreign game at the same time. I am of opinion that we have a great deal too much legislation of this kind. I believe that this is altogether a retrograde measure; and if the farmers were canvassed, I have not the slightest doubt that the enormous majority of them would be found opposed to the Bill.

(2.50.) SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I was one of those responsible for the Ground Game Act of 1880, and I should like now to explain why I am going to vote for this Bill. My right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, as the author of that Act, was entitled to object to this measure passing into law. But I think we ought to take into consideration this fact, that we have now had 11 years' experience of the Act of 1880, and have had an opportunity of seeing the effect of its provisions. I believe my right hon. Friend has opposed this Bill mainly in the interests of the tenant farmer, and in that view I entirely concur. I do not think this is a question in which the interests of the landlord ought at all to be considered. I do not think that objectionable person, the shooting tenant, ought at all to be considered. The only persons who I think are entitled to any consideration are the tenant farmers directly, and the public in a minor degree. In that view we have to determine whether this Bill should become law or not. With that object I have endeavoured to ascertain the opinion of the persons chiefly concerned, and I declare that of the scores of farmers whose opinion I asked, I found not one but would, if he had the opportunity, vote in favour of this Bill. [Sir W. HARCOURT: No.] The right hon. Gentleman must have seen a different class of tenant farmers to those I saw. In 1880 the tenant farmer had no interest whatever in the hares; they belonged to the landowner except under very peculiar conditions, and never belonged to the tenant farmer. For 11 years the hares have belonged as much to the tenants as to the owners. The object of the Act of 1880 was to prevent the evil of excessive ground game, and under that measure the tenant farmers have had the right to destroy it, and certainly, so far as hares are concerned, the tenant farmer has the remedy in his own hands. Having that right he is perfectly satisfied. It is said by my hon. Friend the Member for Hull that he can preserve if he likes. He cannot do so, because no tenant farmer could exercise the right of preserving without affecting the whole district. And I would say that this taking of the female hare is a brutal act, besides which the hares are in such a condition that they are not fit for human food in many instances.

MR. H. J. WILSON: Why should not the buyer distinguish?

SIR H. JAMES: How many buyers could decide which hare among a large consignment is or is not fit for human food? But, apart from the right to shoot, given by the Act of 1880, many tenant farmers by a good understanding with their landlords, and all owners, have the right to take, and for the purpose of coursing in closed grounds—a sport which I do not assume is commendable—is worth 15s., a sum which is constantly realised. I know what would be said to hon. Members opposite at any farmers' ordinary or agricultural meeting if they voted against this Bill. Not one of them but knows there is a strong feeling in the agricultural districts in favour of this Bill. It seems to be the Borough Members and not the County Members who are against the measure, and the constituencies of the Borough Members have no opportunity of knowing what has been the effect of the Act of 1880. I am very glad to see that my right hon. Friend's position did not meet with a complete echo from his usual supporters. I find the name of that veteran sportsman the Member for Swansea on the back of the Bill, and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Durham and the hon. Member for St. Pancras, the latter of whom generally shows strong Liberal tendencies, are also responsible for this Bill, by the success of which I feel sure the tenant farmers would be gratified.

*(259.) MR. A. PEASE (York): The hon. Member for Hull said that if the farmers were canvassed their votes would be found unanimously against this measure. In the district of Cleveland a tenant farmer who neither shot, hunted with barriers, or coursed, undertook to ascertain the opinion of the tenant farmers there, and in only one instance was there any opposition to a close time. I regard this Bill entirely as a farmer's Bill. Large landowners will always have an opportunity of preserving hares on their estate, but many a small farmer who desires to have a few hares on his holding may be deprived of them through the conduct of one ill-natured man. There was one portion of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby with which I sympathised warmly, and that was the part in which he pointed out the tendency in the Bill to bring the gamekeeper on the land of the tenant farmer. I believe that the gamekeeper is often a nuisance to the tenant farmer, and I should, if I thought the Bill would lead to the intervention of the gamekeeper, vote against it. But I do not believe it will have that effect. I look on the Bill as placing in the hands of the County Council a very desirable power. If we have any confidence in that body we have sufficient to justify us in entrusting it with a matter of this sort. For my part, I am quite content to place this matter in the hands of the people, feeling confident that they will deal justly with all classes of the community.

(3.3.) SIR F. T. MAPPIN (York, W.R., Hallamshire): This is a matter in which the general public are said to have a deep interest. Now I have had no communication from any of my constituents on the subject, and I feel satisfied that had they entertained any strong opinions on it they would have applied to their Parliamentary Representative. Gentlemen who support this Bill desire to have the state of things renewed which existed before the Bill of 1880 was passed. If they succeed in their object there will be a great outcry not only from the tenant farmers, but from all the landed classes except those who enjoy the sport of killing hares. Anyone who has had large experience in preserving game knows well it is not merely the corn and turnips consumed which constitute the great loss; they know that hares do an immense amount of damage by treading down the barley field. Again, as we have been told by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, since 1880 the tenant farmers have experienced much less trouble and annoyance from the gamekeepers, and we certainly ought not to desire to re-introduce the friction which existed before 1880. I therefore hope that the House will not assent to this Bill being read a second time.

(3.5.) MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I do not think that any justification has been shown for this Bill. Has it been proved that a decrease has occurred in the number of hares since the Bill of 1880 was passed? There is, in fact, a total absence of statistics on the point. This is an attempt by a side wind to do away with the benefits arising under the Act of 1880, and it is not an honest, straightforward endeavour to repeal that Act. The Bill itself is full of anomalies. Are we to understand that one County Council may fix one close time for hares, and the adjoining County Council a different close time? May one County Council adopt this Act and another refuse to enforce it? Is there to be a close time for hares and not for leverets? This Bill will create new offences; it will make that an offence not only to kill hares, but to do anything with the intention of killing a hare. I say that all these anomalies arise from the fact that this is an attempt by a side wind to do away with the benefits which have undoubtedly accrued to the tenant farmer from the Game Act of 1880.

(3.9.) SIR J. KINLOCH (Perth, E.): I wish to know if allotments and nursery gardens are to be excluded from the operation of the Bill? The answer to that question will influence the votes of a good many hon. Members.

COLONEL DAWNAY, interposing, said: I intend in Committee to move a new clause expressly providing that the Bill is not to apply in cases where a hare or leveret has been killed, wounded, or taken inside a nursery or other garden.

SIR J. KINLOCH: How about allotments and small holdings?

COLONEL DAWNAY: I will consider that point.

SIR J. KINLOCH: I should like that point to be clearly explained. There are many small holdings and allotments in the country, and the occupiers of them ought to have some means of protecting themselves. I have known cases in which hares have in the course of one night destroyed half an acre of cabbages, and, unless the Bill provides for such cases, it cannot be satisfactory.

(3.10.) MR. HOYLE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood): I wish to draw attention to the Preamble of the Bill, which says that hares form an important article of food, and that owing to their marketable value it is important to provide for their protection during the breeding season. There is no question more important than that of the supply of food to our ever-increasing population; but the evidence adduced before two Select Committees of this House on the Game Laws conclusively proved that there is great loss in the production of this kind of food; and Mr. Clare Sewell Read, who will, I suppose, be accepted as an authority on the subject, told the second Committee that hares cost from two to three times as much as they are worth when they are killed, so that to produce hares worth 10s. costs £1 or 30s. On that ground, and on that ground alone, I think this Bill ought to be opposed. I represent a constituency 75 per cent. of whose food is imported, and it is a matter of vast moment to them that nothing shall be done to hinder a free supply of food. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury said that one farmer would destroy all the game in a district. But surely he would only destroy that on his own farm.

SIR H. JAMES: Hares travel.

MR. HOYLE: True, they travel to where the food is best; so that if a farmer is more skilful than his neighbours—if he grows a better and more nutritious kind of food he will be the sufferer, for he will provide the food for the hares. The fact that hares do travel will make against the successful enforcement of the Bill by the County Councils: one County Council may order a close time for hares and another may not. It was proved in evidence before the Select Committee that hares will travel four miles in one night to their food and then go back to their seat. One witness, a farmer, told the Committee that one severe winter hares had travelled that distance to a field in which his turnips were stacked, and the result was that the whole of his crop was destroyed. What I wish to point out is, that instead of this Bill tending to increase the food supply of this country it will have the contrary effect. Every vote given in favour of the Bill will, in the large cities and boroughs, be interpreted as a vote for destroying food which should be devoted to the support of the people.

(3.15.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I have no wish to delay the Division, but I desire to press the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for East Perth, as the answer to that will determine our attitude towards the Bill. The big farmers can look after themselves, and, as far as I have been able to discover, they are in favour of the Bill, rightly or wrongly. But I am one of those who believe in the growth of small holdings. We know that hares are very destructive to cottager's gardens and allotments, and I want to know what the hon. and gallant Member opposite means by the vague term "garden." If he merely means nurseries, then in the interests of those who cannot defend themselves I shall vote against the Bill. The large farmer is able to defend and protect himself; it is the small holder who requires to be protected in this matter, and if the hon. and gallant Member who moved the Second Reading of the Bill will say frankly and plainly that he will exclude from the Measure all holdings not exceeding five acres, I will vote for it. Otherwise I shall vote against the Bill, and I would urge hon. Members who are in favour of small holdings to consider the enormous damage that may be done to this small class of people if the Bill is passed without some such protection as that to which I have referred.

*(3.17.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I shall oppose the Bill, for as far as I can gather there is no demand whatever for it except on the part of sporting men. The statement in the Preamble of the Bill as to the Measure being in favour of the food supply of the country is, I believe, absolutely incorrect. The food supply has nothing at all to do with the Bill, and I have the means of knowing this. I represent in the London Common Council one of the largest wards in the Metropolis, and a ward in which many of the great markets are situated, and directly any question arises affecting the food supply of the people the representatives of the ward are at once approached by those who conduct the markets. But neither last Session nor this have I received from those people any inquiry about, or demand for, this Bill, though, when the Possession of Game Bill was before Parliament, they immediately called on their representatives to oppose the Measure because it was prejudicial to the food supply of the country. Therefore, if this Bill were in favour of the food supply, as it purports to be, those connected with the largest markets of the country would have immediately requested hon. Members to support it on that ground alone. In the absence of such evidence I am justified in repeating that the Bill has really nothing to do with the food supply of the nation. All the arguments that have been urged in favour of the Bill have been more or less on sporting grounds, especially that form of sporting known as coursing. I know of no more cruel sport than coursing, which is kept up simply for purposes of betting and gambling, and if for no other reason than this I shall consider it to be my duty to oppose the Bill. We have been told that farmers want the Bill, but as far as my experience goes—and I have been about the country to some extent—I have found that the farmers have always opposed the keeping of hares altogether, because they are against the agricultural interest. It is all very well to say that the county Members are all in favour of the Bill. We know that they do not always have regard for the interests of the tenant farmers as was proved by their action on the Tithe Bill. I trust that after the able speech of the right hon. Gentleman the member for Derby, those who desire to promote agricultural interests will feel it their duty to vote against the Second Reading of the Bill. At any rate on the grounds I have mentioned I shall vote against the Bill, and I am sure that in doing so I shall be acting in the best interests of the farmers of the three Kingdoms.

RELIGIOUS EQUALITY BILL.—(No. 19.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(3.35) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): In moving the Second Reading of this Bill, I do not propose to trouble the House with many remarks. If I may judge from the interest taken in the question of the attendance of Registrars at marriages of Nonconformists, the principle embodied in this Bill is ripe for settlement. Already a Bill relating to the attendance of Registrars at the marriages of Nonconformists, introduced by a Conservative Member, has reached the Committee stage, and I apprehend that the only question is, how the object and principle of the measure is to be carried out. The object of this Bill, so far as the question of Registrars is concerned, is identical to that of the Bill to which I have just referred, and, therefore, I think I may fairly claim approval of my Bill in that respect. I have been reproached or taken to task by some friends of mine for not proceeding in the matter of Registrars upon wholly different lines. It has been suggested to me it would have been better if, instead of permitting marriages in all cases to take place without the presence of a Registrar, I had provided that the attendance of a Registrar should be compulsory at all marriages. The reason why I did not find myself able to proceed upon that line was that I have brought in this measure for the purpose of removing a grievance suffered by a large section of my constituents. An instance has been brought under my notice of a bridal party coming to a chapel in the town of Camborne for the purpose of having the marriage ceremony performed, and being compelled to wait for over an hour while the Registrar was found. I have come to the conclusion that the simplest way of obviating such inconvenience in the future is to dispense with the presence of the Registrar altogether at marriages. I propose that the regulation laid down in respect to the Nonconformist denomination shall apply also to the Church of England, and it is because I am endeavouring to assimilate the law in respect to all denominations that I use so large and general a title to my Bill as the Religious Equality Bill. I think the House will agree with me that it is better in the interests of Christianity and of the different denominations, that all these causes of friction should be swept away, and that we should, where no privileges are infringed, or even where unjust privileges are infringed, endeavour to place different classes of Christians on an equal footing. I hope Members on both sides of the House will, therefore, accept the principle of the Bill. I think the view I have taken will commend itself to those who are more particularly associated with the Church of England, because, although I cannot see the reason for it, I can undoubtedly appreciate the point of view of those who are closely associated with the Church of England respecting the attendance of a civil officer at their religious ceremonies. In the proposal I make I offer relief to all the clergy of the Church of England, and impose no onerous burden on them in any sense. I propose to relieve them from the duty which I should imagine to be a more or less burdensome one of keeping registers in the parish churches. I do not say they shall not keep them, if they think it desirable, but I propose to require that the register shall be kept by duly appointed civil officials, and that the clergy shall be relieved of all liability in connection therewith. The machinery I propose is this: the certificate or licence for marriage having been issued in the first instance by the Registrar, the parties will go to the church or chapel with such a certificate or licence and hand it to the officiating clergyman or minister, who will fill it up according to the properly authorised form. It will be signed by the clergyman or minister, the parties to the marriage, and at least two witnesses, and sent by the clergyman or minister in a registered envelope, free of charge, to the Superintendent Registrar of the district. There are, of course, certain provisions for the prevention of fraud and the prevention of unauthorised marriages, and so on. I do not say the Bill is perfect in these particulars, but they do not affect the principle of the measure. I may say, however, that one provision is that when a certificate or licence has been issued by the Superintendent Registrar it shall not be valid for more than three calendar months. The second part of the Bill relates to the Amendment of the Burial Law, but only one of its provisions embodies any considerable departure from the present law. I take it that the question of the reduction of the notice from 48 hours to 24 hours is one of detail which will not be a matter of religious controversy. The reason for such a provision is that in many years it is very difficult to give so long a notice as 48 hours, and in some cases of disease it may be really a matter of sanitary regulation that the length of notice should be reduced. Sub-section 4 provides for an extended period of the day during which burials may take place. At present they cannot take place after 3 o'clock. I propose that they shall be allowed to take place up to sunset. As to Sub-section 5, dealing with the question of fees, the Nonconformists feel it to be a great grievance that when they bury their dead they should have to pay the fees, not to their own minister who performs the ceremony, but to the clergyman of the parish church, who has nothing whatever to do with it. I should not object to an Amendment giving the Nonconformist minister half the fees. By Sub-section 6 I have endeavoured to alter the law in favour of Nonconformists in a few small matters, such as permission to have the church bell tolled, and to have the use of planks, &c., and the aid of the officials of the Church in connection with burials. Then there is a provision that if any representative of a deceased person has been buried in the graveyard of a Church, and the representatives of a relative desire that his body should be buried in the same place, this shall be permitted, although he is not resident in the same parish. It may be suggested that non-parishioners have no recognised right to burial in the parish churchyard, and therefore the present law, which permits a clergyman to refuse to allow a Nonconformist minister to take part in the service in such a case, is perfectly reasonable. But a case has occurred in the last few weeks in the City of Truro, which shows what scandal and annoyance may arise from the present provisions of the law. On the 13th of February last a lady was buried in the graveyard of St. Mary's parish, Truro. The custodian of the burial ground is the Rev. Canon Burt, sub-dean of the Cathedral of Truro; and, although the lady was a Wesleyan, Canon Burt refused to allow the Rev. W. H. Thompson, the resident superintendent of the district, to take any part in the service, solely on the ground, as stated in the Press and not contradicted, that the lady at the time of her death was not residing within the limits of the parish to which the graveyard belonged, although she had resided for 40 years within the limits of the parish. Her father had been one of the ministers appointed at Truro when the Wesleyan Chapel of St. Mary's parish was built, and two of her sons are at the present time Wesleyan ministers. A great deal of ill-feeling has been occasioned by this refusal of Canon Burt, who, being a new comer, may perhaps be excused for not understanding the strong feeling which prevails in the district. The irritation has been intensified by the refusal of Canon Burt at a Vestry meeting to allow any reference to be made to the subject, on the flimsy pretext that no notice had been given of the intention to bring it forward. I have only to add, that although this lady whose burial was the occasion of this dispute was not at the time of her death a resident within the boundaries of the parish, her place of residence was within a stone's throw, she having removed from one part of the street to another, which was some 200 or 300 yards beyond the parish boundary. The refusal, therefore, was an arbitrary act, to say the least of it, because this lady was living within the limits of the city. She had not removed to a distant part of the country, but was living close to the parish within which she had lived for 40 years, and in the graveyard of which parish her nearest and dearest relatives had been buried. I think it will be agreed this was an unnecessary and unfortunate raising of religious prejudices and animosities, and it is desirable that such should not occur under the law of this country. I have no doubt that other Members can bring forward cases illustrating this point, and in justification of such a provision as this I have referred to and contained in Sub-section 3 of Clause 15. This, I propose, with a sincere desire to put an end to such cases of unseemly strife between members of the same religion, though of different denominations. For this purpose I ask to be allowed to move the Second Reading of a Bill, the principle of which I hope that the House on reflection may be disposed to accept.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Conybeare.)

*[4.4.] MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): I rise to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months, and in doing so it is not my intention to trouble the House with a elaborate argument, for I think I can show in a very few words that the provisions of the Bill are not such as the House can possibly accept at the mere suggestion of the hon. Member. My primary objection is to the title of the Bill as being altogether misleading, it does not indicate the contents. It is called a Bill for Promoting Religious Equality, a high-sounding title indeed. Religious equality, no doubt, is a subject of grave importance, but it is hardly to be dealt with, I think, by the removal of a grievance under which the hon. Member says Nonconformists suffer in the county he represents. To bring about religious equality in its full sense, of course we must do a great deal more than the hon. Member proposes in his Bill. We must disestablish the Church of England in the first place, and we must provide for an alteration in the law which requires that the Sovereign of this Kingdom shall be a member of the Church. No one from the title would suppose that the Bill is to remove a particular grievance such as the hon. Member has alluded to. If the hon. Member wishes to secure religious equality let him go to the root of the whole matter and bring forward a proposition for disestablishing the Church of England, and see what the House thinks of that. For my part, I doubt if religious equality can ever be secured, but, at any rate, it cannot be accomplished by this Bill. So far as the Bill relates to the marriage grievance and the attendance of Registrars, upon which there is a great deal to be said, that surely is a matter upon which we are hardly entitled to enter here, for there is before the House a Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Lincolnshire (Mr. Atkinson), to which, on the part of the Government, notices of Amendment have been given, notices which exceed the extent of the Bill itself. I only mention this as showing how important the subject is considered by the Government; and if there is a grievance it is desirable should be removed, and if it can be done on fair consideration of all interests, I have not the slightest objection to the removal of that grievance. But this can be done within the four corners of the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Lincolnshire, amended as is proposed by the Government. But to suppose that this Bill will accomplish the great object indicated by the title is an entire delusion, and though the country might well be startled on seeing the record of this Wednesday's proceedings, and on being informed that the House of Commons had resolved upon religious equality—because a Bill for that object, introduced by the hon. Member for Camborne, has been read a second time—I think a very little examination will show that the title is delusive. Then, to follow up those objections which begin with the title of the Bill, I find the first clause covers the whole of the churches and chapels in the Kingdom, and the Registrar is to affix a notice on all the buildings where marriages may be solemnised. Now, I do not think we want such notices stuck up on all our ancient churches that people may know that therein marriages may be solemnised.

MR. CONYBEARE: I do not mean that in recognised places like churches this should be done, but in chapels of ease. I have seen such notices exhibited.

*MR. J. G. TALBOT: That disposes of that point. And then I come to Clause 5, which proposes that the legal hour for marriage shall be extended to five o'clock. This is, I think, altogether undesirable. Five o'clock means after daylight during part of the year, and this is a perfectly gratuitous change in the law for which, so far as I know, nobody asks. Then I come to what is perhaps a still more important innovation proposed by the Bill, the reduction of the period of notice of funerals required under the Burials Act. On this I may make the preliminary remark that the Burials Act was the result of much discussion in this House, and the outcome of a long and embittered controversy, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Denbigh (Mr. Osborne Morgan) was the hero of that settlement of the question to which my friends and I offered strenuous opposition. But we found ourselves in a minority, and it became the law of the land. I put it to the House now, is it worth while to rake up again the embers of that old controversy? I put it to hon. Members above and below the Gangway, is it worth while from time to time to propose further alterations and irritate the minds of Church people, who had much to bear in that settlement, and have had many grievances, sentimental you may say, to get over? I do not think it is. I think the House will agree with me that the period of notice is not at all too long to allow of the accommodation of arrangements, which are not after all always very convenient. The relations between the clergyman of a parish and Nonconformist ministers are not always of the most friendly character, and it is just possible that Nonconformists, either the minister or the friends of the deceased, taking advantage of the very letter of the law might, under the proposed alteration, give the very minimum of notice and maximum of inconvenience. Again, the proposed alteration in the hours of burial gives so much less time for accommodation of arrangements, and increases the opportunity for friction. In these matters we all desire to avoid, as far as possible, anything that may give rise to religious animosities and friction, and to shorten the period of notice and the interval for making arrangements will increase the possibility of difficulties arising. Then a great objection arises upon the 4th sub-section of Clause 15, which proposes that burials under the principal Act shall be allowed between ten and sunset on any day in the year without exception.

MR. CONYBEARE: The hon. Member will not find the words "on any day" in the Bill. The Bill is subject to the principal Act of 1880, which, I think, excludes certain days. My Bill must be read in conjunction with the Burial Laws Amendment Act.

*MR. J. G. TALBOT: Of course if there are exceptions my objection does not apply in the same degree—

MR. CONYBEARE: I only wish to point out that the hon. Gentleman is reading into the sub-section words that are not in it, and that is hardly fair.

*MR. J. G. TALBOT: Well, I may be mistaken, and I will not press the point until I have referred to the Burials Act. At any rate, the hours for funerals are to be extended to sunset, and this I cannot but think is an uncalled for and undesirable alteration of the terms of settlement arrived at when the Burials Act was passed. Another objection arises on the 5th sub-section by which it is proposed that the burial fees shall no longer be paid to the incumbent, but to the person officiating at the burial. This clearly is a departure from the settlement which Parliament in its wisdom arrived at, and which naturally recognises the receipt of fees as part of the income of the incumbent. By the 3rd sub-section of the 15th clause the Bill provides that—

"Where any relatives of the deceased person have been buried in the graveyard of a particular parish or church, and the person having charge of or being responsible for the burial of the deceased person desires that such person shall be buried in the same place, or where such deceased person has expressed such desire, the burial shall be permitted in such graveyard, notwithstanding that such deceased person was not at the time of decease, or had not been prior thereto resident in the said parish."

I am not quite sure how far the consequences of enacting such a provision as this may extend. It might be that the hon. Member himself having expressed a desire to be buried in Westminster Abbey, and one of his remote ancestors having been interred there, his friends might force such a burial upon an unwilling nation. There is no limit of relationship which may extend far back into the days of our Saxon ancestors. Why not, I say, leave these matters to the arrangements of good sense between the parties interested, why attempt to legislate in this manner, pushing matters to an extreme length? The hon. Member has quoted a case with which I am not familiar, and it appears that the objection of the clergyman was not that the deceased was a Nonconformist, but that she was not a parishioner. If the objection had been on the ground of Nonconformity there might be complaint—

MR. CONYBEARE: It was desired that the service should be performed by a Wesleyan minister, but the clergyman insisted on performing the service himself, and would not allow a Wesleyan minister to do so on the ground that the deceased was not at the time of death resident in the parish.

*MR. J. G. TALBOT: Well, the clergyman was perhaps half right and half wrong. He acted, it may be, injudiciously. I take the facts as the hon. Member presents them, and am not disposed to prejudice the question, but I do not think it can be treated altogether as a Nonconformist grievance. On the consideration of some of the matters with which 'this Bill deals, we have already entered by the Bill of my hon. Friend to which the Attorney General has given notice of serious Amendments. With the Burials Act I think churchmen have gone as far as they should be required to go, and I will be no party to re-opening the settlement arrived at, and raking up the embers of a bitter controversy. The difficulties that may arise may be settled by mutual arrangements, they cannot be satisfactorily removed by any legislation of this kind, and therefore I move the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Talbot.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*(4.24.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): The hon. Gentleman has coupled my name with the settlement of the burials question, and as I had the honour of taking charge of the Burials Act Amendment Bill, I may be allowed to say that there has been no such thing as a settlement of the question. We took all we could get, but it was far from being a settlement, and in many respects the result was most unsatisfactory, it merely touched the fringe of the question; and the best proof I can give that we did regard the Act as something short of a settlement is that within four or five years we brought in an amending Bill and have reintroduced it without success in successive Sessions. I am exceedingly sorry that the Bill coming on unexpectedly I was not present to hear the speech of the Attorney General. [Several hon MEMBERS: He has not spoken.] I beg pardon, I have only just come in, and I had an impression the Attorney General had expressed his opinion. The only part of the Bill with which I am particularly concerned is that which deals with the Burials Act. I have a Bill for the amendment of that Act, which deals with the subject in a more comprehensive manner than this Bill. It proposes, for instance, to abolish the distinction between consecrated and unconsecrated ground, so far as consecration operates as a legal instrument. At the same time, there are parts of this Bill which seem to me to be exceeding useful and necessary. The hon. Gentleman who has just spoken finds fault with the 3rd sub-section of the 15th clause, but something of the kind I hold to be absolutely necessary. At law the incumbent has the right of allowing or of prohibiting the interment of a non-parishioner in the churchyard. That right, however, was given to him, not in the interest of the Church of England, but in the interest of the parish, so that the parishioners should not be crowded out of their own churchyard by non-parishioners. The Burials Act, does not interfere with this right of the incumbent, but it has been found that in many cases the incumbent exercises this power of excluding non-parishioners as a means of imposing as a condition of interment that the non-parishioner, though a Nonconformist, should be buried with the Church of England service. I am sorry to say there have been many such instances in Welsh parishes, and I gather from the speech of the hon. Member who has just sat down that the hon. Member for Camborne cited a case as having occurred in Cornwall. Now, I think, it is only reasonable that there should be some way of preventing an incumbent taking an unfair advantage of a discretion vested in him for a wholly different purpose. As to the melancholy incident referred to in the course of this discussion, I made it the subject of a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and he attempted to justify the action of the incumbent, although he did not justify the refusal to allow the body to be buried without a Church service in the part of the parish churchyard where her husband was buried, which is the real point in the case. That point will be met by the very reasonable provision contained in the Bill. Similarly it is only right that Nonconformists, on paying the burial fees, should have the right to have the bell of the parish church tolled and to have the use of the burial appliances. These are small matters, but they lead to petty insults and ill-feeling. The next section deals with a much more important question, namely, the question of fees for burials in the parish churchyard—and on this subject the Bill is on.

all four with a measure I hope to have the honour of asking the House to read a second time this day four weeks. The demand contained in this section seems to me to be obviously fair and just. It is surely right that the fees for performing the burial service should only be paid to the person who performs it. At present Nonconformists have to pay twice over—once to their own minister and also to the incumbent, even though the latter takes no part in the burial service. The incumbent, therefore, is paid for work he does not perform. I should have thought that the easiest way of deciding this matter would have been to lay down the principle that where there was no work there should be no pay. It seems to me that every one of the provisions of the 15th clause, including the alteration in the hours of burial, are reasonable, and follow the lines of the Bill I have introduced. I shall be curious to hear what possible objection can be taken to any one of these provisions. We have heard the objections of the hon. Member for the University of Oxford, who is a sort of official representative of the Church of England, but I should like to hear what objection the Attorney General can take to the Bill. I refrain from dealing with that part of the Bill bearing upon the question of marriages, but as to the other part, after the most careful attention that I have been able to bestow upon it, I must say that it seems to me to be reasonable and just; and if I have any fault to find with it, it is that it does not cover the whole ground which the question occupies.

(4.35.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I will follow the example of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and will confine my observations to Clause 15, going through its various sub-sections seriatim. The first two sub-sections are of minor importance, dealing merely with the notice required to be given of burials under the Burials Act. It is proposed to reduce the notice of burial to 12 hours. I think that that would be too short a notice and might lead to inconvenience, as there might not be adequate time for the incumbent to give due notice in return that the burial in some cases could not take place at the hour fixed. The hour named by the relatives of the deceased might clash with the period fixed for some other service, of which the relatives might know nothing, or might not be in conformity with the rules of the burial ground. Under the Act of 1880, the incumbent is empowered to say that the hour proposed will not do, or that another day or hour must be appointed, and I am bound to say that that seems to me to be a very reasonable provision. The change proposed would, to my mind, be productive of much more inconvenience than benefit. The next change proposed is one which does not appear to have been exhaustively thought out. It is that where any relative of a deceased person has been buried in a churchyard, and the person having charge of the burial desires that the deceased person shall be buried in such churchyard, or the deceased has expressed a wish to that effect, then such burial shall be permitted in the churchyard, though such deceased person has not been a resident of such parish. It is said that this is necessary because an incumbent in a certain Truro case that was mentioned refused to allow a Wesleyan to be buried in the churchyard, he not being a parishioner, unless upon the condition of the Church of England service being performed. The argument is that the incumbent did not object to the non-parishioner being buried in the parish churchyard, but that he made the fact, that the deceased was a non-parishioner, the ground for insisting that the burial service of the Church of England should be read over the deceased who had been a Wesleyan.

MR. CONYBEARE: I do not wish the facts to be misunderstood. The burial did take place in the churchyard, but Canon Burt refused to allow the Wesleyan minister to officiate and officiated himself.

MR. MATTHEWS: Well, it was obviously open to the relatives of the deceased not to have submitted to the conditions and to have had the burial somewhere else where the Wesleyan minister could attend. It comes to this, that the right of burial in the churchyard was conceded by the incumbent, but he refused to add to that privilege—which was one the law did not require to be given, and to which the family of the deceased had no statutory right—the further privilege of having the Wesleyan service performed. It is not for me to express any opinion as to the good taste or judgment exhibited by the incumbent on that occasion. I do not think I should myself have taken the course followed by him. But if there are cases of this kind—of which I know nothing—the proposed remedy would be far too wide. At present no Church of England non-parishioner has a right to burial in the churchyard. This provision proposes that every Nonconformist non-parishioner shall have such a right, and, therefore, the Bill is not one for bringing about religious equality but religious inequality. ["No."] Well, if it is proposed that every non-parishioner, whatever his religion, shall have the right, surely that is a remedy that is much too large, and one which may be called extravagant and ill judged. The fact that burials in a parish churchyard are confined to parishioners has nothing whatever to do with the question of religion, or religious animosity, or the burial service, but it is founded in public policy. It is necessary to confine these burial places to parishioners, because all the churchyards of the country are rapidly becoming full. The proper remedy, if any were required, would be to take away from the incumbent the right of granting burial in the churchyard to any non-parishioner, for it surely is not desirable to throw the parish churchyard open to all non-parishioners, it may be to the exclusion of the parishioners. The Common Law right of parishioners to have the parish churchyard preserved to them should be maintained. The remedy proposed in the Bill is very much larger than the grievance alleged. The next proposal is one for which one is at loss to find a reason. It is that, instead of hours for burial being fixed as at present from 10 to 6 in summer and from 10 to 3 in winter, the hours should be from 10 to sunset. But the fixed hours are, I think, preferable, as better calculated to secure that the interments shall take place by daylight. I think that it is hardly worth while to alter the Act of 1880 for the matter of so trifling a detail, and I confess that I think it undesirable to make sunset the limit. The next sub-section, dealing with the question of fees, is one which excites every kind of passion in the world sub-lunary, and in the spiritual life. I approach the subject with absolute impartiality. Do let us see what is the equity of the case. The freehold of the churchyard is in the incumbent. It is quite true that in the right and true view of the organisation and discipline of the Church of England he is the freeholder in trust for the parishioners, and the Act of 1880, I think very wisely, has recognised that the incumbent holds it in trust for the Dissenting parishioners as well as for those who conform to the Church of England. But that being admitted, it is inconsistent that on the matter of fees hon. Members should turn round on the incumbent and want to deprive him of that which he receives perhaps as much for breaking the soil in the churchyard as for performing the service. This is not the time to go into the question of the Canon Law on this subject; but I think that if the hon. Member for Camborne will devote some of his unrivalled industry to inquiring into the origin of these immemorial burial fees, he will find that what I say is the case. It certainly would seem to me inconsistent to recognise the incumbent's right to the freehold of the soil—in trust, if you like, for the parishioners—and to refuse him his fees for the breaking of the soil. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Denbighshire says, "No work, no pay."

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I would point out that this sub-section is founded on the recommendation of the Select Committee which sat for several months to consider the whole question of burial fees.

MR. MATTHEWS: I have great respect for the opinion of Select Committees, but I was offering to the House my own independent view. The right hon. Gentleman said if there is no work there should be no pay. But the incumbent is willing to do the work; it is the Nonconformist parishioner who declines to let him. With regard to Sub-section 6, which permits the parishioner to have the bell tolled, and to have the use of the parish appliances and officials, I confess that I absolutely approve of it. It seems to me to be the spirit and intention of the Act of 1880 that the Nonconformist parishioner should have the same rights with regard to burial in the churchyard as the conforming parishioner. While, however, I quite agree with this sub-section, I do not consider that it alone is enough to save the Bill, and for my own part, I shall vote for the Amendment.

(4.53.) MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): The House has listened with great satisfaction to the speech the right hon. Gentleman has delivered—a speech which I must say, was in strong contrast with that of the right hon. Gentleman who preceded him on that side of the House, who shows himself more of a champion of the Church of England than gentlemen on the front Ministerial Bench. My name is on the back of the Bill, nevertheless I must disclaim responsibility for its title and for the drafting of some of its clauses. I object to the title, because even if the Bill passed in its entirety, it would not satisfy our desires as to religious equality. Speaking for myself as a Representative of the Principality, I must say that I think the passing of the second part of the Bill would be regarded by my countrymen as more important than the passing of the first part. I maintain that, while there are grievances on the part of the Nonconformists with regard to marriages, it is absolutely necessary, in the interests of fair play and even decency, that the Act of 1880 with regard to burials should be altered. I was glad to hear my right hon. Friend who was the author of the Act of 1880 (Mr. Osborne Morgan) declare that that Act was not a settlement at all. I was not a Member of the House when the Act was passed, but I remember the time very well, and I can say that we simply regarded the measure as the smallest possible concession that those who championed the Church of England were willing to give to the Nonconformists. The spirit in which the Act has been administered from 1880 down to the present time proves that it is not a settlement of the matter at all. With regard to the details of the present Bill, I do not think that any of the inconveniences will arise which have been mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman in connection with the proposal to shorten the time of notice. In my own opinion, it is hard that within 24 hours of the death of a near relation the relatives in their sorrow should have at once to set about getting up a statutory notice in strict accordance with the Schedule of the Act of 1880. I think the time asked for should be given. I think the right hon. Gentleman was under a misapprehension as to the intention of Sub-section 3. I agree that the sub-section has not been properly drafted; but what is intended is to make it impossible for an incumbent, relying on the legal right he has of refusing burial at all to a non-parishioner, to insist, in cases where he may be willing that a Nonconformist parishioner should be buried in the churchyard, upon the burial service of the Church of England being read. I think that is the intention of my hon. Friend in the Bill, and I therefore think the sub-section will commend itself to the judgment of the House. There may have been reasons in the past, and there may be reasons now, why the trustee of the churchyard should be able to say, "You must not bury a non-parishioner there." Somebody must have the power of limitation. But that is not the case which we put; the case is where the incumbent insists upon the rites of the Church of England. Such cases constantly occur in the Principality. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted that the Act of 1880 has not been worked in a spirit of conciliation, and that is why those who smart under the administration of it are anxious to amend its provisions. If the Act of 1880 had been carried out in the spirit in which it was framed, it would not be necessary to come to the House at all with the 15th clause of this Bill. But that has not been the case, and it is absolutely necessary that we should endeavour to amend the provisions of the Act of 1880. The next sub-section is that which deals with the extensions of the hours during which a burial can take place in the parish churchyard. I see no reason why the hours should not be extended to sunset. It is said that a burial might be fixed at an hour almost immediately before sunset, which would necessitate the great inconvenience of carrying out the ceremony in the dark. Surely it can hardly be supposed that anybody who has the arrangements of a funeral to make would be actuated by such motives as have been suggested, and in order to gratify his feelings in this respect would adopt such a course as this. I have intimate acquaintance with the manner in which funerals are conducted in the Principality, where it is the common practice to have very large funerals. In many cases nearly the whole of the inhabitants of a village will attend the funeral obsequies, and the result is that, especially in the mining localities, it is very difficult to fix the funeral ceremonial before 3 o'clock, because the people do not leave their work before that hour. Surely it is a pity that those who are at work till 4, or half-past, should thereby be prevented from attending a Nonconformist funeral. We have been told that the spirit of the Act of 1888 was that Nonconformists should have the same privileges with regard to burial as belonged to members of the English Church, but in the Church of England funerals are not limited to 3 o'clock in the afternoon. As far as I know, there is no limit to the hour at which Church of England funerals may take place, and I ask, therefore, why should this invidious distinction exist between them and their Nonconformist brethren? With regard to the sub-section dealing with fees, the hon. Member for the University of Oxford has said that every sub-section he came to appeared to be worse than the previous one, and he seemed to think that this particular sub-section formed the climax of the injustice contained in the measure of my hon. Friend. He said the burial fees were not paid for conducting the service, but for breaking the soil by the incumbent. That may be so, and it may be argued that until we have a large scheme of Disendowment it would not be fair to deprive the incumbent of his fees. But in cases where the grave has been paid for, and constitutes a freehold, why should the incumbent exact burial fees for every new burial? Then comes the case put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. G. O. Morgan) as to the payment of fees for work which is not performed. On this the Home Secretary says the clergyman is willing to bury anyone if the fees are paid. But surely it is too late in the day to argue that, because he is willing to perform a service which is not desired, and consequently not rendered, he should therefore have the right of exacting fees. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Denbighshire has said that Nonconformists who have the misfortune to bury their relatives in the churchyards have to pay double fees, namely, to their own minister and also to the incumbent of the parish. This, however, is not my experience, which has always been that the Nonconformist ministers do not receive fees for their services at the burial of their dead. They are only too glad to perform the ceremony for the friends and relatives without any remuneration; and if this be so, why, I ask, should the Church clergyman insist on payment where no service is rendered at all? In conclusion, I cannot but express a hope that hon. Members on the opposite side of the House will permit the passage of this Bill without raking up the embers of a very bitter controversy. Why it was bitter I do not know, and it is for them to say. We are only trying to obtain a measure of justice which Parliament eventually granted. When we now desire to extend the measure of justice it is not we who desire to fan the embers of bitter intolerance; and if those embers are to be fanned into a flame, it is upon hon. Members on the other side of the House and not upon us that the responsibility must rest.

*(5.6.) MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): The hon. Member who has just sat down has told us he will undertake no responsibility either for the title or for the drafting of this Bill. Then I ask, why did he allow his name to be endorsed on the back of the Bill? Religious equality! What on earth does it mean? I often think we should be better off if we had Preambles to our Bills, as we used to have. We should then understand the motive ideas of hon. Members who introduce measures to this House. The Preamble to this Bill would, I suppose, be somewhat in this form:—"Whereas all religions ought to be made equal by Act of Parliament, and whereas there is no difference or distinction between the religion of a fire worshipper or a devil worshipper, or a seventh-day Baptist, &c.; be it enacted, &c." But this Bill, though professedly a Bill to establish religious equality, deals only, in fact, with two religious services, namely, the burial service and the ceremony of marriage. Let us look for a moment at the way in which the Bill proposes to deal with the Marriage Act, and the kind of machinery it provides. According to this Bill, all a man has to do is to obtain a marriage licence from the Registrar for half-a-crown; that licence is to run for three months, at the end of which time it is to be renewable. There is no limit to the number of licences a man may take out. He may take out half a dozen or more in the names of different women, and keep them in suspense until he has made his selection. During this period of suspense the parties will be, as it were, half married, resting at a half-way house, which is not unlikely to end in something less than marriage in many cases. I have heard of fictitious marriages, and I cannot help thinking that the way in which this Bill proposes to carry out the preliminaries of the sacred condition of marriage might lead to immorality. But let us proceed. Having got the licence the parties go to a registered building. Hon. Members, perhaps, know how a building becomes registered. Thirty people only have to declare that they wish to have a building registered for the solemnisation of marriage, and it is registered. We must remember that there are very few Nonconformist Bodies who have any Central Authority. Most Nonconformist churches are complete in themselves, and do not submit to government by any Central Body. Those 30 persons who have got a place registered for the solemnisation of marriage have the entire control of that building, and of the forms and ceremonies used within it. Nay, more; they often have complete religious equality among themselves, and each one of the 30 men or women may be lawful ministers and the individuals duly commissioned by this Act to perform the marriage ceremony. Let me, however, take the case a little further. Let us accompany the bridal party to the registered building. No notice need be given to the minister. But if he happens by chance to be hard by he may ask certain questions, but there is no obligation to answer them. He may know that the lady is under the age of consent, and that the man is already married. He may ask questions, but he has no power to get them answered. He may refuse to perform the service; but any one of the 30 members of the congregation is just as much a lawful minister as he is. He cannot refuse the use of the registered building. The parties may bring their own minister with them, and he may perform the ceremony "according to such form and ceremony as he shall think fit." A person whom the ordinary minister of the Church refused to marry might flourish this Bill in his face, and have the ceremony conducted according to his own fancy. But even that is not all. Supposing the lawful minister acts in direct contradistinction to everything in this Bill, he is only liable to a fine of £5. So that a rich person might contravene the law, and procure a marriage without any of the conditions and restrictions of this Bill, such as they are, by paying a fine of £5. Is it possible that the House of Commons can read a second time a Bill of this sort? As to the provisions relating to burial, my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford University pointed out that if any of the relatives of a deceased person had been buried in Westminster Abbey or St. Paul's, and that if the deceased had expressed a wish to be buried there, too, his friends could demand his burial in the Minster or Cathedral. With regard to fees, I notice that they are payable "unless the persons otherwise determine." I cannot conceive of their being paid generally, if people had the means of relieving themselves by merely expressing their wish to be relieved. I cannot help thinking that the hon. Members who brought in this Bill must have had the recent decision of the Lord Chancellor in their minds, and that as separations are made quite easy by that decision, they are determined to make marriages as easy. The whole proposal is so unstatesmanlike that I hope the House of Commons will reject it.

*(5.23.) MR. J. A. BRIGHT (Birmingham, Central): I wish to say a word or two against this Bill before it goes to a Division, and I do not wish to be misunderstood in so doing. I have no feeling against religious equality. I am a Nonconformist by descent and from conviction, and I should be glad to see every inequality removed between Dissenters and members of the Church of England. I object to this Bill, because it makes it very probable that the records of marriages will not be safely kept. When it was illegal for marriages to take place except in churches, an arrangement was made on behalf the Society of Friends, by which their Registrar was allowed to be present. The real solution of the question was not that the Registrar should not need to be present at Nonconformist marriages, but that he should be present at all marriages for the purpose of recording them. I believe it is notorious that records of marriages in churches which ought to have been preserved have been lost. By this Bill, instead of the Registrar attending with his book, the minister officiating has to make out four different certificates and send one to the Registrar. Now the minister officiating may be any lawful minister, and we have heard of marriages solemnised by sham ministers. Besides, the certificate might be lost in transit through the post, not to speak of other complications in registration which this Bill would cause. I see that the penalty for failure to register a marriage is £5—a very small penalty for such a gross neglect of duty. It might be worth somebody's while to pay £5 in order to have the traces of a false or real marriage removed. I think that we shall be going in an altogether wrong direction if we pass a Bill like this, which will make the record of Nonconformist marriages in places of worship less permanent and certain than they have hitherto been. I shall therefore, vote against the Second Reading, because I object to anything which will afford a loophole for a loose record of marriages.

(5.28.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I observe that the hon. Member whose name is on the back of the Bill repudiates responsibility for its drafting or its name. The Bill of the hon. Member for Camborne is really divisible into two Bills—one dealing with the attendance of the Registrar at Nonconformist marriages and the other with the Burial Laws. With reference to Sub-section 3 of Clause 15, there are certain reasons against it which I have not heard urged. It would throw a burden upon poor parishes. I am acquainted with a small parish about 15 or 16 miles out of London, where they have had the greatest difficulty in preserving the churchyard for the parishioners in consequence of the applications to bury non-parishioners who, however distant from it, may have taken a fancy to be interred there. I can understand some provision being made for those who have resided many years in a parish, and are away at the time of death; but it seems to me a most unfair claim that strangers or non-parishioners should urge the right to be buried in some churchyard to which they have no claim other than the mere expression of a fancy in life that at death they would like to be buried there.

It being half an hour after Five of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Monday next.

ELECTORAL DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL.—(No. 182.)

As amended, considered.

(5.34.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I do not intend to oppose this Motion. I only wish to explain that, in consequence of representations made to me by the hon. and learned Attorney General, I have not pressed the Amendments of which I had given notice, on the understanding that the objects aimed at are already secured in the Bill.

(5.35.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): Although I have opposed the Bill in its several stages, I shall not vote against the Third Reading, for I have no desire to hinder the removal of electoral disabilities. What I do charge the Government with is that in introducing this Bill with a high-sounding title they have brought forward a measure without any real backbone to it. They have only removed the disabilities of soldiers, sailors, and policemen, and they have declined to remove those to which the working classes of the country are subjected; indeed, the Bill was so carefully drawn as to preclude all opportunity of securing an amendment in that direction. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he would have no tinkering with the Registration Laws. Well, I assert that this is a tinkering, feeble Bill.

(5.37.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I only wish to say, in reply to the hon. Member for Camborne, that the view he has expressed—that the object of his Amendment is secured in the Bill—is correct.

(5.38.) MR. T. ROBINSON (Gloucester): I wish to express my regret that the Attorney General would not afford me an opportunity of proposing an Amendment dealing with disqualifications arising out of recent decisions of certain Revising Barristers. It is a pity the Bill was so drawn as to prevent that point being raised.

SIR R. WEBSTER: The Bill was drawn long before those decisions were given.

MR. T. ROBINSON: No doubt; but surely it would have been possible to deal with this matter.

QUESTION.

UPPER BURMA.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he can give the House any information as to the reported death, in the action on the Chin Hills, Upper Burma, of Lieutenant L. A. Forbes, of the 3rd Goorkhas?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The following telegram has been received from the Viceroy:—

"Reported from Chin country that detachment 39th Bengal Infantry, under Lieutenant Mocatta, detailed from Haka, was attacked April 4, while returning towards Haka, by a large gathering of Chins of the Klangiang tribe. The detachment continued march, fighting till met by force from Haka of the same regiment under Mainwaring. Lieutenant Forbes wounded severely in arm, five men killed, 12 wounded. This disturbance is believed to be local and unconnected with events on Manipur side. Steps will be taken to punish offending tribes."

This 39th (Gurhuali) Regiment is the old 2nd Battalion 3rd Goorkhas. The old 39th was reduced very lately, and its place in the Army List taken by the 2nd Battalion 3rd Goorkhas. A new 2nd Battalion 3rd Goorkhas is being raised in India. Lieutenant Forbes's initials are L.A.

House adjourned at a quarter before six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 9th April, 1891.

QUESTIONS.

MILITARY EXPEDITIONS IN NORTH WEST INDIA.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, or the Minister who is at present representing the India Office, whether the large military expeditions to the Maranzai country, the Black Mountains, and other places on the North-West Frontier of India, in which Her Majesty's troops are now engaged and in which they have already suffered appreciable losses, are in pursuance of a policy of advance sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government in this country, or are undertaken by the Commander-in-Chief in India, with the permission of the Government of India, on his own responsibility?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): In the absence of my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary for India, I have to say that the expeditions referred to in the question are not in pursuance of a policy of advance, nor has any such policy been sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government. They are punitive and pacificatory expeditions undertaken not by the Commander-in-Chief in India on his own responsibility, but by the Government of India, subject to the sanction of the Secretary of State.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: But is it not a matter of fact that in the last two or three years there has been a great advance?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I cannot at this moment go into the general policy of the expeditions which have taken place on the North-West Frontier of India. I have answered the specific question put by the hon. Member.

CONSUMPTION OF OPIUM IN INDIA AND BURMA.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he can state what was the total consumption of opium in India in 1880, and also in Burma in the same year; and what are the figures for the latest year for which statistics have been obtained for India and for Burma?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The consumption of opium in Madras and Bombay for 1880 cannot be given. In 1889-90 it was 1,594 chests. Excluding Madras and Bombay, but including Lower Burma, the total consumption in British India was for 1880-81 5,606 chests, and for 1889-90 4,800. In Lower Burma the consumption was for 1880-81 812 chests, and for 1889-90 784 chests. The consumption in Upper Burma is not known.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): When did the consumption of opium in Upper Burma begin? How was it not forbidden by the late Government, and encouraged by the present?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I must ask for notice of that question. I believe that the consumption of opium in Upper Burma dates from a period long antecedent to our annexation.

MR. MAC NEILL: Cannot the right hon. Gentleman say of his own knowledge that Lord Dufferin and Lord Dufferin's Council protested solemnly against it; and that, despite that protest, Lord Cross allowed licences to be issued?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: That question does not in the least arise out of the question on the Paper.

MR. MAC NEILL (ironically): Hear, hear.

THE DISASTER AT MANIPUR.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): I desire to put a question to the Under Secretary of State for India or the Minister representing the India Office in the absence of the Under Secretary—a question of which I have given private notice, namely, whether it is true that news has been received from Manipur that Mr. Quinton, the Commissioner at Assam, and the British officers with him, have been killed?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: A long telegram was received to-day and was sent to the evening papers for publication. A later one from the General Officer commanding in Burma is as follows:—

"General Officer commanding in Burma telegraphs to-day that a messenger has arrived, at Tamu reporting Grant all well at Thobed Burma. Government also report that British troops have occupied Ladantonthana from Cachar side. This is only 18 miles from Manipur. Regular troops said to be deserting Regent. Death of Quinton and those with him confirmed by letter from Head Clerk, Manipur. Agency detained by Durbar in Manipur."

LINLITHGOW PALACE.

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether any proposals have been placed before him with a view of converting the Palace of Linlithgow into a museum for Scottish antiquities; and, if so, will due care be taken to preserve the distinctive character of one of the most interesting historic buildings now existing in Scotland?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I have this morning received a Memorial from the Provost, Magistrates, and Council of the Burgh of Linlithgow, suggesting that the old dismantled palace at that place should be roofed in, and that it should be made available as a Public Library and Reading Room, and that this House should vote the money necessary for those purposes. I shall confer with the Secretary for Scotland on the subject. But at the first blush it strikes one that it is one thing to take steps—if any should appear to be necessary—in order to preserve from complete destruction the interesting ruins of an old Royal Palace, but it is quite another thing to provide a Public Library and Reading Room in the town at the expense of the Exchequer.

THE NEW SILVER COINS.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the new silver coins with their values denoted on them will be issued?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): A Committee is now at work considering the whole subject of the designs of coins, consisting of the right hon. Member for London University, Sir Frederick Leighton (President of the Royal Academy), the Deputy Master of the Mint, the Deputy Governor of the Bank of England, Mr.

Sir J. Fergusson

John Evans (President of the Numismatical Society), and Mr. R. B. Wade (representing the Joint Stock Bankers.)

PORT DARWIN.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any negotiations have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of South Australia with reference to Port Darwin being made a fortified station; and, if not, whether he can state if there is any prospect of this step being taken, as recommended by so many eminent authorities?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The question of the defence of Port Darwin has received full consideration, and it is not the opinion of the South Australian and Imperial Authorities that any fortifications should at the present time be constructed there.

FEES FOR PATENTS.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is correct that a patentee in this country has to pay a sum of £154 for 14 years' protection, whereas in the United States of America the cost is only £7 for 17 years' protection; and, if correct, will the Government, having regard to the keen competition between this country and the United States, take steps to put British inventors in a more favourable position?

MR. WATT: I beg also to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, having regard to the great disadvantage at which inventors are placed by the heavy fees payable on patents in Great Britain, as compared with America, Germany, France, and all other countries, the Government will re-consider the desirability of the foregoing fees payable on patents for the fifth and sixth years?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The sums stated are accurate as regards the whole period of protection, but the position is not quite fairly represented, because protection is given for periods less than 14 years for sums less than the amount set out. Protection for four years, for instance, is given in an ordinary case for £4, whereas the payments required to be made within the same period in the United States amount to £6 or £7. The whole scale of fees was carefully considered in 1883 when the Act was passed, and it was held that there are reasons, from the point of view both of the public and of inventors, against encouraging a lengthened protection of patents which are not likely to be worked. It did not appear desirable that a patentee who cannot make his patent available for public use should occupy the ground for a long time, to the exclusion of others.

SCOTCH MAILS.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Postmaster General at what date it is probable that full advantage will be taken of the opening of the Forth and Tay Bridges to shorten the time occupied in forwarding and delivering letters between the large mercantile and manufacturing towns and districts in the North-East of England and the North-East of Scotland?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I am happy to say that use is already made of both the bridges referred to, with the result of some substantial acceleration in the service, but I am not aware in what respect further use can be more advantageously made of them for the conveyance of mails. If the hon. Member will favour me with any specific proposal on the subject I will with pleasure give it early and careful consideration.

BANK HOLIDAYS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. LENG: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that Post Office and Telegraph servants in Scotland have not yet enjoyed the Bank Holidays extended to them as in England; and whether it can be arranged to give them the Bank Holiday on Whit Monday and the subsequent Bank Holidays this year?

*MR. RAIKES: The holiday already past this year, namely, Easter Monday, is not a Bank Holiday in Scotland, neither is Whit Monday; but the Post Office servants in Scotland have a holiday on New Year's Day, which is not the case in England, and it is arranged that they shall be given holidays on Fast days, or other days generally observed as holidays in Scotland, in lieu of Whit Monday and the remaining Bank Holidays which are observed in England.

GAMING IN PUBLIC HOUSES.

MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the case of two publicans, called John William Rock and James Stone, who were convicted and fined at the Chesham (Bucks) Petty Sessions, on Wednesday, 4th March, for permitting gaming; whether he is aware that the principal evidence against them, was given by a police constable called Gascoyne, who visited the house in disguise, and made no attempt to caution the landlords or to prevent the law being broken; whether the defendants had been previously convicted; whether he is aware that Superintendent Sergeant, one of the witnesses, said that the Chief Constable of the County, Captain Drake, had instructed the police to act as they did; and whether such action is sanctioned by the Home Department; and, if not, whether the Department will take any steps to prevent a recurrence of it?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have received a Report from the Chief Constable, who informs me that, in consequence of rumours that gaming was being carried on in several of the public houses in Buckinghamshire, he directed a constable in plain clothes to be detailed for the purpose of keeping a watch on certain premises, in consequence of which three publicans were summoned and convicted. The two named in the question—namely, John William Rock and James Stone—had not been previously convicted. The principal witness was the constable who had been detailed as stated. He was not in disguise, but in plain clothes. I believe it is by no means unusual that officers detailed for such duty should be in plain clothes. In the Metropolis a preliminary warning would, as a rule, be given, but not necessarily, where it was known that the law was being wilfully broken. In Bucks this appears not to be the practice. These are matters for the discretion of the Chief Constable, and it is not for me to interfere.

IMMIGRATION OF FOREIGNERS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to the recent tables relating to the immigration of foreigners into the United Kingdom, and particularly to the fact that, although nearly 1,000,000 persons were maintained under the Poor Law in Great Britain and Ireland in 1890, 29,885 aliens arrived from the Continent at 21 British ports between May and December, and at two others in the whole year, not intending to proceed to America, while the foreign immigration into London was 4,400 higher in 1890 than in 1889, and into Hull 1,320 higher; and if, having regard to the admitted increase of the immigration of Polish Jews, many of whom were in a state of destitution, and to the confirmatory reports of the Chief Officers of Police in the Metropolis, Manchester, and Leeds, he will consider the desirability, as contemplated by the Select Committee of 1889, of legislating against the importation of pauper and destitute aliens?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The tables referred to by my hon. Friend show that 29,885 aliens, not stated to be en route to America, arrived from the Continent at 21 British ports between May and December last, and at two others in the whole year, but the tables do not show that these immigrants intended to remain here; in fact, as stated in the Report prefixed to the tables, it is probable that a large number of the 29,885 immigrants left the United Kingdom in the course of the year. The Committee of 1889 reported that they saw great difficulties in the way of enforcing laws similar to those of the United States and certain other countries against the importation of pauper and destitute aliens, and were not prepared to recommend such legislation at present. There has been no important change in the circumstances since the Committee reported, but the current of immigration will continue to be carefully observed.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: May I ask whether the immigration into London in 1890 was not greater than it was in 1889, and whether the Chief Commissioner of Police does not consider it as a serious matter?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: There has been an increase, but, it has by no means been large.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to give notice that I shall take a further opportunity of calling attention to this question.

METROPOLITAN POLICE PENSIONERS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will consider the possibility of dispensing with the second certificate Metropolitan Police pensioners residing beyond the district are required to transmit as to their identity, and of accepting the single certificate of either a Magistrate, the minister of the parish, or a Superintendent or Inspector of Police, having regard to the infirm condition of many pensioners, and the difficulty not a few have in finding a signatory who knows them personally other than a Superintendent or Inspector of Police; and if the pensions of out-residents could be paid through the Post Office, as in the case of Army pensions, instead of through a bank, which may be far from their houses?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have already sanctioned regulations which I shall be happy to show to my hon. Friend, which will, I hope, be effective in introducing the alterations which are suggested in the question, and removing the inconveniences of the old system.

SMITHERY AT SHEERNESS.

MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether there has been a deficit or a surplus in the wages earned in the smithery at Sheerness on the prices fixed by the Service during the time the check system has been in operation; and whether he will grant a Return of the wages earned week by week in the smithery at Sheerness during that period?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): From the 1st April, 1890 (12 months) three men have been checked a total sum of 19s. 3d., two men at one fire 16s. 9d., and the man at another fire

2s. 6d. Both these fire parties had been short of their wages three weeks running. The two men alluded to were deficient in the three weeks 39s. 1d. the other fire with the one man in the three weeks 20s. 9d. The first two men were on check measurement during the year 23 weeks, and they were short on the whole time 25s. The remainder of the year they were on task and job, when they earned their money easily, using the same scheme of prices, observing that during the year the entire shop have been short of their day pay on three separate weeks. No men have received more than their day pay whilst employed on check measurement.

MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: The noble Lord has not answered the first part of the question—whether there has been a deficit or a surplus?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I do not quite understand the question. There is no specific sum allotted to any trade, but on wages there is a certain scheduled list of prices upon which men work.

MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: I will call attention to the subject on the Votes.

HER MAJESTY'S COMMISSIONERS IN AFRICA.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Commissioners just appointed for West Africa, East Africa, and Northern Zambesia are to be Royal Commissioners, independent of the Niger, East Africa, and African Lakes Companies, and exercising some jurisdiction and supervision on behalf of Her Majesty, as distinguished from the jurisdiction vested in the companies?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: They are Commissioners appointed by the Crown; they are independent officers who will receive instructions from, and report to the Secretary of State. The Commissioners on the West Coast will have a district distinct from that administered by the Niger Company. As regards those on the East Coast, their position is fairly described in the question. Care will be taken that their jurisdiction will not conflict with that of the Chartered Companies. As regards the districts north of the Zambesi, administrative and judicial jurisdiction is for the present vested in the Commissioner.

SEIZURE OF THE "COUNTESS OF CARNARVON."

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Foreign Office has yet received particulars of the capture of the steamship Countess of Carnarvon by the Portuguese on the Limpopo River; and whether he is in a position to give any information on the subject to the House?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The particulars have not yet been received in an authentic form. The reports as to the facts are so conflicting that no reliable information can be given.

DR. CAMERON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that many weeks ago a statement on the subject was issued by the Portuguese Government—how is it that we are so far behind?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I can only say that information has been telegraphed for, but the region where the event took place is not within reach of the telegraph.

DR. CAMERON: Is it not the fact that the Cape papers have published full details?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am not ~~informed~~.

DR. CAMERON: Then I will repeat the question on another day.

EXPLOSIONS IN GLASGOW IRON WORKS.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any decision has yet been come to as to the institution of a special public inquiry into all or any of those fatal explosions in iron works in the Glasgow district to which his attention was called by questions before Easter?

MR. MATTHEWS: The matter referred to in the question of the hon. Member is being carefully inquired into by the authorities of the Scotch Office, but these inquiries are not yet quite completed. If the hon. Member will repeat his question to the Lord Advocate on Monday next, he will, I hope, obtain a definite reply.

THE WESTMORELAND COUNTY COUNCIL.

MR. W. LOWTHER (Westmoreland, Appleby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the accounts of the Westmoreland County Council, made up to 31st March, 1890, have been received by the Local Government Board and have been audited; and, if not, when the accounts are likely to be sent in?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): The Local Government Board have received the Financial Statement as to the accounts of the Westmoreland County Council up to the 31st March, 1890, and the audit of the accounts has been completed.

CERTIFYING SURGEON OF FACTORIES.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT (Manchester, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, seeing that he has stated that his opinion in regard to the Certifying Surgeon is based upon the best information, whether he will inform the House if he has consulted the Chief Inspector of Factories upon the subject, and also the Superintending Inspector, and the other Inspectors in the districts chiefly interested, namely, the cotton and woollen districts, as to the advisability of abolishing the Certifying Surgeon's certificate of fitness; and, if not, why not?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have, in the ordinary course, consulted the Chief Inspector of Factories on this subject, and learnt through him the views of his Department. It is hardly reasonable to suppose that in dealing with this question I should fail to take advantage of all the sources of information at my disposal.

WAGES AND EMPLOYMENT IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

MR. P. STANHOPE (Widnesbury): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will obtain from the Secretary of Her Britannic Majesty's Legation in Washington a Report showing the effect upon the wages and employment of the working classes in the United States of America of the McKinley Tariff Act?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Inquiry shall be made through Her Majesty's Minister at Washington whether such a Report can be procured. If so, he will be requested to furnish one.

POLICE SUPERANNUATION.

MR. P. STANHOPE: I had intended to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a police constable appointed under Section 19 of the Act 3 & 4 Victoria, chapter 88, is entitled to superannuation under the English Superannuation Act of 1890, in the same manner as other county constables? But at the request of the right hon. Gentleman I beg to postpone the question until Tuesday.

THE CENSUS IN WALES.

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if his attention has been called to the numerous complaints from the Principality, that at the recent Census, Welsh Schedules were refused to Welsh speaking persons, that in many cases the English forms supplied contained no language columns, and that in some instances whole rows of cottages were left without forms of any kind; and what steps he proposes to take under these circumstances to ensure accurate and reliable Returns from Wales?

MR. LONG: Every Registrar in Wales and in Monmouthshire was asked for a statement of the number of schedules in the Welsh language that he would probably require, and this number, with an addition for possible underestimate on his part, was sent to him, the receipt of the same being acknowledged by him. No complaint has been received at the Census Office of the supply having been insufficient. As regards the statement that in many cases English forms without the language column were supplied, it is possible that in some exceptional instances the packers may, by mistake, have put a bundle of such forms into the parcel sent to a Welsh Registrar; but the Registrar General has only received information of two cases in which such a mistake was made. No information has been received at the Census Office of "whole rows of cottages having been left without forms of any kind." In all cases where complaint has been made that the enumerator has left a house or houses without schedules, the Registrar General has given immediate orders that the omission shall be rectified. In any case where it shall be shown that schedules without the language column have been distributed in Wales or in Monmouthshire, the Registrar General will take steps to have the necessary information collected by a fresh visitation.

MR. S. SMITH: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that at Tryddyn, in Flintshire, Census forms, intended for England, without the 12th column to state what language is used by the persons enumerated, were distributed, and that the proper Welsh forms could not be obtained; and whether any steps will be taken to enable the inhabitants to state what language they use?

MR. LONG: The Registrar General will cause inquiry to be made, and if the facts be as stated, will cause steps to be taken to enable the inhabitants to supplement their former schedules.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has received any complaints with regard to the alleged tampering by the collector of the Census papers at Machynlleth, Montgomeryshire, with the language column in the returns by substituting the word "both," for the words "Welsh only"; whether he will cause inquiries to be made into this allegation; and whether any steps will be taken to ensure the accuracy of the returns?

MR. LONG: I am informed by the Registrar General that no such complaint has been received by him; but he will make inquiry on the subject.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware of the fact that in many districts in Wales no Welsh Census papers have been distributed or delivered when they were demanded; what method was adopted for the allocation or distribution of the papers; and with whom the blame rests for the neglect in not having a sufficient number of the papers circulated, and delivered?

MR. LONG: I must refer to the answer which I have already given to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING IN LONDON.

MR. J. SPENCER BALFOUR (Burnley): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Board intend to grant a third Provisional Order under the Electric Lighting Acts in any district in London where there are already two Electric Lighting Companies empowered by Provisional Orders to supply electricity; and whether, if so, he will explain why it is now intended to depart from the principle laid down by the Board of Trade, after the Westminster Inquiry of 1889, that there should be only two companies, each for a different system, authorised by Provisional Orders, in one district, and also from the policy of the Board of Trade as stated by the President on the 12th May last?

*MR. M. HICKS BEACH: It is not intended to grant a third Provisional Order under the Electric Lighting Acts in any urban district where there are already two Electric Lighting Companies empowered by Provisional Orders to supply electricity, unless there are strong reasons to suppose that one of such Electric Lighting Companies will be unable to exercise its powers within a reasonable time. Where, however, this is the case, I do not think that it is desirable that the inhabitants of a district should be entirely debarred from the advantages of competition.

VOLUNTEER AND MILITIA SURGEONS.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Volunteer surgeons are now promoted to brigade rank; and, if so, whether it is the intention to promote to a similar rank the senior Militia surgeons, some of whom have been serving before the Volunteer force was instituted?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The reason why the Volunteers have this advantage is because they are organised by brigades, and the rank of brigade-surgeon is conferred in recognition of the increased responsibility attached to the principal medical officer of a brigade.

THE GWYLWYR SETT QUARRY.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Commissioners of Woods and Forests have yet granted a lease of the Gwylwyr Sett Quarry, Carnarvonshire; and, if so, what provision has been inserted in such lease for the effective working of the quarry.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Gwylwyr Quarry has been let to the persons who were the sitting tenants when the Crown got possession, at a minimum rent of £50 merging in royalties, with usual clauses for the effectual working of the quarries.

EXEMPTION OF FOREIGN AMBASSADORS FROM RATES AND TAXES.

MR. MORTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Ambassadors and Ministers representing Foreign Powers in this country are exempt from rates and taxes?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: No process of law can be instituted against any foreign Ambassador or Minister in this country for the recovery of rates and taxes. By law they are exempt from Income Tax, and it is the practice not to make any charge to them in respect of House Duty or Establishment Licence Duty. They are, at least in many cases, assessed for rates, and I believe that sometimes, when they rent houses, the rates are charged to the proprietors, and the rent is raised proportionately.

BERLIN LABOUR CONFERENCE.

MR. ELLIOTT LEES (Oldham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether any, and if so what, legislative action has yet been taken by any Foreign Government to carry out any of the recommendations of the Berlin Conference upon labour questions; and whether any system analogous to what is known as "the half-time system" exists in any foreign country?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The information asked for by the hon. Member is still in course of collection, and I regret, therefore, I am not yet in a position to give him particulars. If he will kindly repeat his question in about 14 days' time, I hope to be then in possession of full information.

Mr. Lloyd-George

THE LABOUR COMMISSION.

MR. J. M'CARTHY (Londonderry): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he will be able to state to the House the names of those whom it is proposed to appoint on the Labour Commission?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sorry that I am not able to make my promised statement to-day, and I am not certain whether I shall be in a position to do so to-morrow. I hope to be able to make a statement on Monday.

THE SALMON FISHERIES (IRELAND)

AUTO.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the action of the Inspectors of Fisheries in Ireland in prosecuting, under the provisions of the Salmon Fisheries (Ireland) Acts, a large number of millowners in the county Antrim; whether he is aware that very considerable employment is given to the rural population in the County Antrim in mills worked by hydraulic machinery, and that if the requirements of the Inspectors are to be enforced a large number of these mills must necessarily be closed; and whether he will instruct the Inspectors of Fisheries to give the greatest latitude possible in carrying out the exemption clauses of the Fisheries Acts when necessary for the effective working of hydraulic machines?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries report that the institution of proceedings against millowners for non-compliance with the Fishery Laws rests not with them, but with the Local Boards of Conservators. The Inspectors have in every case in which they have received complaint from a millowner that injury would arise to the working power of his mill by a strict compliance with the law, and in which they have satisfied themselves that the complaint was well founded, granted the necessary exemption, and, so far as the Inspectors are aware, there is no ground for the fear which has been represented to my hon. Friend that any mill will be closed or interfered with in its working through the administration of the law by the Inspectors, whose policy, on the contrary, has always been in no way to injure the effective working power of any mill, be it ever so insignificant.

MR. MACARTNEY: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to this question.

ILLITERATE VOTERS IN SLIGO.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can ascertain, for the information of the House, what was the number of votes that were polled by illiterate voters in the recent election in North Sligo?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I must ask the hon. Member to postpone the question until to-morrow.

ADVANCES UNDER THE ASHBOURNE ACTS.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether a separate account is kept to which the issues out of the Consolidated Fund for advances made under the Ashbourne Acts have been charged, and to which the repayment made by tenant purchasers are credited; out of what account are issued the dividends payable half-yearly to the public on the loans raised under these Acts; and is there a Sinking Fund separately kept for the redemption of these loans; and if so, what is the annual percentage paid to that fund?

MR. GOSCHEN: Issues for advances under the Ashbourne Acts are made not from the Consolidated Fund, but from the Local Loans Fund, established under 50 & 51 Vict., cap. 16. Such issues and the corresponding payments are separately entered in the annual account of the Local Loans Fund. House of Commons Paper 95 of 1891 is the latest account of that fund, with the Auditor General's Report upon it for 1889-90. The dividends on Local Loan Stock are charged to the Income Account of the Local Loans Fund; see p. 3 of the Parliamentary Paper above mentioned. That portion of the repayments by borrowers which represents principal is carried to the Capital Account of the Local Loans

Fund, and is either applied in making new loans from that fund, for which fresh Local Loan Stock would otherwise have to be created, or is invested until required to redeem Local Loan Stock, which cannot be paid off before 1912. In either case such repayments of principal are treated as a Sinking Fund. Under the terms of the Ashbourne Act, out of every £4 repayable by a borrower £3 2s. 6d. represents interest on the loan made to him, and 17s. 6d. is principal, as the latter sum, if received annually for 40 years and accumulated at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., would amount to £100. The actual receipts are, however, apportioned each year between principal and interest.

LAND PURCHASE IN IRELAND.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, how many of the purchasers under "The Irish Church Act, 1869" have been permitted to take advantage of Section 25 of "The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887"; what was the total number of purchasers; how many of the purchasers under the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Acts, 1870, 1872, and 1881, have been permitted to use Section 27 of "The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887"; and what was the total number of purchasers under those Acts?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Irish Land Commissioners report that the total number of purchasers under the Irish Church Act, 1869, was 7,000. The total number of mortgages of Church lands outstanding in 1885 was 2,665. The total number of mortgagors or purchasers who obtained the benefit of Section 23 of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885, and of Section 25 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, was 2,591. The total number of purchasers under the Land Acts of 1870 and 1872 (which are administered by the Board of Works) was, I understand, 876, and the number of these who received the benefit of Section 24 of the Act of 1887 quoted was 787. The total number of purchasers under the Land Act of 1881 was 731, and the number of these who obtained the benefit of Section 27 of the Act of 1887 was 726.

DISTRESS IN DONEGAL.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to a series of resolutions passed at a meeting of the Raphoe clergy, held in Letterkenny on 31st March under the presidency of the Most Rev. Dr. O'Donnell, Lord Bishop of Raphoe, which resolutions describe the condition of the poor over wide areas in North Western Donegal, from Gweedore to Swilly, to be one of perilous destitution in the absence of assistance; request the authorities not to allow the distress to become more acute by the refusal of public employment; and urge on the Government the construction of a railway from Letterkenny to Gweedore, which would give employment in parishes where the potato blight of last year was exceptionally destructive; and what steps, if any, do the Government intend to take with a view of meeting the suggestions of the Raphoe clergy, and relieving this distress?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The resolutions referred to have been brought under the notice of the Government, who have also before them Reports regarding the condition of the different portions of the County Donegal to which the Resolutions relate, and the entire matter is engaging careful attention.

RELIEF WORKS.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what steps, if any, have been taken to start relief works in Ranafast, Ranomona, and Loughnanoran, in West Donegal; whether he is aware that there is much fever in these districts; and what means of subsistence there are for the 783 inhabitants from this time till June, and for the women and children from June till the return of the wage-earners from the Scotch harvest in August?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to defer the question.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I will repeat it to-morrow.

PIER DUES IN CORK.

MR. PENROSE FITZGERALD (Cambridge): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he is aware that, in 1890, the secretary to the Grand Jury of the County of Cork was informed by the Secretary to the Board of Works in Dublin that the necessary bye-laws to enable that Grand Jury to collect the dues on the various piers in the county would be issued as soon as they had received the approval of the Lord Lieutenant in Council, and that at the meeting of the Cork Grand Jury, this Spring, the secretary, on again applying, was told, under date 18th March, 1891, by the Secretary of the Board of Works—

"That the bye-laws are before the Privy Council for approval, and will be issued as soon as possible;"

And how long this delay will be continued?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the Grand Jury has power to collect dues without the bye-laws referred to. There has been some unavoidable delay in negotiating with some of the Grand Juries with regard to the bye-laws which are intended to apply to all fishery piers and harbours round the coast, but the Board of Works are now in communication with the Privy Council Office with a view to obtaining the approval of the bye-laws by His Eminence the Lord Lieutenant, as early as possible.

ADMIRALTY SUPPLIES IN COUNTY SLIGO.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to complaints made by the victuallers of Westport, County Mayo, that whilst it has been customary for Her Majesty's ships stationed on the west coast calling at that port to get their meat supplies by contract for shorter or longer terms, for some time past the supplies have been procured from a favoured few; whether he will be so good as to inquire into those complaints; and if they prove well founded, will he see that the benefits of the orders from Her Majesty's ships shall be fairly distributed among the victuallers of Westport?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. Forwood, Lancashire, S.W., Ormakirk): No complaints from victuallers at Westport have reached the Admiralty. No contract for meat has been made at Westport, as the demand does not justify one. Her Majesty's ships calling there will, as a general rule, only be coastguard cruisers, requiring a few pounds at a time, and they will make their purchases in the ordinary manner.

IRISH RAILWAYS.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether arrangements have yet been made for a station at Ballybofey, on the new Stranorlar and Glenties Line?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that there is to be a station situated to the east of Ballybofey, at a distance of less than half a mile. It has, therefore, not been thought necessary to incur the expense of building a separate station.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Have not representations been received from the district to the effect that the markets will be thoroughly destroyed unless a station is erected?

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware of any representations having been received, but I remember that when I was in the district somebody spoke to me in connection with the question to which the hon. Member refers, and I answered at the time that it might be found desirable, if possible, to make a station there.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Will it be done?

MR. JACKSON: I do not know whether arrangements have been made for it, but I will inquire.

I have, however, some reasons to give why the Committee should be composed of the whole of the Scottish Representatives, with the addition of 30 other Members nominated by the Committee of Selection. It is eminently a matter upon which the opinion of the Scottish Representatives should be taken. It is proposed to withdraw the consideration of Scotch Private Bills from the Representatives of the nation, and to hand them over to something like a bureau. I suggest that 30 English and Irish Members should be added because it is impossible for the proposals of the Government to stop at Scotland. It is almost certain that the system will be extended from Scotland to England and Ireland, and it is therefore only fair that the Committee should have the experience of English Members. My last reason is that, if my Amendment is adopted, the time of the House will be saved, seeing that it will prevent the NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [23rd March], "That the Committee do consist of Twenty Members."—(The Lord Advocate.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

(4.10.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.) moved, as an Amendment, that—"The Committee do consist of all the Scottish Representatives and 20 other Members to be nominated by the Committee of Selection."

The hon. Member said: Seeing that the Amendment was moved on a previous occasion, it is not necessary that I should trouble the House with my reasons for arriving at the opinion that the matters entrusted to this Committee should be considered by the whole of the Scotch Members. I do not propose to do anything that would prevent the main object of appointing a Committee from being carried. whole business from being gone through again. I beg to move the Amendment of which I have given notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out the words "Twenty Members," and add the words "all the Scottish Representatives, and Thirty other Members to be nominated by the Committee of Selection."—
(Mr. Munro Ferguson.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'Twenty Members' stand part of the Question."

(4.12.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. Robertson, Bute): The hon. Gentleman can hardly expect that the Government will accept this Amendment, seeing that it is most desirable that the Bill should receive confirmation this Session, and that there should be no unnecessary delay. It is not necessary to say that the acceptance of this proposal would render that absolutely impossible. The proposition of the hon. Member for Leith (Mr. Munro Ferguson) is that the proportions of the Committee should be very widely altered—that all the Scotch Members, 70 in number, should be upon it, and that 30 English Members should act with them. The Committee has been struck in accordance with the usual practice as to the balance of Parties upon it. As regards the proportion of Scotch Members the Amendment really makes no substantial improvement as far as the adequate representation of Scotland is concerned. It gives a proportion almost exactly of 14 in 20, whilst the Government proposal is 13 in 20 of Scotch Members. The essential objection, however, is that if the Committee is so constituted, the responsibility for the measure would really pass out of the hands of the Government and of the majority of the House, and, accordingly, so far from the proceedings in the Committee being a saving of time, they would probably give rise to difficulties which would have to be rectified, if at all possible, by the action of the whole House. I may remind the House that when the subject was discussed before the Easter Recess it was intimated by the Front Bench that this matter should be discussed very briefly when it was taken up after Easter, but that the sense of the House as to the composition of the Committee should be at once taken.

Mr. Munro Ferguson

(4.15.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): No doubt the proposition of my hon. Friend the Member for Leith would give a very large Committee, but the Committee proposed by the Government is a very unsatisfactory one. It has been struck in accordance with the present method of striking Committees, but that is a method which has only been in operation for two or three years, and I think it is one which is working very badly indeed. For my own part, I very much prefer the old plan, which provided that if a Committee consisted of 20 Members, 11 should be selected from Members representing the Government side of the House and nine from the Opposition. The Committee proposed by the Lord Advocate has been struck in a very curious manner. The Liberal Whips are responsible for seven Members, and they have put down the names of seven Scotch Liberals. We are anxious that Scottish Representatives should predominate upon the Committees that are appointed for the consideration of purely Scottish questions; and two years ago, owing to the pressure that was brought to bear upon the Lord Advocate, an important Committee was nominated which comprised the whole of the Scottish Representatives. The right hon. Gentleman, however, was afraid that he had gone a little too far, and therefore he struck off his own colleague, the then Solicitor General for Scotland, and replaced him by a Scotchman who had, unfortunately, been unable to secure a Scotch seat, but represented an English constituency. Consequently, all the members of the Committee were Scotchmen, and all represented Scottish constituencies except one. Five of the Committee proposed by the Lord Advocate are Scottish Members who belong to the Conservative Party; in addition there are three English Conservatives, one Irish Conservative, two Liberal Unionists, one Irish Conservative, and two other Irish Members. Now, this is purely a Scottish matter, and I think the English and Irish Conservatives might give way to Scotch Conservatives. As to the two Liberal Unionists, I look on them as Conservatives; and as to the one London Member, I do not think his services are required at all on such an occasion. Then, again, we have one Irish Member who is at present some 6,000 miles away. He was in America when his name was proposed, and he has now gone 3,000 miles further West. But even among the Irish Members there are sub-divisions, because we have the Parnellites and anti-Parnellites. Judging from what has already taken place, I think the Parnellite is to be considered as a Government Member. [Cries of "No!"] Well, in Ireland the Parnellites are the allies of the Government. [Cries of "No!" from the Government Benches.] Personally, this Session I have had some experience in regard to the serving of Nationalist Members upon Public Committees. We were three or four weeks considering our Report, and although the matter was one which very much affected Ireland neither of the Irish Members put in an appearance.

AN HON. MEMBER: What was the Committee?

DR. CLARK: I am speaking of the Colonisation Committee. As the present matter is one which wholly affects Scotland, I think we should have a very different Committee from that which has been suggested by the Government, and it must not be forgotten that in similar circumstances, not long ago, we had a Committee composed of the whole of the Scottish Representatives, with one or two English Members placed upon it in order to give advice in regard to English procedure. That was the course pursued in reference to the Scotch Police Bill, and it worked extremely well. I certainly do not think that the Committee proposed by the Lord Advocate would be a proper one for considering the question of Scottish Private Bill Procedure, and the probability is that a great deal of time would be wasted, because the Committee would not secure the confidence of the Scotch people and the Scottish Representatives. I regret very much that the Government are not prepared to meet the Scottish Members in a more amicable spirit. The only thing, however, we can do is to protest against the composition of the Committee, and move the striking off of the names of the English and Irish Members.

*(4.20.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): My impression in regard to the question before the House is that there is a more substantial agreement among us than appears to be the case at the first view. The object that we on this side of the House have in view is to secure that the Select Committee to which this Bill is to be referred should be of sufficient importance to deal with the matter. We regard the subject as one of first-class importance. The proposal is to constitute a new tribunal for Scotland for the performance of a large part of the duties at present fulfilled by Parliament itself. My hon. Friend who spoke last has implied that this is so purely a Scotch question that English and Irish Members are not in their proper place on the Committee. I cannot say that I share that opinion. Undoubtedly the Bill has nothing to do with England or Ireland; but equally without doubt the same principle will in turn be applied both to England and Ireland, and it would be strange indeed if no English or Irish Members were placed on the Committee. What we want to secure is that there should be a substantial foundation of Scotch Members before we proceed to add English and Irish Members. It has been pointed out that there are 13 Scotch Representatives proposed by the Government; but I do not think that such a Committee is adequate to deal with this large question. The proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Leith is that we should take the course which was suggested by him years ago in reference to the Local Government Bill. It was then proposed that the Committee should be composed of all the Scottish Members, with 30 Members added by the Committee of Selection. It must be admitted that this would be a very large Committee for the consideration of a subject which, although of the first importance, is much more limited in its scope than the subject of Local Government. I think the Government have been informed what it is we really want, and, even after the speech of the Lord Advocate, I would venture to appeal to the Government to meet us by increasing the size of the Committee. What we want is to have a thorough consideration of the Bill by the Scotch Members, with, at the same time, some English and Irish Members. I think that 20 Scotch Members and 10 Irish and English Members would be an adequate tribunal, and I believe that by making that concession the Government would quicken the progress of the Bill. There is but very little difference between us. We are all agreed, in the main, as to the principle of the Bill which the right hon. Gentleman has described as being the principle of local inquiry. There is no difference of opinion on that point, and I think the Government might, with advantage to the progress of business, accept the proposal I have made. We have no object in the matter except to assist the Government in passing such a measure as shall carry out the wishes of the Scotch people in this matter.

(4.29.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I think the right hon. Gentleman will see that the proportion of Scotch Members will be the same if his suggestion were adopted as in the proposal of the Government, and that he would get no addition of Scotch Members. It is the desire of the Government that the Bill should not only be considered, but passed as the result of the deliberations of the Committee; and, therefore, I submit to the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be better to have a small Committee than a Committee consisting of a large number of Members? I think the right hon. Gentleman is mistaken in supposing that at any time the Government accepted the proposal he has made. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman has no desire to do otherwise than find some method by which the two sides of the House, and particularly the Scotch Members, can arrive at a decision, and I trust the right hon. Gentleman will be satisfied with the Committee as guaranteeing the adequate consideration of the Bill.

(4.31.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): Dealing with the question from a practical point of view, I think I can bring a strong instance to prove that my right hon. Friend has more justice on his side than the right hon. Gentleman opposite. There is the case of the Police Superannuation (Scotland) Bill, which was referred to a Committee, the majority of which were Scotch Members, and they devised a scheme which was accepted with great satisfaction by Scotch Members, and which in the course of the Debates on the English Bill was regarded with great envy by many English Members. The success of that Committee was due to the fact that it was composed of Scotch Members who were interested in the question and who could bring energy, knowledge, and industry to bear on it. I earnestly wish the right hon. Gentleman would follow the example set by his own Government on that occasion, and grant a Committee to deal with Private Bill procedure as the Committee last Session dealt with police superannuation in Scotland.

(4.34.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): This Bill is a bad Bill, and it ought to be referred to a large Committee, something like a Grand Committee. I may, perhaps, be permitted to protest against the idea that in their absence the Independent Members for Scotland are to be bound by whatever the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton may say about the time the discussions will occupy. I think the right hon. Gentleman went a little too far in stating that the discussion of this subject would only occupy an hour and a half.

(4.35.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): After the personal attack my hon. Friend (Sir G. Campbell) has made upon me, I must tell him that he has certainly read a very inaccurate account of what took place. I made no attempt whatever to give an undertaking on behalf of the Scotch Members. In fact, the Scotch Members were represented not only by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone), but by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan). What took place was this: A Scotch Member complained that the matter had not been taken on a Friday night before the Easter Recess, saying that it would not have occupied more than an hour and a half. The First Lord of the Treasury, as he had a right to do, adopted the statement, and assumed that if an hour and a half was sufficient then it would be sufficient on a subsequent occasion.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: What I read was a statement quoted by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, as reported in the Times.

(4.37.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I may be permitted to say that there was no attempt to bind the Scotch Members, and we are aware that in the case of my hon. Friend behind me (Sir G. Campbell) such an attempt would have been entirely ineffectual. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, if I understood him rightly, bases his argument in support of resistance to the present proposal solely on one ground. He says the Bill would get much more quickly through a small than through a large Committee. That may be so or not, but I am disposed, for the sake of argument, to concede it. But permit me to say that is not the only or the main question. The main question is, with what amount of authority will the Bill come back from the Committee? The object of referring Bills to Committees of this kind is to save the House the trouble of labouring through the clauses. This is the ground on which the Scotch Members are in favour of the Amendment before the House. I must say I think there is great force in that consideration, and that it applies especially to a case of this kind. The question is by no means an easy one; and if it were not an easy one, I think the Government would do wisely in obtaining all the assistance they could and the sanction of as large a portion of Scotch opinion as represented in this House as they could. On these grounds I think it would have been wiser to accede to the proposition before the House.

(4.40.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I should like to point out that this is not a proposal, as the right hon. Gentleman suggests, to refer this Bill to a Grand Committee; it is a proposal of a wholly different character. A Grand Committee is a Committee that takes the place of a Committee of the whole House. It is not proposed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leith to refer this Bill to a Committee constituted on that principle at all, but to a Committee of 100 Members, before whom the discussion would be of a very lengthy character. Our desire is, firstly, that this Bill should be thoroughly considered upstairs; and, secondly, that it should afterwards be passed. We believe it would pass by referring it, first of all, to a Committee of reasonable dimensions, and for this reason: We admit the measure contains novel principles, and we believe those novel principles will best be discussed by a small Committee than by a Committee composed of so many Members as 100. We think our proposal is the better one in the interest of the Bill itself, and we claim the support of all those who desire to see the Bill passed into law during the present Session.

(4.44.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): The right hon. Gentleman has altogether missed the point of this Amendment. The point is not whether the Committee is to consist of 20 or 100 persons, but whether it is to be a Committee representing Scotch and Liberal opinion, or English and Tory opinion. According to the suggestion of the Lord Advocate, the Committee will be so constituted that the voice of the Scotch Members may be entirely overpowered, and a Bill brought out of the Committee which may be at variance with Scotch opinion, although it may not even be in conformity with English opinion. Hon. Members ought not to deceive themselves by irrelevant questions as to the numbers of the Committee. The question is, whether Scotchmen are to have their own way or not. I am persuaded it will be said in Scotland, "Here is a measure exclusively Scotch, and yet the Government say that the Scotch people shall not have their affairs managed according to their own ideas, but according to English ideas."

Main Question again proposed.

(4.58.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): Before the Main Question is disposed of, I wish to say it is not my intention to move the Amendment of which I have given notice, substituting for the name of the hon. Member for Leeds that of the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire. Of course, it is hardly necessary to add that my Amendment was in no sense directed against the hon. Member for Leeds personally, but intended simply to carry out the wishes of a great many Members on this side of the House who come from Scotland, that the Committee should be largely, if not entirely, Scotch. I am not particularly sorry that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leith has been defeated, and I do not desire to renew the discussion upon it. But, as allusion has been made to the feeling which is said to exist in Scotland in favour of the main principle of this Bill, perhaps I may be permitted to say a few words upon that point. I admit there is a strong and general sentiment in Scotland in favour of some kind of local inquiry in connection with Private Bill legislation relating to Scotland; but I deny entirely that there is any feeling in favour of the particular method the Government have adopted for solving the question. The great objection to the Bill is that the Government are interpolating into the proceedings of the House an alien and extraneous body, to whom they are giving a power unknown in the House. If the Government will refrain from tying the hands of the House in disposing of its own business; if they will not give to any official or judicial persons the right of amending a Bill in its progress through this House, or the right to stop a Bill, I venture to say all difficulties will be removed. I do not know whether I am quite in order in making this suggestion now, but I should be glad to have an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman on the subject.

*(5.0.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid I should be out of order if I proceeded to enter into a discussion of this matter now. On the part of the Government, I can only say that we are anxious that the Committee should have a free hand, and I believe it would be in the power of the Committee to consider the suggestion made by the hon. Member.

*(5.1.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): The alternative suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stirling Burghs, that the Committee should consist of 30 Members, is one that meets with the approval of Scotch Members generally; and as my right hon. Friend stated at length the reasons upon which that alternative proposal recommended I will now limit myself to the Motion that 30 be substituted for 20.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is incompetent for the hon. Member to do that, the House having decided that 20 shall stand part of the Question. The Question now is, "That the Committee do consist of 20 Members."

(5.2.) DR. CLARK: Am I to understand that the Government are not willing to yield in the slightest degree, and are determined to have this Committee constituted as they propose? Now, the predecessors of the present Government, when they had an important Scotch Bill before the House, admitted after the Second Reading the principle of Scottish Home Rule, and referred the Bill to a Committee of 25, upon which Committee there were no Irish Members and only a few English Members, and these last were included because of their special knowledge of the working of the Public Health Act in England, and so in the arrangement of a Public Health Act for Scotland the experience of these gentlemen was of value. So the principle, that a Bill bearing exclusively upon Scotland should have its details determined by a Committee of Scottish Members, was admitted by the predecessors of the present Government.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member would be out of Order in discussing the Bill or the number of Members now.

DR. CLARK: I am arguing Sir, in favour of the omission of the names of English Members.

*MR. SPEAKER: That will come afterwards on a Motion to substitute one name for another. The Question now is, "That the Committee do consist of 20 Members."

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of 20 Members.

Mr. Gerald Balfour, Dr. Cameron, Mr. James Campbell, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Dr. Clark, Mr. Arthur Elliot, Sir Archibald Orr Ewing nominated Members of the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Flynn be one other Member of the Committee."—(The Lord Advocate.)

(5.8.) DR. CLARK: I should like to ask who is responsible for the nomination of Mr. Flynn, and if Mr. Flynn is willing to serve. As I am going to make an objection to another name for the reasons I have mentioned, so also I will take a Division against this name of a gentleman against whom there is no other objection, and who is one of our allies on this side of the House. The late Lord Advocate conceded the principle that an exclusively Scotch Bill should be considered by a Committee of Scotchmen, and even the present Government carried the concession further with the last Scotch Bill referred to a Select Committee. All the Members proposed for that Committee were Scotch Members, though when the Solicitor General was promoted to a Judgeship, they appointed an English Member to replace him on the Committee. Eighteen of the nineteen Members of the Committee on the Police Superannuation (Scotland) Bill last Session were Scotch, and the nineteenth was an old Scotch Member, and, probably, did good service on the Committee as such. But the Government are now going back from the principle they then conceded, because, I suppose, they think that the Home Rule idea is dying out, and they can oppose it with greater success. But in that they are mistaken, as later on they will discover. I object to the name of Mr. Flynn, simply because I think this Committee should be composed entirely of Scotch-

SIR G. TREVELYAN: I think my hon. Friend would do well to withdraw his objection. We hope this Committee will prove a practical success, and it will probably set a precedent of the greatest importance for other parts of the Kingdom. There is no personal objection to Mr. Flynn, there is not the objection to him that there is to another gentleman nominated, that he is at the moment thousands of miles away. I am informed that Mr. Flynn will be in regular attendance probably during the whole time the Committee is sitting. I think myself it is most unfortunate that several extremely valuable Scotch Members are not included in the Committee, but the proposition being what it is, I doubt whether we shall improve the composition of the Committee by displacing one of the Members from Ireland whose attendance on the Committee will be possible.

Question put, and agreed to.

Sir Julian Goldsmid, Sir Edward Harland, Mr. Hunter, Mr. Leng, Mr. M'Ewan, Colonel Malcolm, Sir Stafford Northcote, nominated Members of the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. O'Kelly be one other Member of the Committee." — (The Lord Advocate.)

DR. CLARK: I must object to the name of Mr. O'Kelly, who is at this moment some 6,000 miles away.

(5.14.) The House divided:—Ayes 213; Noes 124.—(Div. List, No. 120.)

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): With reference to the last Division, I may be allowed to say that if any hon. Member had communicated with me to the effect that there would be an objection raised to the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon, I should have been most happy to have met the objection and the wishes of the minority by submitting another name to the House.

Mr. Charles Parker, Mr. Secretary Stanhope, Mr. Mark Stewart, and the Lord Advocate nominated other Members of the Committee.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.

*(5.25.) MR. SPEAKER: Three notices of Motion for Instructions to the Committee stand on the Paper. The first of these stands in the name of the hon. Member for West Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) instructing the Committee that they have—

"Power to insert Clauses in the Bill to provide that Railway and other Companies desiring to obtain Parliamentary powers to close, enter upon, or interfere with a right of way shall serve notices upon the council or councils of the district within which such right of way extends."

That refers to a preliminary procedure which is now subject to, and under the jurisdiction of the Examiners, and governed by Standing Orders in relation to Private Bills. True it is, that under a section of the Bill, County Councils and Town Councils may make reports upon a Bill; but that is after the Bill has taken its formal and definite shape. This proposal would alter the preliminary procedure previous to the Bill being presented to Parliament, and is, therefore, outside the scope of the present Bill, and contemplates an alteration in Private Bill procedure previous to the Bill being put into the form in which the House is asked to adopt it. This Instruction, therefore, cannot be moved. The next Instruction is in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), that the Committee shall—"Have power to make provision for the simplification of the procedure and the reduction of the cost of Provisional Orders."

The right hon. Gentleman will be in Order in moving that. The third Instruction in the name of the hon. Member for the St. Rollox Division (Mr. Caldwell) is to give the Committee—

"Power to substitute a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament for the Commission as set forth in the Bill, and that the Joint Committee or Commission, as the case may be, be empowered to dispense with local inquiry."

This would be quite out of Order. It is a proposal to substitute an entirely new tribunal for that proposed in the Bill, and it will be in the recollection of the House that in the Debate upon the Second Reading the House rejected an Amendment embodying a similar proposal.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, after this ruling, and if local inquiry is the essential principle of the Bill, the Government intend to proceed with a Bill involving so great a constitutional change as the exclusion of this consideration from Committee of both Houses of Parliament?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I do not know whether I shall be in order in answering that question now, but I think I have answered it repeatedly, and we adhere to our proposals.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I gave an undertaking before we separated for the Easter Recess, that I would not make a speech on moving my Instruction, and to that undertaking I adhere. My simple desire is that the Committee should not have a mandatory, but an optional, Instruction, and may, if they think fit, deal with the question of simplification of the procedure and reduction in the cost of Provisional Orders. In this, I believe, may be found a remedy for the great cost and delay in Private Bill Legislation—in an extension of the Provisional Order System in Scotland. I have it on the authority of the President of the Board of Trade that 37 Provisional Orders were granted last year without opposition, and at comparatively small cost, and I think it is desirable that the Committee should have the option of considering the question as regards Scotland. So I formally move the Instruction with no desire to initiate a Debate now or fetter the action of the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to make provision for the simplification of the procedure and the reduction of the cost of Provisional Orders."—(Mr. H. H. Fowler.)

MR. A. SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I will only say a few words in support of this Motion. There are cases in Scotland at the present time in relation to which a reduction in the cost of Provisional Orders would be highly beneficial. The Government have intimated an intention of granting money for piers and harbours, and this is highly appreciated by the localities. The best way of managing such harbours would be to constitute Harbour Trusts, and, I think, in this respect, it is of the highest importance that the Government should accept the Instruction of the right hon. Gentleman.

*(5.30.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I at once acknowledge the spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. Fowler) has acted up to the understanding at which we arrived before the holidays; but the Government find themselves in this position. They are passing an Order, relating not to Provisional Orders, but to Bills. They are desirous that the Committee stage in both Houses of Parliament should be undertaken by a Commission or Committee sitting on a Bill. That is a totally distinct kind of procedure from that respecting Provisional Orders. We are prepared to consider the question of Provisional Orders, and, if necessary, to appoint a Committee to inquire into it.

*(5.34.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot quite follow some of the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman. He says the Bill has nothing to do with Provisional Orders; but, as a matter of fact, it does deal with Provisional Orders, inasmuch as private legislation is necessary to confirm Provisional Orders. Then he says, if any change is made with regard to the procedure as to Provisional Orders it ought to be simultaneously proposed for England, Ireland, and Scotland; but that observation would apply to all the private business of this House with quite as much force. A very slight inquiry into the condition of the feeling in Scotland on the subject, as disclosed before the Committee which sat a few years ago, will show that the greatest complaints were made by the Scotch witnesses with reference to the very class of business dealt with in Provisional Orders. The complaints as to the cost and the cumbrous nature of the present system were addressed much more to the want of greater freedom with regard to Provisional Orders or larger powers on the part of Local Authorities than to any alteration of the system of Bill procedure. The right hon. Gentleman says the Government will consent to the appointment of a Committee to inquire how the system of Provisional Orders may be extended and facilitated. If we are to understand that as a deliberate proposal made by the Government, I think my right hon. Friend might very well withdraw his Instruction. I should be glad, however, to have a distinct understanding on the matter.

*(5.37.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I do not think there is really any great difference of opinion between the two sides of the House. The Committee which is to consider this Bill will receive evidence from Scotland, and undoubtedly it will receive representations with regard to the working of Provisional Orders in that country. It will be perfectly competent to the Committee, when they have dealt with the Bills before them, to make a Special Report to the House on the subject of Provisional Orders. That being done, the House can instruct the same Committee or appoint a fresh Committee to go into the question of Provisional Orders.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I presume, then, that no Instruction is necessary to enable the Committee to inquire into the question of the Provisional Orders.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Subject to your ruling, Sir, I should think it would be open to the Committee to consider the subject of the Provisional Order Bills.

(5.38.) DR. CLARK: I hope the Government will reconsider this point, because one of the things we want to avoid is to have double fight. Undoubtedly if a Provisional Order is unopposed, it is a cheap and easy means of obtaining Parliamentary sanction to a scheme, but if it is opposed a double fight becomes necessary. As the Secretary for War has indicated that it is only a question of procedure, I trust measures will be taken to prevent double fights taking place.

(5.39.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to you upon this point—whether in your judgment it would be competent for the Committee to go into the question of Provisional Orders without an Instruction?

MR. SPEAKER: I think it would be much safer to adopt an Instruction. If the Committee were not empowered to deal with the question of Provisional Orders they could not embody recommendations respecting them in the Bill, although they could make a Special Report.

(5.40.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton. It must be obvious that what we wish to do is to simplify and cheapen the process of obtaining Private Bill Legislation on Scottish matters. The Secretary of State for War has admitted that the best course to adopt would be to consider the two modes of procedure together. The right hon. Gentleman let slip that expression. If we do not do that—if, before deciding what we are about to do in the matter of Provisional Orders, we proceed to settle our machinery for Private Bill legislation—it seems to me we shall be putting the cart before the horse. The first thing to do is to see how we can simplify the existing system, and then we want to see what we can do in the way of improving the present system of Parliamentary inquiry in regard to Private Bills by investigation on the spot. There is another point of order that suggests itself. You, Sir, have held that the Instruction proposed to be given by my hon. Friend and Colleague the Member for the St. Rollox Division of Glasgow is out of order as contrary to the principle of the Bill, as affirmed on its Second Reading. The First Lord of the Treasury, when speaking of the proposition of the Government on this matter told us that the principle was local inquiry by a Commission or a Committee. My hon. Friend proposes to give the Committee on the Bill the option of choosing between these bodies. You, Sir, have told us that an Instruction giving that option to the Committee would be contrary to the principle of the Bill; and I should, therefore, like to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he adheres to his statement that the Government are prepared, if not to accept, at all events to consider a suggestion for the substitution of a Joint Committee of this House and the other House of Parliament in lieu of the Commission proposed in the Bill? The right hon. Gentleman, from his description of the principle of the Bill as a local inquiry by a Commission or Committee, appears still to entertain the idea mooted in his correspondence with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs. I wish to ask if it would be competent for the House to give effect to that idea after your ruling, Sir?

*(5.45.) MR. SPEAKER: The Commission will have power to hold local inquiries.

(5.45.) DR. CAMERON: Yes; but I am referring to an alternative proposal that there should be a Joint Committee of the two Houses of Parliament, which was seriously put forward by the First Lord of the Treasury in his correspondence with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs.

*(5.46.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I am anxious that there shall be no mistake in this matter. The correspondence the hon. Member refers to was definite in its character. The body which is to conduct the local inquiry is to consist of two Commissioners and Representatives of the House of Commons and the House of Lords. That is a modification which we undertook to accept in Committee. As to Provisional Orders, the Bill itself includes all Bills for the confirmation of Provisional Orders. The Government have no objection to the principle of the recommendation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton; on the contrary, they desire to lessen the cost of, and to simplify the process of, Provisional Orders. But they desire that this Bill shall be passed this Session, and they do not, therefore, want to load it with words that may imperil its passing.

*(5.48.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I understand that the proposal now is that the Committee shall first examine the Bill before it, and that then it will be open to them to proceed to the simplification, and the modification of the expense, of Provisional Orders. That will satisfy hon. Members on this side of the House, if Mr. Speaker is of opinion that it can be done.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: On that understanding, I consent to the Instruction.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Instruction is "to make provision for" and not "to inquire into." If the House thinks that the distinction is immaterial, I will put the question as it is on the Paper.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I would suggest that it would be better that the words of the Instruction should be "To inquire into and make provision for."

*(5.50.) MR. W. H. SMITH: It is desirable that the two inquiries should be distinct, because it may happen that when the Committee has considered this Bill, they may desire to have an addition to their numbers from amongst the English and Irish Members, with a view to the consideration of the Provisional Order system as a system.

Question put, as amended,

"That it be an Instruction to the Select Committee on the Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, that they have power to inquire into and make provision for the simplification of the procedure and the reduction of the cost of Provisional Orders,"—(Mr. H. H. Fowler), —and agreed to.

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) [ADVANCES, &c.]

Resolutions reported;

1. "That it is expedient to authorise—

(a.) the temporary advance out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of any sums that may be required for making good any deficiency in the Land Purchase Account for the payment of dividends on guaranteed Land Stock and payments to the Sinking Fund;

(b.) an annual Exchequer contribution of £40,000 out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom to the Guarantee Fund;

(c.) the payment out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of the salaries of the Land Commissioners."

2. "That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of the salaries, remuneration, and administrative expenses of the Congested Districts Board, in pursuance of any Act of the present Session relating to the Purchase of Land in Ireland, the Land Commission, and the Congested Districts in Ireland."

First Resolution read a second time.

*(551.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to move, in line 8, to leave out "the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom," and insert "moneys to be provided by Parliament." I wish to explain that I move now, instead of having done so when the Resolution was considered in Committee, because the Resolution was only proposed at the last hour of the autumn Session without sufficient notice. Only one day's previous notice was given that this Resolution would be on the Paper, and although the hon. and learned Member for Longford objected to its being passed, it was taken, as the First Lord of the Treasury said at the time, as a formal procedure. I think, therefore, that we are now entitled to discuss it so far as it introduces—as I think I shall be able to show it does introduce—a serious change in procedure in reference to our administration of public money. The Resolution says—

"Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of the salaries of the Land Commissioners."

I propose to leave out the words "the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom," in order to insert the words I have mentioned. This Amendment raises two questions of grave importance; first, the responsibility to Parliament of one of the executive Departments of the Government; and, secondly, the supreme and sole control of the House of Commons over all public expenditure. The three Land Commissioners were constituted by the Land Act of 1881. There is a Judicial Commissioner, and there are two—as I may call them for the purposes of my argument—lay Commissioners. The Judicial Commissioner is to rank as one of the Judges of the Supreme Court, and to hold office on the same tenure and at the same salary; therefore, he is to be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, and is only removable on an address being presented to Her Majesty by both Houses of Parliament.

The two lay Commissioners, under the Act of 1881, are paid £3,000 a year each out of moneys to be provided by Parliament. In 1885, under the Ashbourne Act, two additional Commissioners were added to the Land Commission at £2,000 a year for three years only, holding office on the same tenure in all respects as the lay Commissioners under the Act of 1881. At first sight it may seem that there is very little difference between taking the payment of a man's salary out of the Consolidated Fund and taking it out of the moneys to be provided by Parliament, because, practically, the Consolidated Fund is provided by Parliament out of the annual taxation of the year. When we hear the Budget next week, or the week after, we shall find that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will divide his expenditure for the year into three branches. He will tell us what is the charge for the debt, he will tell us what is the charge for the payment out of the Consolidated Fund, and he will tell us what he estimates to be the Supply Services for the year, which will have to be voted in the usual way in Committee of Supply. Payments out of the Consolidated Fund are distinct from the Supply Services. They include the Civil List, certain annuities and pensions and salaries to high Officers of State. All these payments are taken out of the jurisdiction of Parliament. Then, the Consolidated Fund provides for the salaries payable to the Judges. I have no doubt I shall be told, when I am replied to, that the reason for putting the salaries mentioned in the Resolution on the Consolidated Fund is that they are something akin to payments in respect of the Courts of Justice. There are obvious reasons why the Judges should be practically independent of Parliament. This House has never in any sense renounced its control over the Judiciary. I think it a sound Constitutional principle that this House has the right to inquire into the administration of justice in every Court of the land, and it has from time to time exerted that power. But it would not be seemly that the salaries of the Judges should be annually voted in this House and made subject to a certain class of criticism. I think it unfortunate that the County Court Judges have been placed on this footing. It would have been desirable if their salaries had been left to be annually voted by the House, and if that had been done we should not have witnessed the scandals which have been disclosed in a recent Return presented to the House, nearly half the County Court Judges of England being shown to have sat less than 150 days last year. But none of the officials I have mentioned have anything to do with the administration of the funds of the State. The whole of the rest of the Civil Service, including the Diplomatic and Consular Services, have their salaries paid out of moneys to be provided by Parliament. That is, the House has only the right and duty thrown upon it of voting their payment. It is totally irrespective of their appointments. I am not proposing this Amendment with reference to their tenure of office. The tenure of a Civil servant has always been, and I hope will always be, dependent on good behaviour. I do not believe there is a single instance in which the House has interfered, save in the interests of economy. It has never, so to speak, visited its displeasure upon any Department of the Civil Service, or dealt individually with a Civil servant. The gist of the whole arrangement is this, that these officers are responsible to the House of Commons, and the very fact of that knowledge existing, I am sure prevents any misconduct. I will take the House through a certain number of semi-judicial officers of the Civil Service. There are all the Inspectors of the Local Government Board. There are the Lunacy Commissioners, who perform most important judicial functions. Upon their fiat depends incarceration for life, or a certain number of years, of a considerable class of the community. The Vote for the Lunacy Commissioners is submitted annually to the House. Then the Charity Commissioners of England and Wales exercise not only most important administrative, but most important judicial, duties with respect to a large class of property. Yet their decisions are subject to the criticism of the House of Commons on the occasion of the Vote for their salaries. Take the Railway Commissioners. The head of that Commission is a Judge of the Supreme Court whose salary is on the Consolidated Fund, but the salaries of the two

lay Commissioners are voted by this House. But there is this difference between the Railway and Land Commissioners. The Lord Chancellor can remove the lay Commissioners for misconduct. There is no provision for the removal of the Land Commissioners. I will come down to Ireland. No doubt the Chief Secretary is aware that the two Irish Judges of Bankruptcy cannot be removed except by an address from both Houses, yet that their salaries are voted by this House. Then there are the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and the recently appointed Scotch Crofters' Commissioners. Throughout the whole length and breadth of the Civil Service the policy has been, whether right or wrong, that there should be effective Parliamentary control over every part of the Public Service, by placing the salaries of the officials upon the Estimates. This is not only of advantage to the Public Service, but it is of great value to the officials themselves. If they are subject to Parliamentary control, they have also the confidence and approval of Parliament; and they feel a moral strength in the discharge of their duties which they would not otherwise possess. Why does the Chief Secretary propose this change? What mischief has arisen in the administration of Ireland between the year 1881 and the year 1890 from the fact of the salaries of the Land Commissioners being voted precisely as the salaries of other officials are voted? I do not think their duties are of a very judicial character. They adjudicate as between landlord and tenant, but I do not think that adjudication is strictly a judicial decision so much as a calculation made for the purpose of arbitration. Besides, their task is coming to an end. They have disposed of 300,000 tenants, which represents about three-fourths of their work. And under the new Act their duties will be purely administrative, and will consist in advancing money to the Irish tenants to enable them to purchase the estates of their landlords. I cannot conceive a case of stronger necessity for Parliamentary control. Look at the mischief which might be done if you had a Land Commission absolutely irresponsible to the Chief Secretary and the Lord Lieutenant, and put upon the footing of the Judges, who are removable only by an Address from both Houses. You would have no Parliamentary responsibility; you would at once introduce political influence. Having got men placed there through political influence, they may make ducks and drakes of our money; they may play the fool all round, and this House will have to pay the money, and will have no power to stop the men who are spending our money. There can be no duties which these Commissioners have to perform which can approach the duties performed by Sir Reginald Welby or Sir Algernon West, of the Treasury and Inland Revenue, and whose salaries are voted by Parliament. Perhaps the Chancellor of the Exchequer will explain the reason of this strange suggestion, namely, that the House of Commons is to cease to be the sole and final authority for the control of the expenditure of the State. Remember, when you place a payment on the Consolidated Fund, you have no further control over it, except with the consent of the House of Lords. While that is a right principle with regard to the Judges of the land and certain great Officers of State, these administrators of public money cannot for a moment be placed on the same footing. I move this Amendment on the ground of policy, on the ground of precedent, and on the ground of principle. It is an unwise policy to remove a Department which is going to have the control of £40,000,000 or £50,000,000 from the control of the House of Commons. I trust the House will not make any change in our constitutional procedure, for which no justification has been offered, which would involve a great many mischiefs in the future, and which I think is a source of danger to the administration of the Land Law of Ireland and destructive of the control of this House over the expenditure of the country.

Amendment proposed, in line 8, to leave out the words "the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom," and insert the words "moneys to be provided by Parliament,"—(Mr. Henry H. Fowler,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Resolution."

(6.15.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton has raised with great clearness and ability a point which the House will have to determine with regard to the salaries of the principal officers connected with the Land Commission in Ireland. With the general principle which the right hon. Gentleman has laid down, that the Civil servants should be responsible, not merely to Parliamentary control, to the control of the House of Commons, but that that responsibility should be brought home to them by the fact that their salaries were annually voted, I need not say I do not quarrel at all. The Government do not differ from the right hon. Gentleman upon any question of general principle which appears to regulate the Civil Service, but we hold that these Land Commissioners ought to be regarded as belonging to the more limited category of public officials whose salaries are placed on the Consolidated Fund. Whether that is so or not is the plain issue before the House. The Government have deliberately adopted the view that the salaries of these officials ought not to be voted by Parliament, but ought to be placed, as the salaries of other Judges are, upon the Consolidated Fund. It will be agreed that there is justification for withdrawing from the arena of Party conflict in this House the salaries of those who are called upon to exercise anything in the nature of judicial functions, so that they may exercise them independently without any fear of pecuniary loss. The right hon. Gentleman says he does not propose to interfere with the tenure of the office. The tenure of an office may be made as absolute as you will, but if the salary has to be voted by the House of Commons it would be futile to describe the tenure as permanent. No office can be described as permanent if the salary attached to it depends upon an annual Vote. It is true there are two Judges in Ireland who hold office by a permanent tenure, and whose salaries are, nevertheless, voted by the House of Commons. Those are the two bankruptcy Judges. But this position is anomalous and unjustifiable, and if the question should be raised whether they ought not to be placed in the same position as other Judges, there is no general principle on which the existing irrational exception can be defended. If those bankruptcy Judges chose to claim that their salaries should be placed on the Consolidated Fund it would be impossible to resist that claim. The principle being accepted that the salaries of Judges should be placed upon the Consolidated Fund, because if they have to be annually voted by this House the Judges would be brought under the control of a majority necessarily swayed by Party and political motives—the question arises whether the principle is applicable to the particular cases of these Commissioners. I maintain that it is applicable to a degree to which it is not in the cases of some other judicial functionaries. Of course, when the arrangement was made that judicial salaries should be withdrawn from the discretion of Parliament, it was intended that the Judges should be made independent of Court and other influence, and that object is fully attained. But are not the questions which these Commissioners would have to determine the very questions which divide parties and classes in Ireland, and about which controversies have raged? Of all functionaries, are not these Commissioners officials who ought to be protected from the pressure of Party majorities and Party leaders? We have only to look back to the discussions that have taken place upon the Estimates for this Commission, to see the kind of pressure that Members of the House have tried to exert. The Commission has been denounced as having served the interests of the landlords or of the tenants in the decisions they have given, and such denunciations are sure to be heard in the future. In that way pressure would be placed upon these officials by those who represented the majority of occupiers. The right hon. Gentleman appears to be under the impression that the business of the Land Commission is nearly over, but he forgets that rents are fixed for no longer than 15 years, and that on the expiration of that time tenants may come to the Court again. Further, a promise to lower the rents has been habitually held out by Nationalist politicians as a reason for returning them to power. The facts furnish as strong an argument as ever was urged in the 17th century for making English Judges independent of the chance of a Parliamentary majority and the storm and stress of Party discussion. The duties these Commissioners have to perform are judicial duties in the most important sense of the term. They have to decide questions of property affecting every man in Ireland—whether masses of property shall or shall not be transferred from one class to another; they have to decide between landlord and tenant, and it is idle to say that, if these men are made the slaves of the Government of the day—if you place them under the control of the House, as Sir Reginald Welby was under the control of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—their position could command, as it ought to command, the respect of any class in Ireland. In that case they would always be regarded as the slaves of the Party in office, as the tools of the Executive, and either tenants or landlords, owners or occupiers, would have a sense of injustice and grievance. Parliament has passed an Act unparalleled, perhaps, in any country in the world, which handed over to half a dozen men the control of all the landed property of the country, and it ought not to refuse to those men the independence which would enable them to discharge their trust to the best of their judgment, with perfect safety to their own position. For these reasons I hope the House will see that the question of tenure is one of vital importance, and will support the Government in making that tenure independent of the action of the House.

(6.23.) Mr. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I have listened with a good deal of interest to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, who has founded his opposition to the Amendment on his desire to free the Land Commissioners from Government or Parliamentary control, and I must say that I am at a loss to imagine how, after what he has said, he will be able to defend the positions of the removable Magistrates of Ireland, who are not merely judicial officers, but who are also executive officers, in strict subordination to himself. My object in rising, however, is to offer a few words with regard to another part of the right hon. Gentleman's observations. He has compared the control of the House at the present time to the control exercised by the Crown in the 17th Century, and pointed out that as the Judges were removed at that time from the influence of the Crown, it would be a matter of public benefit that these officers should be removed from the influence of the House of Commons in the present century on similar grounds. The fact is that the proposal to place the salaries of these Commissioners on the Consolidated Fund is not a proposal to remove them from the control of Parliament; but rather to remove them from the control of the House of Commons, while leaving them to the control of the House of Lords. When the right hon. Gentleman says he desires the removal of the Commissioners from the hostile criticism of this House because of the judicial duties they have to discharge, I would point out that they do not discharge what can fairly be termed judicial duties. The duties they discharge are, on the contrary, administrative or executive duties relating to the application of enormous sums of money. Those duties the right hon. Gentleman desires to place outside the control of this House, but, in my opinion, we ought to have some means of watching over them, so that we may see how those gentlemen dispose of the funds placed under their control. For my part, I am in thorough agreement with the right hon. Gentleman who has moved the Amendment to the Resolution and I will go even a step further. I hold that none except the very highest Officers of the State ought to be relieved of the liability of having their salaries annually reviewed by this House. The County Court Judges derive their salaries from the Consolidated Fund, but they are in a different position from the Land Commissioners, because they are removable by the Lord Chancellor. The Superior Judges are also paid from the Consolidated Fund, but they discharge duties of a totally different character to those of the Land Commissioners. I shall give my vote most heartily to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, because it seems to me that the real vice of the Government proposal lies somewhat deeper than the issue raised by the Chief Secretary. It consists in this: that the object of the Government in this Bill is to set up a financial scheme which is to permit the expenditure during a period of from 20 to 30 years of a sum amounting to something like 30,000,000 of money, and it is proposed that the expenditure of this vast sum is to be made outside the control of the House of Commons. The proposal to place the salaries of these Commissioners beyond the control of this House is, I think, contrary to the practice of the Constitution. Indeed, I think that nothing could be more contrary to the practice of the Constitution than the object with which this proposal is made, namely, to enable Her Majesty's Government to deprive this House for some 20 years or more of any control over the growing annual and constant expenditure of an enormous amount of national money.

(6.28.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The right hon. Gentleman in the speech he has just delivered has stated that it was very desirable that the Land Commissioners should not be treated in the same way as Civil servants, but I would ask is it not the fact that there is a proverbial stinginess on the part of the Treasury in proposing first to put the salaries of these gentlemen on the Consolidated Fund, and then in taking precautions in the matter of their pensions that they are to be placed on the footing of Civil servants? When a Judge, whose period of service has only lasted for half an hour, becomes incapacitated for the performance of his duties, whether by ill-health or by any other cause, he is entitled to a pension; but a Civil servant is bound to serve a period of 10 years before he can have the right to any pension at all. We contend that it is inconsistent to raise these gentlemen beyond the position of Civil servants, but at the same time to say that they shall be put upon that footing in regard to the payment of their pensions. That is the first observation I have to make on this matter. I now come to my second point. There are two Bills before the House: one is a Land Department Bill and the other a Land Commission Bill. This Resolution deals, as I take it, with the Land Commission. What is the Land Commission? Are we to have a Land Commission and a Land Department? The House has been led into a position of embarrassment because, first of all, there is to be a Ways and Means Resolution for the payment out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of the salaries of the Land Commissioners, who, as I understand, will be three—Mr. M'Carthy, Mr. Lynch, and the Judicial Commissioner, Mr. Justice Bowley; and secondly, we are to have a Bill to deal with Mr. Wrench, Mr. Fitzgerald, and the whole number of Sub-Commissioners. It is most inconvenient to treat these two Bodies in two Bills, one of which may not come on this Session at all.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The intention, and I believe the effect, of Section 10 of the Bill now before the House is to make permanent the judicial tenure of the lay Commissioners.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: I looked into that point before I rose, and—I speak with great submission—I arrived at the contrary conclusion. There is no section in the first Bill defining what a Land Commissioner is, and in the second Bill you say there shall be constituted a Land Department for Ireland consisting, in the first instance, of these Land Commissioners, one or more of whom shall be styled Judicial Land Commissioners. In the first Resolution you provide for the salaries of the Land Commissioners, and that means the Land Purchase Commissioners; and by the second Resolution, which may never be reached, you deal with the Land Department. It is clear I am right, because you deal twice over in two separate Resolutions with the Land Commissioners. Why do you do it? The contention of the Chief Secretary amounts to an absurdity. I think I have established my proposition that you have no very great desire to proceed with the Land Department Bill this Session. I presume you intend to use it next year as an excuse for not giving us local government; you will accept the dictum of the Member for West Birmingham that you must deal with the land before local government. It must be remembered that we have been sitting here since November, and that the idea is that we are to rise in May or June—I do not know exactly which month it is. Last year on the Land Commission Bill, and this Session in the Debate on the Second Reading of this Bill, I raised the very question now under consideration. The matter is much more serious than the Chief Secretary imagines. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the case of the Bankruptcy Judges in Ireland. Ever since the Bankruptcy Acts were passed these Judges have been quite comfortable, drawing their salaries through the annual Estimates. The Bankruptcy Judges are not Judges of the Superior Court, neither are the Land Commissioners. What is the first requisite of a Judge of the Superior Court? He must have at least 10 years' experience at the Bar. Mr. Lynch is a layman and Mr. M'Carthy is a solicitor. Am I to be told that such gentlemen are to be elevated to the rank of Judges? There are two Bankruptcy Judges. They must be persons—I was going to say in modern phraseology "of whose legal knowledge the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied." They must be gentlemen of standing at the Bar: men who require to have 10 years' experience at the Bar are placed on the ordinary Estimates of the year, while laymen, forsooth, are to be raised to the position of Judges of the Superior Court, and their salaries placed on the Consolidated Fund. There is another and still stronger argument. We have not only the precedent of the Bankruptcy Judges, but we have the precedent of the Land Commission. The Land Commission has been 10 years in existence. I should like to have heard the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian with the howling wolves—but the expression is consecrated—with the tumultuous Tories facing him, propose that the salaries of the Commissioners who were to cut down the rents of the Tory landlords should be placed on the Consolidated Fund. What did the present First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) do? So jealous were the Tory Party of the new departure that the present First Lord of the Treasury proposed at that time that the Lord Lieutenant should issue a Royal Commission at the end of seven years to wind up the whole affair. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was on the point of accepting that proposition, when I intervened. It is now proposed, when the burden and the heat of the Commissioners' labours are over, and when, instead of fixing rents, which may be supposed—though I could never understand it—to be a judicial function, when they will only have to ladle out the sovereigns after an agreement arrived at between landlord and tenant, to place them on the Consolidated Fund. I have here some mouldy records, which I made at the time, of the way in which the Marquess of Salisbury spoke of the Land Commissioners. He called Mr. John George M'Carthy—one of the very gentlemen who is now to be placed on the Consolidated Fund—one of the fiercest of the Sub-Commissioners. That shows the jealousy with which those appointments were at that time regarded, when they were made for the cutting down of rents. How much more cause now exists for jealousy, when it is intended, so to speak, to give the landlords permanent annuities. Sub-Commissioner Meek was described by Lord Salisbury as one of the most violent persecutors of the landlords. I understand that the gentleman, having turned Liberal Unionist, has since then got a little job from Her Majesty's Government. Nor can we forget the name by which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet (Mr. J. Lowther) dubbed the Sub-Commissioners—"sub-confiscators." I have myself heard denunciations in the House of Lords of these appointments by Peers like the Earl of Donoughmore, the Marquess of Lansdowne, the Earl of Kilmorey, Earl Cairns, and the Marquess of Waterford, but I will not trouble the House by repeating them. Why take from this House the power of reviewing these appointments, and of reviewing the way in which the holders of them act, while allowing it to remain in the Chamber across the Lobby? The Land Act had not been in operation six months when Lord Salisbury, in another place, moved for a Committee to inquire into the character of the Commissioners and into their conduct; but if this proposal were adopted, and a Liberal Administration came into Office in the morning, we should be powerless. This is a matter vital to the case of the tenants. If Parliament puts the salaries of these Commissioners on the Consolidated Fund it will destroy the only means at the disposition of the Representatives of the people of keeping that jealous eye upon them which is absolutely essential, while the House of Lords, the permanent landlord barracks, will be left with the amplest opportunities for criticism. You never dreamt of making this proposal until you had rigged the Land Commission with Tory appointments. You wish to have the benefit of two systems—removables and irremovables. The removables, of course, you only require while you are in Office, and you know they will be dismissed when your successors come into power. But long after you have passed away—which we trust will be soon—this £30,000,000 sterling will have to be spent, and you are taking care that the gentlemen who are to spend it shall have Office for the time of their natural lives. I do not object to the sum you propose to spend—the larger the merrier. But I object to giving such a large amount to spend, and at the same time withdrawing the spendees of the money from all Parliamentary control—a control which the House of Commons enjoyed when only £5,000,000 were involved. I therefore say that this is exactly the Bill in which this course ought not to have been taken. £30,000,000 is a very large sum to spend, and at least the salaries of its administrators ought to remain upon the annual Public Estimates. Throughout my remarks I have not referred to the question of the fixing of fair rents, because I assume that that will be brought up under the second Resolution; but I wish to ask the Government whether they propose by their construction that the words "Land Commissioner" should include Sub-Commissioner?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman says "No." Well, I have not the Land Act of 1881 just now in my hands, but I venture to say that it will entirely depend on the construction of the Act whether it is so or not. The Treasury Clerks who have to administer this matter may take an entirely different view of the law, and that is another reason why this House should not allow any loophole capable of inducing action contrary to the received intention and purpose of Parliament. I trust that the Government will even yet allow wisdom and prudence to prevail. This is a Resolution which requires to pass through two stages, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolver-hampton pointed out when it came on on the 9th December last. I objected, but as at that moment our minds were burthened with other considerations we did not care to fight the matter to any considerable extent. The Government, therefore, got the stage without discussion, and I do think they should have been now prepared to meet us in a conciliatory spirit. On the grounds I have stated I shall give to the Resolution the strongest opposition possible, and I beseech the Government if they wish to give confidence to the Irish tenant farmers, who will be so largely interested in this matter, to allow at least free Parliamentary discussion on the question of the salaries to be paid to the Commissioners.

(7.4.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrona, S.): It is not often that I find myself in entire agreement with the hon. Member for North Longford, but in this matter I hold exactly the same opinion as he does. What is the position the House is in to-night? The question is: Are these Commissioners to be independent not only of landlords and tenants, but also of Parliament; or are they to be subject to the control of the House of Commons? The Chief Secretary has stated clearly that they not only perform judicial functions, but that the functions entrusted to them are vastly more important than most of the judicial functions that are performed in Ireland. That is practically his contention, and I should agree with the Chief Secretary in the contention that the salaries of the Commissioners should be removed from the control and criticism of Parliament if the Commissioners were of the same stamp as the Judges of the Supreme Court, and if they were men of the same standing and position. But what is the proposal in reality? It is simply to put men like Mr. McCarthy, Mr. Wrench, and Mr. Fitzgerald in the position of Judges of the Supreme Court. I hope, however, the Government will not persist in any determination of that kind. In one sense it is almost ridiculous to make such a proposal to Parliament; and if the matter goes to a Division, the Government will find that there are many hon. Members who do not so entirely approve of the Land Commission as to let go altogether the small control the House now has over it. The question is one which does not need much speaking, and I think the Government would be well advised to let well alone, and to continue in these matters on the same lines on which they have proceeded for the last 10 years. I am perfectly certain that, if such a proposal had been brought forward in 1881, the present Chief Secretary would have been one of the strongest opponents of it. In the circumstances, I shall vote for the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, and I trust that the Government will refrain at the last moment from persisting in a policy which will certainly be resented in Ulster and in every other part of Ireland, and which cannot possibly bring them any credit.

(7.9.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): There was one part of the speech of the Chief Secretary to which I listened with amazement—that in which he implied that attacks were constantly being made in this House during the discussion of the Estimates upon the action of the Land Commissioners. Now, so far as I know, no such attacks are made. During the eight years I have been in the House—and I have been as assiduous an attendant as the right hon. Gentleman himself when the Irish Estimates have been on—I have found that the Land Commissioners have been extraordinarily exempt from attacks of this kind, and, therefore, the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman is entirely erroneous. I do not admit the existence of the mischiefs to which the right hon. Gentleman referred. I agree with the hon. Member for South Tyrone that this is not a question that requires a long Debate, for the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton has placed his Amendment before the House with such lucidity that no hon. Member can possibly mistake the principle on which we are going to vote. It is impossible to doubt that if this proposal is assented to, a very mischievous blow will be struck at one of the soundest political principles that have hitherto guided Parliament. The Chief Secretary said it was important that the Land Commissioners should be removed from being supposed to be actuated by fear of pecuniary loss, and also from the operation of political motives. But does not a similar argument apply to gentlemen like the Secretary to the Treasury and the Chairman of the Inland Revenue Board? The Chief Secretary has actually strengthened the case made out by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton. It seems to me that there are two principles upon which this proposition ought to be resisted. The first is, that legal and judicial duties should only be intrusted to judicial persons. As the Member for North Longford has pointed out, you are going to trust these particular duties to laymen, for I believe every Member of the Commission, excepting Mr. Fitzgerald, is a layman. Mr. McCarthy is a solicitor, but not a barrister. The second reason for resisting is, that we have already in the Judges of the Exchequer and Queen's Bench Divisions an ample force for discharging all the duties that are necessary. I do not know whether any communication has been made to the right hon. Gentleman by the Judges, but, at all events, it is notorious that the Judges of the higher Courts have expressed their readiness to undertake the judicial duties in connection with the Land Department. On those grounds, and also because the proposal is an unconstitutional one, I hope that considerable support will be given to the Amendment, for it cannot be denied, after the remarks made by the hon. Member for South Tyrone, that the Government are again going to do what they have often done before in Irish legislation—force proposals upon their own supporters against the judgment of all shades of opinion in Ireland.

(7.14.) Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I am surprised at the sanguine character of the right hon. Gentleman in supposing that by talking of principle he will induce anyone on the other side of the House to vote with him. It is not a question of principle, so far as regards the majority of this House; it is simply carrying out a plan which the Government have conceived. They know perfectly well that they will be defeated at the next General Election, and their main object at present is to bridle what they are pleased to call the democracy. In the other branch of the Legislature the Tory Party have a permanent majority, and, therefore, they are anxious to place matters in such a position that nothing which they do now can be undone, because they will be able to prevent it in the other House. Take, for instance, their Naval Defence policy. We shall be obliged—unless we obtain the consent of the House of Lords, and that we cannot hope for—to continue that policy, although the majority of the people object to paying the money. The Government have put their own henchmen into the Land Commission, and they are now endeavouring to safeguard these gentlemen from the possibility of disturbance by the Liberal Party when that Party obtain a majority. If we want to review their conduct, and perhaps to refuse their salaries, we shall be unable to do so. The object of the Chief Secretary is to take this power out of the hands of the majority. I am one of those who think that a majority should be paramount in the country, yet this you are preventing. Hon. Gentlemen opposite not only want to give effect to their votes now, but they desire to prevent us giving effect to our votes which in the future we have a chance of giving.

(7.17.) Mr. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I rise for the purpose of giving right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Government Bench an opportunity of being courteous to the House. On this point, which is one of enormous importance to the future of the land system in Ireland, there has been unusual agreement amongst persons who are not usually agreed in opposing Ministerial measures, and yet it has come to this: that no one on the Ministerial Benches rises to answer or deigns to notice even the hon. Member for South Tyrone. That hon. Member has visited the constituency of nearly every hon. Gentleman opposite, and yet they all treat him with contempt. Surely the hon. Member, if he is a humble and modest man, will some day, like the worm, turn—unless, indeed, the hon. Member told the Government beforehand not to mind what he said, as his words were only intended for his constituents—that he was addressing the Gallery and not the House; but if the hon. Member is serious, he must resent the insult offered to him in the silence of Her Majesty's Government. The result of the proposal will be to fix on the Land Commission permanently men who are bitterly hostile to the Irish tenants. Every single member of the Land Commission appointed by the present Goverment is bitterly opposed to the tenants. Mr. Wrench and Mr. Fitzgerald are both landlords' men, and so, too, is Justice Bewley. So strong a landlord's man is the last-named that when an hon. Friend of mine was appointed a joint arbitrator on a Plan of Campaign estate, and he offered the names of 12 gentlemen (one of them an hon. Member opposite) from whom the umpire should be selected, the landlord rejected them all, and would only put forward Justice Bewley. And this is the sort of man it is proposed to fix permanently in office, without the possibility of removal except with the concurrence of the House of Lords. Hon. Members opposite know how constantly the farmers of the North protest against the constitution of the Land Commission. Only the other day the Newtownards Board of Guardians recorded such a protest. But how is it that the Sub-Commissioners, by whom the real work is done, are not to be made permanent at the same time? Surely, if the Sub-Commissioners are to remain under the control of the House of Commons, the head Commissioners, whose work is mainly departmental, ought also to be under the same control. The fact is, the Chief Secretary, who thinks he may condemn the Irish farmer with impunity, wishes to deceive the British taxpayer. He does not tell him that these Land Commissioners will control the expenditure of £30,000,000. Now, there can be no closer parallel to the Land Commission than the Railway Commission, and yet the salaries of the Railway Commissioners are voted by Parliament year after year, and the Government do not propose to make any change in this system. The Government's proposal amounts to an endowment of Mr. Wrench, the evil genius who advises the Government on their land policy in Ireland. We know that Mr. Wrench has earned the hatred of the farmers in both the North and South of Ireland, and I believe that if the Government persist in this proposal they will have to pay the penalty by losing several seats in the North of Ireland at the next election.

(7.27.) MR. T. LEA (Londonderry, S.): The hon. Member for North Longford said that a constituent of mine who was appointed a Sub-Commissioner by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had been re-appointed by the present Government. I wish to state that is not the case. With regard to the Main Question, I should also like to add my opinion that the Government are making a mistake in this matter. Their proposal sets a very bad precedent, for which there is no occasion; and I hope that they will withdraw from the position which they have taken up.

Mr. Knox

(7.28.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I think it is evident from the attitude of the Government that they are determined to impress their Irish policy on the future of this country, after the country has determined to be done with their Irish policy. They are carrying out exactly the same policy as they adopted in regard to the Navy, and also in respect of their Coercion Act, which they made permanent. They are, in fact, hopeless of their Irish policy being permanently approved by the country, and are endeavouring to make it permanent in spite of what the country may do.

(7.30.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I do not agree with the hon. Member who has just spoken, in the opinion that the country is opposed to the tenour of the Irish policy of the Government, but I must say that I think this proposal is a mistake. As I understand the proposal, it is to make the salaries of the Judges payable from the Consolidated Fund. It has lately been my good fortune to see a great number of people from the North of Ireland, and as an old North of Ireland Member I take a great interest in this subject, and I may say I have not met one person who agrees in the proposal that the salaries of the Commissioners should be removed from the control of Parliament. Throughout the length and breadth of Ireland, so far as I know, the impression is strong that Parliament should retain this control, and that being my own view I am prepared to support the Amendment moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton.

(7.31.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I also have just returned from the North of Ireland, and have been in my own Division, and I must say that I have not met anybody who has expressed himself in accordapace with the view the hon. Member has just expressed. My impression is that the farmers in the North of Ireland—I do not speak for others—are anxious that the Commissioners should be removed from criticism as much as possible. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes, from that sort of criticism that would induce them to alter their action one way or the other. Though some hon. Gentlemen think this a laughable matter, I am perfectly certain that if they were conversant with these views in the North of Ireland they would agree with me that if there is one thing which is deprecated by the farmers in the North of Ireland, tenants and everybody else interested in the work of the Land Commission, it is that criticism in this or the other House should be supposed to have any effect on Commissioners small or great. I am bound to say I have never yet heard, and I have heard the Bill discussed in three or four counties in conversation by both Conservatives and Radicals—I have never yet heard those objections raised against the Government proposal which have been urged to-night. I hope sincerely that the Government will stick to the course they have proposed.

(7.48.) MR. T. M. HEALY: In order to make the matter clear, and that arguments may not be repeated on duplicate Resolutions moved from the Treasury Bench, I move to insert in Clause "C" of the Resolution after "land," the word "purchase." That will confine the Resolution to the Land Purchase Commissioners. The Government contend that their second Resolution has a meaning distinct and separate from the first one. The Chief Secretary gave me an answer a while ago, and I do not say for a moment that answer was not correct, but if it be so then the second Resolution must be inaccurate, they cannot both be correct. The second Resolution is to authorise the payment of salaries and allowances to Commissioners of the Land Department. Now is the House going to vote these two things?—

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I rise to order, Sir. It is perfectly impossible for us to know what the hon. and learned Member is talking about, for we have not a copy of the Resolutions before us. My point of order is, ought we not to have the Resolutions on the Order Paper of the Day?

MR. T. M. HEALY: I may say that I have had to go back to the Votes for December 9 to find the Resolutions.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Resolutions have been printed according to the usual practice.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is necessary to go back to our record of proceedings on December 9 to understand these Resolutions, such is the charming arrangement of our proceedings. In the second Resolution, which is not on the Paper of to-day, and which has not yet gone through Committee, it is proposed to ask the House to vote a second time salaries for the Land Department, having already voted a sum for the purpose under the Resolution now before us. Now, if the Chief Secretary is correct in the answer he has given me, he is asking the House to stultify itself, for, according to the right hon. Gentleman, we have provided for the salaries of the whole of the Land Commissioners, and yet we are to be asked by Order No. 4 to vote them a second time. I ask the House to consider the absurdity of the position. I declare it is inexpedient and absurd. Having some knowledge of the way in which officers of the Treasury draft Resolutions, I have come to be not unnaturally suspicious of the practices of the Treasury when they are trying to get money Resolutions through the House. It cannot be contended that I am not right on this point, that you are twice providing for the salaries of the Commissioners. That is not denied. What then underlies the second Resolution? I call the attention of the House to the drafting of the Resolution. First you provide under this article now under consideration, payment of the salaries of the Commissioners out of the Consolidated Fund. Are there to be pensions for the Commissioners to come out of some other fund? Are the salaries to come out of the Consolidated Fund and pensions to appear on the Estimates year by year? Mark the distinction of language in the two Resolutions. The first Resolution in no way deals with pensions, in no way deals with allowances, it makes no provision except for salaries, but your second Resolution covers both heads. Why is this? I propose to move an Amendment which will introduce a definite meaning, though, perhaps, it may not be technically correct, for I have had to do it hurriedly. Land Purchase Commissioners may not be the statutory language, but we may make it clear in the language of the Bill. I move that the Resolution shall deal only with the the Land Purchase Commissioners, and my object is plain. I wish afterwards to shut out from this Resolution all questions affecting the Land Commission proper. Observe that in the original drafting of the Act of 1885 a clause provided that those gentlemen who were Land Commissioners and Land Purchase Commissioners were to be one and the same thing, but we took exception to that, for we had not that confidence then and still less have we confidence now in the appointments made by the Government, and we moved an Amendment to Section 15 of the Act of 1885 to the effect that the additional members of the Land Commission appointed under the Act should specially attend to the business imposed on the Commission by that Act. Accordingly we had specialised Land Commissioners quoad purchase, Mr. J. G. McCarthy and Mr. Stanislaus Lynch dealing with the purchase of land. Then in 1887 you appointed a Judicial Commissioner and gave him special powers in regard to the Act, so now you have two lay Commissioners and Mr. Justice Bowley, and you propose to consolidate the five into a Land Department. Now you proceed to provide in this piecemeal manner for the Commissioners of the Land Department, but there is no such thing in existence yet as a Land Department. Why, if the contention of the Chief Secretary is correct, is there any need for any money Resolution dealing with the Land Department? Mr. Justice Monroe is to be a member, and he is already provided for. Mr. Justice Bowley is provided for out of the Consolidated Fund; Mr. Fitzgerald and Mr. Wrench are provided for. What, then, is the meaning of your two Resolutions?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): For the additional salaries under the second Bill.

Mr. T. M. Healy

Mr. T. M. HEALY: You are proceeding according to this strange Parliamentary method with two Resolutions relating to the salaries of the Land Commissioners. One relates to their salaries of £2,500 as members of the Court for fixing fair rent; the other to the salaries to be given to them of £500 in respect of their duties as members of the Land Department, which the Government propose to constitute. The Land Department Bill, however, may not pass. It cannot be pretended that I, taking only a critical interest in this matter, have given that study to it that the draftsman of these Resolutions has; but it is not at all unreasonable that we should ask for more light on this second Resolution, and why it is that we have these two stages on each, and four discussions in the House of Commons. It comes to this, that according to the law and logic of the right hon. Gentleman we shall be in order in discussing the whole thing over again on the second Resolution, as if we had never had the matter before us before. I do not think that is a procedure a great Department like the Treasury should adopt. We pressed a moment or two ago for an answer to the question put forward by the hon. Member for South Tyrone and we have not had an answer. I presume the Chancellor of the Exchequer is ashamed of the entire transaction, and certainly a more clumsy and slovenly way of transacting financial business I have never heard of. We shall certainly have the Debate all over again, because this business is not conducted in a workmanlike way, and the thing is left in a most unsatisfactory state. The right hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity of speaking again on my Amendment, which I hope the House will accept. I have not had the opportunity of referring to the Act of 1881; but I should not be surprised if it should turn out that the Treasury so construe it that the case of the Sub-Commissioners is met by the Resolution. The construction to be put on this Resolution it will be for the Treasury to determine, and I hold that we should not leave the matter in the loose way in which it stands at present.

Amendment proposed, in line 9, after the word "land," to insert the word "purchase."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'purchase' be there inserted."

(8.1.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think I can clear up the difficulty in the mind of the hon. and learned Gentleman. I agree with the hon. Member that the procedure is a cumbrous one, but it is necessary according to the Rules of the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is not the point I made at all.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I appreciate the hon. Member's point. In Clause 10 of the first Bill certain money is thrown on the Consolidated Fund, but this cannot be done without a Resolution of the House. Accordingly, we proposed a Resolution. In Bill No. 2 we also deal with salaries by throwing them on the Consolidated Fund; therefore, we have to pass another Resolution. It is not our fault, but that of the Rules of the House. It would be contrary to the Rules and Regulations of the House to have one set of Resolutions for two

MR. T. M. HEALY: What is the second Resolution for?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Each of the Bills deals with the salaries of the Land Commissioners, though in different ways, and therefore two Resolutions are required, one for each Bill. To have obviated this it would have been necessary to alter the whole structure of the measure. But this matter of the Resolutions is a mere matter of procedure. The Resolutions are necessary in order to found the Bills upon them, but the Bills alone are operative.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If this second Resolution is not passed, what will be the position of these gentlemen in regard to their salaries?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: They will have the same salaries that they receive now. Bill No. 2 is to equalise the salaries, and the hon. Member will see that if we are to carry out the policy of the Bill we have no choice but to do what we are doing. The hon. Member need have no fear of the action of the Treasury Clerks, because what will bind the Treasury will not be the Resolution but the Bill, and the Bill only.

(8.6.) MR. T. M. HEALY: As there are two Bills which deal with finance, the two Resolutions are necessary, but what the right hon. Gentleman has not explained is, why Clause 10, which makes the Resolution necessary, should have been introduced at all. The right hon. Gentleman has only got out of one absurdity by getting into another. He says two Resolutions are necessary, because there are two Bills before the House, each of which deals with the salaries of the Land Commissioners in a different way. Is that not in itself absurd? Why should we have two proposals? I say the proper place for Clause 10 of this Bill is in the second measure. If we are to have proposals regulating the salaries and tenure of office of the Land Purchase Commissioners, the proper place for them is in the Bill dealing with the Land Purchase Department, and we should have some explanation of the extraordinary anomaly presented by this Resolution.

(8.9.) MR. KNOX: I beg to support the Amendment more on the merits than on the technical point. I object to the Resolution, because it endows Mr. Wrench. The Opposition during last Session spent a considerable amount of time in preventing the passage through the House of a measure which was described as the Publicans' Endowment Bill. Well, I venture to say that if the opinions of the Irish people had been taken by plébiscite it would have been found that for every one opposed to the endowment of the publicans there would have been 10 opposed to the endowment of Mr. Wrench. Go where you will amongst the farmers of Ireland you will find the name of Mr. Wrench the name to conjure with if you want to defame the present Government, and why should the Government, when they are as we hope nearing the end of their tenure of Office, propose to leave Mr. Wrench as a permanent legacy to their successors? The object of the Amendment is to impose a check on the constitution of the Land Commission. The Bill is supposed to be a Land Purchase Bill. The Government have brought into it a provision that has nothing to do with Land Purchase, but which only concerns the fair rent portion of the Land Commission. We object to that; and hold that it is irrelevant to the Bill, and altogether unjustifiable. I am told that Mr. Wrench was frequently consulted in the preparation of this Bill, and it seems to me that in Clause 10 we have strong internal evidence of the fact, for we find that Mr. Wrench has provided for the permanent endowment of himself out of the Consolidated Fund. In every other part of the Bill we find that the Land Commissioners referred to are those acting under the Act of 1885, that is to say Mr. Lynch and Mr. M'Carthy; but when we come to this 10th section we find that, though this is a Land Purchase Bill solely, there are others who are to have a finger in the pie. The object of the Government is not so much to endow Mr. Lynch and Mr. M'Carthy—and we know they do not love them too well—but, loving their own creation, they desire to endow Mr. Wrench, Mr. Fitzgerald, and Mr. Justice Bewley—creatures after the Chief Secretary's own heart, whom the Irish farmers abhor. These men, friends of the landlord party, are to be established for the term of their natural lives as Land Commissioners for the fixing of fair rents. They are to be made irremovable unless a landlord House of Lords agrees in demanding their removal. I ask, could there be any worse system imagined? In a short time the work of fixing fair rents will begin—the 15 years for which they have been fixed will have expired—and such men as Mr. Wrench, Mr. Fitzgerald, and Mr. Justice Bewley will be called upon to discharge the functions of the men whose qualifications were thoroughly canvassed in 1881, when the Land Act was passed. Though it may be unusual to fight the merits of the question upon a money Resolution, yet where the Government are trying to carry out so iniquitous a proposal as this before the House, it is the duty of the Representatives of Irish tenant farmers to fight them line by line and word by word. I strongly support the Amendment, because I think that in connection with the Land Purchase Bill we should deal solely with land purchase, and that men who have nothing to do with land purchase should not be endowed, as it were, by a side wind. The proposal of the Government is a huge landlord job, and we, therefore, intend to look ahead. I would suggest to the Chief Secretary that he should drop the Land Department Bill, which will be fought line by line if persisted in. In this way he would greatly facilitate the passage of the Land Purchase Bill through the House. (8.16.)

(8.50.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): As I understand the Resolution before the House it is merely to give power to deal with certain money questions. These preparatory Resolutions do not bind the House, or the Government, or anybody to anything of a restrictive character. It does not limit discussion of the Bill, and only allows the Land Purchase Commissioners, instead of the Land Commissioners generally, to be paid out of the Consolidated Fund. Anyone who opposes the preparatory Resolution must, on the whole, be generally opposed to the Bill. I am not opposed to the Bill generally, and it might be put into good shape in going through Committee. If I disliked the Bill I should be inclined to oppose these preparatory Resolutions; but as it may turn out a good Bill, I do not see the slightest use in opposing the Resolutions. I am not at all inclined to pursue the policy of fighting the battle on these preparatory Resolutions, and I hope that the people of Ireland will know that they do not bind anyone to anything. They simply enable the Government to lay their proposals on the Table. As to the general policy of putting salaries on the Consolidated Fund, I am rather in favour of it. I think it a good thing for Irish officers, particularly, to be paid out of the Consolidated, rather than any other Fund. Ireland contributes double what it ought to the Consolidated Fund, and she gets extremely little from it. At any rate, I think the Government ought to be permitted to state their proposals in the Bill, and it is merely preventing further discussion of a Bill which might be made useful if we debate these preparatory Resolutions, which in the case of all money Bills, are usually passed as a matter of course.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

(9.10.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I acknowledge the strange metamorphosis that has taken place in the House since the Member for Wolverhampton moved his Amendment. Within two or three hours the Government have had support from the Member for South Tyrone and from the hon. Member the Parnellite Whip on the very question which they opposed in the earlier part of the evening. That exactly shows what I have contended all along, namely, the anxiety of the landlord party in this House so to rig the Land Commission that it shall be enthroned for the next 15 years, when the judicial rents will again commence, and when they will have to deal with the purchase of land. The House and the country should understand this matter. Here are two Bills, and the Government have proposed two Resolutions, one proposing to place certain Gentlemen on the Consolidated Fund who have nothing under heaven to do with the original Bill, because it is a Purchase Bill. Therefore, the Member for South Tyrone, and the hon. and gallant Member for Galway, on behalf of his Party, have supported the Government in introducing into this Land Purchase Bill a proposal to make permanent the fair rent Commissioners, Messrs. Wrench, Fitzgerald, and Bewley, who are to have the fixing of fair rents for the next 15 years. But what does this Resolution do? It provides that the salaries of Messrs. M'Carthy and Lynch shall be placed on the Consolidated Fund, but it does not do what the Government originally intended—govern the salaries of Messrs. Fitzgerald, Wrench, and Bewley. The Government say they want to equalise the position of the Fair Rent Commissioners and the Land Purchase Commissioners, but this Resolution leaves the salaries of the latter untouched. You have these gentlemen opposing the proposal that the salaries of the Land Purchase Commissioners shall be placed on the Consolidated Fund, and you have them voting against the Amendment which, at any rate, ought to confine the mischief to the Purchase Department. That shows the genuineness of the opposition offered to the Government by the hon. Member for South Tyrone; and we may judge fairly of his earlier declaration that he was opposed to the salaries of the Land Commissioners being taken off the Estimates. When I move my Amendment, which, at any rate, excludes the Fair Rent Commissioners from the purview of the clause, the hon. Member votes in the very opposite direction. That clearly shows, to use the American phrase, that he was only talking bunkum—that he was only talking to his constituents. Much as I mistrust Mr. Wrench in his dealing with the fair rent question, I shall mistrust him more if he is to be imported into the Purchase Department; and if that importation is to proceed, I ask that you shall have a levelling down, and that Mr. M'Carthy and Mr. Lynch shall have equal powers in connection with the fair rent department. But will this be done? Certainly not, because, as I understand it, the power which was given to the Land Commission by the Land Purchase Act of 1835 still remains intact, as defined by Section 17, which confers it, and can only be exercised for the sole purpose of purchase by the two gentlemen who are there nominated. This, in my judgment, is a very serious consideration. You are driven to pass this Resolution by the framing of your Bill, because it would be absolutely unnecessary except for Clause 10; and even with Clause 10 it does not equalise the position of the Land Commissioners, as it leaves their salaries unequal and their purchasing powers unequal. This position of affairs is due to tricky draftsmanship, which is a procedure that always defeats itself, because the moment you begin to trick in draftsmanship, the House begins to be suspicious, and you will find that, in this instance, the trick will not help you in expediting your measure. The House requires explanations on this subject; and the moment explanations are needed, the Government are exposed to criticism which would have been saved had this trickiness been avoided. Members of Parliament are, as a rule, plain, blunt men, who begin to take exception the moment they find the Government acting in this manner. A more irregular proceeding was never foisted on Parliament than that of dealing with these Commissioners' salaries in two pieces and requiring special Resolutions for the purpose. I say it is a thing hitherto unheard of. If you deny this I ask you to quote precedents for it, if any there be. I say that to deal with this matter by means of two Resolutions is a revolutionary procedure utterly opposed to constitutional practice. We know what it has sprung from. Last year you had only one Bill; you now have two, and you have transferred to the first of those Bills everything that is objectionable to the tenants and favourable to the landlords. In addition to this, you put Mr. Wrench on the pig's back; for you do not care what happens to him by placing him in the first Bill, while the others are placed in the second. I say that this is a most unfair and unconstitutional way of treating the House. Mr. Wrench is entitled to no better treatment than Mr. Lynch or Mr. M'Carthy. Both these men have held their appointments for a considerable period; they have done good work, and up to the present no fault has been found with them. You say you are anxious to equalise their salaries with those of Mr. Wrench and Mr. Fitzgerald. If so, why have you not put them in the first Bill? The reason is clear. It is because you do not intend to equalise their salaries. The first Bill has no more to do with fair rent than with the opium traffic. It has as little to do with the Land Commission of 1885 as it has to do with the Drainage Act. And yet you propose to make Mr. Wrench and Mr. Fitzgerald permanent officials under the circumstances I have put before the House. I say it is a monstrous and scandalous way of treating the House of Commons. And how do you do it? You do not do it in a draftsmanlike manner nor even in a crafty manner. You do it in a way that would not puzzle a schoolboy; and this is the way in which you, who complain of the time of the House of Commons being wasted, compel the waste of that time by the necessity of exposing an unconstitutional trick. Mr. Wrench may have thought it a clever thing to have drafted into the first Bill, which has nothing to do with his position as a fair rent Commissioner, a Resolution making that position permanent and taking his salary off the Estimates, in order to put it on the Consolidated Fund. But to have been clever, it ought to have been done frankly, boldly, and outspokenly, and this is exactly what has not been done. In his speech on the Second Reading of the two measures the Chief Secretary declared his anxiety that everyone should stand in the same position as to salary and powers and tenure of office. Will that be so? No; because the second Resolution is not intended to be passed, and, therefore, the only man who is to be a gainer under the Bill is the very man whose position we take exception to. We object to Mr. Wrench having his salary taken off the Estimates and placed on the Consolidated Fund, and that objection is strengthened tenfold when we find gentlemen like the hon. and gallant Member for North Galway (Colonel Nolan) supporting, on behalf of a Party which largely consists of landlords, and aided by the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), this nefarious transaction on the part of the Government; for I do not hesitate to say it is a nefarious transaction. Moreover, it is a scandal that men representing the tenants' interests in this House should support the Tory Party in backing up the landlord members of the Land Commission. We are not surprised that the hon. Member for South Tyrone, who so eloquently denounced the Government not long ago, should now give them his support; but we are surprised to see the hon. and gallant Gentleman who represents the tenants of North Galway taking a similar course, especially when we know that the Government do not intend to carry out their proposal in a manly, straightforward manner, but rather under cover of a draftsman's trick. I denounce this as unconstitutional, absurd, and unnecessary, and I say with regard to the clause on which it is pretended to be based that it has no business in the Bill at all. When you split the Bill of last year into two the proper course would have been to have omitted this clause from Bill No. 1 and have dealt with it in Bill No. 2. You may reply that the second Bill deals with a separate matter. Granted that it does; still, if there are any matters that ought not to be separated from each other, they are such matters as the salary, tenure, and position of the Land Commissioners. We know already what friction prevails in the Land Purchase Department, and when you propose to empower Mr. Wrench to sit side by side with Mr. McCarthy and Mr. Lynch —

*MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Member to confine his attention to the Question before the House. I warn him that during the last quarter of an hour he has been repeating the same thing over and over again, although in a slightly varied form of words.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I thought that on a subject of this kind it was necessary to give illustrations, but of course I bow to your decision. It should be remembered, however, that throughout this Debate we have had no word of explanation from the Government. This Resolution was originally passed without discussion, and it is only at this stage that we can require from the Government suitable explanations. If they refuse to make them it is only fair that they should be pressed to do so if necessary over and over again. Still, Sir, I accept your ruling; and as I shall have another opportunity when the clause itself comes to be dealt with, I will reserve what I have further to say on this point. But I do ask the Government to give us some explanation on this subject.

(9.30.) COLONEL NOLAN: I only rise because the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Longford has alluded to me in his usual manner. He makes the most reckless statements, and never evinces the slightest wish to ascertain the truth of them.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. and gallant Gentleman is using language which is scarcely Parliamentary.

COLONEL NOLAN: I will merely say the hon. and learned Gentleman is so gifted in the sense of hearing that he professes to know what I said when he was out of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman has totally misinterpreted the views which I gave expression to earlier in the evening. I stated clearly that I spoke only for myself as a Member of Parliament, though to a certain extent, of course, I always speak for Galway. I maintain that it is to the interest of every tenant in Galway that the Government should be enabled to lay before the House the whole of their propositions regarding the advance of the purchase money. The question as to who gets the appointment is of very little importance to the tenants of Ireland, and may be described as a mere "bar" question. The passing of these Resolutions is a mere matter of form, and consequently I said, a short time ago, I would not offer the Resolutions any opposition. I did not support them. I have given neither support or opposition to the Resolutions, because they bind us to nothing. The hon. and learned Gentleman has attacked me simply because I am opposed to him in Irish politics, and because I disapprove of his making one speech one week and a diametrically opposite speech another week. If he takes the trouble to inquire he will learn that I made a very moderate speech. I threw over no one. I am anxious to hear the Government proposals, and I have bound myself to nothing. But I will give the hon. and learned Gentleman my opinion of the Bill in general. I do not say it is a good or a bad Bill, but I think it may be moulded into a good or a bad Bill. ["Hear!"] If hon. Members agree with me they ought to allow the Bill to be considered in Committee.

(9.37.) MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I am afraid the hon. and gallant Member has fallen into error. The statement he has addressed to the House would lead one to suppose that the observations he made some 30 minutes ago were addressed to the Main Question. The hon. and gallant Member's previous observations were not addressed to the Main Question before the House, but to the small point as to whether the Land Purchase Commissioners alone should be made permanent officials and freed from Parliamentary control, or whether such freedom of control should be extended to Messrs. Wrench and Fitzgerald and Bewley. In his opinion it would be beneficial to the people of Ireland that these three gentlemen should be freed in every respect from the control of Parliament. He knows that in the next five years these gentlemen, when placed on the pedestal of Judges of the Superior Court, will have the fixing of his rents and those of every landlord in Ireland. This is no mere "bar" question. The Resolution deals with the supply of money to make good deficiencies which may arise in a certain fund, and it takes away permanently from the control of Parliament all questions relating to the administration of that fund. It should be established as a certainty that an honest and uncorrupted tribunal will be created, not only for the fixing of the purchase money, but for the fixing of fair rents.

(9.40.) MR. LABOUCHERE: The hon. and learned Member for Longford has said this is an endowment Resolution for Messrs. Wrench, Fitzgerald, and others. I have a still stronger reason for voting against the Resolution. Your attention, Sir, was called to the fact that the Resolution does not appear on the Orders of the Day. You said, in reply, that that was usual on the Report stage. Of course that is perfectly correct; but still, I submit that a Resolution of this importance ought to appear on the Orders of the Day, because the House is now being asked to pass a Resolution of which many hon. Members do not know the wording. The Resolution says that it is "expedient to authorise" a temporary advance from the Consolidated Fund of any sums that may be required, and practically empowers the Committee on the Land Purchase Bill to deal with the moneys. I do not consider it to be expedient to authorise the Committee to do anything of the kind. I object to any species of Imperial guarantee being given in order to make purchases of estates in Ireland, and I shall meet the Resolution with a negative.

(9.42) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I am glad the hon. Member for Northampton has alluded to the extraordinary circumstances under which this Resolution is now before the House. The Government have said nothing at all for the last two or three hours, but I hope they will feel it due to the House to explain how it is that the Resolution has been brought forward under such extraordinary circumstances. The ruling which you, Sir, gave on the point of Order which I raised earlier in the evening by no means removes from the Government the serious responsibility they have incurred of asking the House to discuss a Resolution of which hon. Members have no means of obtaining a copy. Through the action or inaction of the Government in failing to provide the House with proper information we have been discussing for four or five hours a Resolution of which nobody knows the terms, and I hope the country will take notice of the fact. I do not think the Government are treating the House or the country with proper respect.

(9.45.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I trust the House will permit me to make one or two observations in reply to what has fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Longford. It is quite true I supported the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton and opposed the Amendment of the hon. Member for Longford. I fail to see any inconsistency in that course. The House having rejected the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman I decline to follow the hon. Member for Longford in any guerilla warfare designed to delay the Land Bill going into Committee. That is what the present proceedings mean, and I wish this country and Ireland to distinctly understand it. I shall be no party to it, and I distinctly decline to assist the hon. Member for Longford in any plan or scheme for delaying what I consider to be a great and beneficent measure for Ireland.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): The hon. Member for South Tyrone is entirely mistaken in supposing that the object of those of us who support the position taken up by the hon. Member for Longford is to delay the Land Bill.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I have never mentioned the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: In my opinion, the point involved in this Resolution is one which might fairly claim the attention of the House of Commons for the whole evening. I must convey my thanks to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton for having raised this question. No reply has been given by the Chief Secretary (Mr. A. J. Balfour) to my right hon. Friend's luminous speech. The whole sum and substance of the Chief Secretary's speech was practically this: That the state of Ireland in relation to the land question, after the present Government have been in power for several years, is such that a course has to be pursued in regard to the Land Commission which is pursued in no other Department of the State. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Balfour) could not cite a single precedent for the course he is taking. Immediately on the Land Bill being read a second time I placed on the Paper an Amendment similar to that which the right hon. Gentleman has moved, and I can promise the Chief Secretary that the Government will not escape from the necessity of a thorough examination of this whole matter when we come to the Bill itself. I think the course pursued by the Government has been somewhat extraordinary. Beyond the rather airy speech, a few minutes in length, of the Chief Secretary, not a word has been said by the Government in defence of the principle involved in this Resolution: The only support from the Benches opposite has come from the hon. Member for Armagh. If a discussion of this kind had taken place at the time when the Chief Secretary was sitting on this side of the House, the Adjournment of the Debate would have been moved long before this if the Government had sat silent. The Land Bill of 1881 had been in this House 43 nights when the present First Lord of the Treasury moved its re-committal, in order to make it obligatory that at the end of six years the position of the Land Commission should be inquired into. Speaking after much time spent in investigating the matter, I do not hesitate to say that, so far from that Commission being a body that should be withdrawn from the control of Parliament, it is one of the first bodies that should come within the scope of Parliamentary control, and should have its proceedings strictly investigated. The Reports of the Auditor and Controller General for the years 1887-8-9 and 1890 bear out what I am saying, and show that the proceedings of the Land Commission ought to be overhauled by a Committee or a Royal Commission from top to bottom.

(9.56.) MR. M. HEALY (Cork): The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) has endeavoured to justify his inconsistency on this question by charging us with endeavouring to delay the Purchase Bill. If there is anyone responsible for the delay which has taken place it is those who have drafted the Bill. We have asked in vain for some explanation of the final form which these Bills have taken. Last year the Government embodied their Irish land policy in one Bill; this year they have two Bills, and they have placed themselves in their present ridiculous position by making different sets of proposals dealing with the Commissioners. We have asked for some explanation of this extraordinary proceeding, but in vain, although our question is a natural and reasonable one. It has been said that the Resolution before the House is a mere matter of form, but I deny this, because this Resolution is really the root of Clause 10 of the Bill. Moreover, a very sinister distinction is involved in this matter between the two sets of Commissioners. It is plain that the object of the Government is this: not intending to go on with the second Bill, they have imported into the first one the only proposal relating to the status and pay of the Commissioners and giving them fixity of tenure. The other portion of the proposal, which places Mr. McCarthy and Mr. Lynch on an equal footing, has been embodied in a Bill which we have come to the conclusion the Government do not seriously mean to proceed with, but that is a point I do not wish to labour now. But I do say the Government have not met us fairly in this matter. We have asked a reasonable question and we get no reply, and if there has been any such delay as that the hon. Member for South Tyrone speaks of, then the responsibility for that must be placed on the shoulders of those who countenance this tricky species of draftsmanship embodied in this Bill and these Resolutions.

Resolution 2,

"That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of the salaries, remuneration, and administrative expenses of the Congested Districts Board, in pursuance of any Act of the present Session relating to the Purchase of Land in Ireland, the Land Commission, and the Congested Districts in Ireland," read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

(10.17.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): The complaint which I have to make in respect to this Resolution has, I daresay, been made in reference to the other Resolution which has occupied the attention of the House this evening, that no intimation of the Resolution appears on the Notice Paper. I think it is rather discreditable to Her Majesty's Government that when important Resolutions of this character are brought before the House of Commons we should have absolutely no notice of them. How in the world are Members of Parliament to do their duty in the House unless they have timely notice, and can come down to the House prepared to deal with the important points of a complex measure? But apart from this, which may be, perhaps, considered an unimportant matter of procedure, I object to the Resolution in its entirety and on its merits. I do not consider it is expedient to authorise the payment of moneys for the purpose mentioned in the Resolution, and I think it is our duty not to allow this Resolution to pass without examining it from every point of view, and, if necessary, taking the sense of the House upon it. My principle object in rising is to try and extract an assurance from the Chief Secretary that when this Resolution is passed the Government will not, in the course of this or a following Session, pass a sort of omnibus Bill saddling the country with these payments in perpetuity. What is wanted is that Parliament should have the control and constant supervision over the expenses under this abominable, this atrocious Bill. I do not know that I should be in order in proposing an Amendment.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is too late for the hon. Member to do that now.

MR. CONYBEARE: I have no intention of proposing any Amendment; but I think we have a right to know from the Government whether they propose, acting under this Resolution in any Bill they may pass later, to follow the precedent they set in the Naval Construction Act, and in which they themselves then copied Prince Bismarck, of getting voted a large sum for a particular purpose for a series of years. Such a practice, until this revolutionary Government came into Office, was foreign to the Constitution of this country. We want an assurance that the Government will not follow this bad precedent, but that payments under the proposed Bill shall be subject to annual Parliamentary control. In view of the magnitude of the operations contemplated under this Bill, in view of the magnitude of the losses the country is almost certain to suffer in the future, our duty, as guardians of the interests of our constituents, is to scan minutely every proposal connected with the scheme, and to do what we can to minimise the evil. We are asked to pass a Resolution authorising the payment of salaries to a Congested Districts Board, but we do not know what that Board is or what it is likely to be. The constitution of the Board is only dealt with at the tail-end of this long and complicated measure, and I object to having our hands tied from the outset by the passing of this Resolution, and the Government given control of this large sum of money for a Board not yet constituted, which is yet in limbo. We have a right to know much more about this Board, and these Congested Districts, for we have our suspicions that these proposals cover a new system of jobbery, and for the distribution of patronage among the fledglings of the Irish Bar or the half-starved hangers-on to a rotten system of administration.

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 111.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

(10.38.) THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment which stands in the name of the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Robertson) would leave the clause without meaning. The Amendment could not be inserted, except as part of a series of Amendments.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Yes, Sir, I had that in view, and I will give by-and-bye the words I propose to substitute. The first sub-section runs thus:—

“Every advance under the Land Purchase Acts after the commencement of this Act, except for the purpose of such prior proceedings as hereinafter mentioned, shall be made by the issue of a sum of Guaranteed Stock equal in nominal amount to the advance.”

The Land Purchase Acts here referred to consist of eight separate statutes, which are, I believe, unknown to the vast majority of the Members of the House. The right hon. Gentleman promised before the Easter Recess that copies of those Acts should be provided for the use of Members. The copies have not been provided, and consequently the Committee has to consider this Bill as much in the dark as the House was when it considered the Resolutions which have now been carried. My objection to this sub-section is that the proposed advance is not a straightforward, honest grant of the money. The object of the Bill is said to be to provide further funds for the purchase of land in Ireland. I invite the attention of the Committee to the remarkable absence of straightforwardness in the manner in which the thing is done. I do not see where the grant comes in. Sub-section 1 says that every advance under the Land Purchase Acts shall be made by the issue of Stock. That is to say that, instead of money as authorised by the Ashbourne Acts, we are going to have a new Stock. Not a single farthing of money is granted by Sub-section 1. Sub-section 2 of Section 6 does, I suppose it will be contended, enlarge the limits of the Ashbourne Acts, which, as they stand, authorise the advance of £10,000,000, and not more. Sub-section 3 of Section 6 runs thus:—

“The advances under this Act for the purchase of holdings in any county shall not, except in so far as is hereafter provided, exceed 25 times the share of the county in the Guarantee Fund.”

That is, no doubt, a county limit, the maintenance of which would be perfectly consistent with the retention of the Ashbourne limit of £10,000,000. My contention is that with these words we could not, even when this Bill passes, grant in any county more than 25 times the capital value of the share of the county in the Guaranteed Stock, and further we could not grant more than the £10,000,000 sanctioned by the Ashbourne Acts. There is only one other part of the Bill which bears on this question at all, as far as I can find out, and that is Sub-section 1 of Section 7. That sub-section says—

“The Guaranteed Land Stock shall from time to time, as required for the purposes of this Act, be created by the Treasury.”

That, no doubt, is a grant of power to the Treasury to create Guaranteed Stock for the purposes of this Act; but I maintain that there is nothing there which expunges the aggregate limit of £10,000,000 fixed by the Ashbourne Acts of 1888. I do not pretend to say that legal ingenuity or judicial astuteness may not interpret these clauses, taken together, as equivalent to a new grant to the limit specified in Clause 6. But even if that interpretation can be put upon the clauses as they stand, I maintain that that is not an honest, straightforward, direct, or respectful way of asking Parliament to advance this enormous sum of money out of the Public Funds. I propose, therefore, to ask the Committee to revert to the more honest, direct, and straightforward proposal which was made by the Government about a year ago, and to substitute for Sub-section 1 of Clause 1 of the present Bill the proposal of the Bill of last year, which is that if the landlord and tenant of a holding in Ireland make an agreement for the sale of the holding to the tenant, and such agreement provides for an application to the Land Department to make an advance for the payment of the purchase, the Land Department “May make an order for carrying the same into effect, and may, in manner provided by this Act, make the said advance.”

The other enacting words in Sub-section 1 of Section 4 of the Bill of 1890 are:—

“The Land Department shall make an advance under this Act for the purchase of a holding by issuing out of Stock placed at their disposal, in pursuance of this Act, an amount of Stock equal in nominal amount to such advance."

Now, what I propose is to substitute in place of Sub-section 1 of this Bill the words in the Bill of 1890, to which I have referred. I ask the Attorney General to give attention to the legal aspect of the Bill as now drafted, and I ask him whether he has any objection to the words in the Bill of last year, which I have read? Last year we were asked, in terms, to authorise the Government Department to make an advance, and to make it by issuing Guarantee Stock. We are not asked, now, to do anything of the kind. The whole thing is done indirectly, and by allusion and reference to Acts that are not before the House, and by a tortuous construction of the clauses of the Bill. Very hard things have been said below the Gangway to-night about the draftsmanship of the Resolutions that have engaged attention so long this evening. I cannot say the same with regard to the present Bill; but one thing which it occurs to me to say about the measure is this: that it seems to me that the learned Attorney General for Ireland, in doing his best for the Government, has thought it the safest thing to do to draft the Bill on the lines of the least resistance. It seems to me that the 40 clauses which, in honest, bad English, were supposed to carry out the desire of the Government last year have been reduced to 10, and that the effect of that is doubly shown in the 1st sub-section of that clause.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 7, to leave out all the words to the word "by," in line 9, and insert the words "If the landlord and tenant of a holding in Ireland make an agreement for the sale of the holding to the tenant, and such agreement provides for an application to the Land Department to carry the sale into effect under this Act, and to make an advance to the amount specified in the agreement, the Land Department may make the advance."—(Mr. Edmund Robertson.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'every advance' stand part of the Clause."

(10.57.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Gentleman who has Mr. E. Robertson

just sat down has moved an Amendment which, if I may judge it from the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech, is of a purely drafting character. He accused the Government of having in the framework of the Bill pursued a tortuous and deceptive policy, and endeavoured to conceal from the House the true character of the Bill. [Opposition cheers.] If hon. Gentlemen who cheer had listened to my remarks in introducing the Bill they would have observed that there has been no change in the proposals which the Government submitted to the House last year. I brought forward this Bill as precisely identical with that of last year, and the reason I alleged for the change in form was that I thought it would more easily pass in its new than in its old form. That appears to me to be common sense. It certainly is a very open policy. There was no concealment in the beginning of it, and there is no concealment now. What we have done in this Bill and what we did not do in the Bill of 1890 is to draft a new grant of money on to the machinery of the Ashbourne Acts, and by so doing we save the House the trouble and the time that would be expended in considering and quarrelling over any new machinery that might be proposed. I cannot conceive a course more straightforward, more open, more consistent with common sense. I hope the hon. and learned Gentleman will not press an Amendment which does not alter the substance of the Bill, but runs counter to the whole framework and the whole system on which the Bill as now proposed is founded. As a drafting Amendment, it is no improvement in the form of the Bill, which indeed speaks in almost every clause of the Bill of 1885. I trust the hon. and learned Member will not waste the time of the Committee in discussing an Amendment which by his own confession is purely a drafting Amendment.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I never said so.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: By his own speech, then. No argument of substance has been urged against the sub-section. The Amendment deteriorates the form of the Bill, and I hope the hon. and learned Member will not ask the Committee to discuss phraseology which is not in harmony with the general tenour of the Bill, or with the measures of 1885 and 1888. Ought he not to allow words to stand which, as a lawyer, he will not deny carry out the intentions of the framers of the Bill?

(11.2.) MR. J. MORLEY: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking that it is laudable on the part of a Minister to try and pass a Bill, but it is equally laudable on the part of the House of Commons to satisfy itself what kind of a Bill it is before passing it. The right hon. Gentleman says that my hon. and learned Friend has moved an Amendment merely on a drafting point. Drafting may be, and often is, a matter of great importance indeed. When this Bill has to be construed by the Courts, they will not look at the speeches, but at that which the right hon. Gentleman makes so light of—the drafting of the clauses. My hon. and learned Friend read the clause in the Bill of 1890, and shewed that it differed materially from the present clause, but the right hon. Gentleman has not explained why the change has been made.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I have done so. I distinctly said that last year certain machinery was created, and in order to pass this Bill more easily and to shorten it, the existing machinery has been adopted.

MR. J. MORLEY: I cannot agree that this Bill answers to the description which has been given, that old machinery is being used for the purposes of a new grant of money, and before this Bill is got rid of the right hon. Gentleman will have many opportunities of justifying that description if he can. The right hon. Gentleman should tell the Committee by what clause in the Bill as it now stands there is power given to the Treasury to advance one shilling beyond the £10,000,000 granted. The Act of 1888, no doubt, sanctioned the advance of £10,000,000 for the purposes of Land Purchase, but where can the Committee find in the present Bill a clause specifying an extension from £10,000,000 to £33,000,000 or £40,000,000? What clause gives that power? The right hon. Gentleman will, no doubt, refer us to the third Sub-section of Clause 6, but that only specifies a sub-limit and is perfectly consistent with the aggregate amount advanced being limited to the sums specified in the Act of 1888. I think my hon. and learned Friend is perfectly justified in pressing this matter. I hope he will insist on a Division, and that the Committee will appreciate the full force of his point.

*(11.7.) MR. MADDEN: I think I can answer the question put by the hon. and learned Member for Dundee. Both he and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle have asked under what legal authority will advances be made of the guaranteed sum. Advances will be made under the machinery provided by the Act of 1885, with this difference, that the limit of advance is prescribed by the Bill now before the Committee. The hon. and learned Member asks what is the difference between the Bill of last year and the present measure. The difference is this: the Bill of last year contained a code complete in itself dealing with Land Purchase, beginning with the agreement, the sanction of the agreement, and the advance. Rightly or wrongly, the Bill of the present year proceeds on a different basis altogether. It engrafts new financial provisions with a new financial limit on the Act of 1885. The Land Purchase Acts, of course, include the Act of 1885, and every future advance under any Land Purchase Act is to be made by the issue of Guaranteed Stock. Under the Bill of last year the advance was to be made not under the Acts of 1885 and 1888, but under the Bill of last year itself. That Bill was a code in itself, and therein lay the difference between it and the present Bill. There is no necessity for a separate provision in the present Bill authorising the advances, because the machinery of the existing Acts is brought into operation.

(11.12.) SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): My hon. and learned Friend who moved the Amendment put a pointed question to the Government—namely, Where in the Bill is there to be found the power to increase by a single shilling the advances authorised by existing Acts? No answer has been given, and, indeed, no such power in the present Bill exists. It gives no authority to advance anything; the only advancing power is to be found in the Land Purchase Acts. Under the Ashbourne Acts the advances are absolutely limited to a sum of £10,000,000. The explanation of the Government is that they are adopting existing machinery and that the advances under this Act are to be in the form of Guaranteed Stock; but the Committee will at once perceive that in merely altering the mode in which the advance is to be made, the Government do not enlarge the authority for advances. That authority is still limited to a given amount. The hon. and learned Gentleman told us that the limit was contained in Section 7 of this Bill. What does that say?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! It is premature to examine that question now. It is not raised by the Amendment before the Committee.

SIR H. DAVEY: I am trying to point out that the object of the Amendment is to bring clearly before the House the power which it is intended under the Bill to give to the Treasury, and what, if any, are the limits of that power. I must say I was disappointed with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. If arguments which have been adduced from the Opposition side of the House in perfect good faith are to be met in the perfunctory and off-hand manner which has been displayed by the Government this evening, the time spent in discussing the Bill will be considerably extended. But, Sir, you have ruled out of order the observations I proposed to make on Section 7, and I will therefore resume my seat, only saying that in my humble judgment my hon. and learned Friend's point has not been answered. I will also take the responsibility of saying that if I were asked to advise the Treasury as to its power under this clause, I should find it extremely difficult to say that any advance would be legal beyond the amount authorised by the Acts of 1885 and 1888.

(11.19.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There are two separate and distinct points raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the Amendment. The principal point is connected with the machinery of the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman objected to the Government using the machinery of the Acts of 1885 and 1888, and to this objection I have replied that the Government believe the course they have adopted to be the most convenient on the whole. The view of the hon. and learned Gentleman who last spoke does not agree with that taken by my right hon. Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, but however that may be this is not the time to discuss the question. If there can be any doubt on the point the Government are willing to introduce words that are necessary to clear it up. But meanwhile I do not think we ought to waste time in discussing the point now. As the Bill has been drafted on the theory I have explained, it would be a great waste of time to endeavour to reconstruct it on a different principle.

(11.24.) MR. CHANCE: I will submit to the Committee that we are now considering the question of what is the meaning of the words "further advance under the Land Purchase Acts." If the Committee are asked to pass these words surely it is only reasonable that they should be informed as to the meaning. The right hon. Gentlemen the Chief Secretary for Ireland says it is merely a matter of form; but I submit that it is not so, and for this reason, that the words distinctly limit the amount of money to be advanced, and, therefore, when the supply of money provided under the Ashbourne Acts is exhausted, it will be impossible to make any further advance and the Bill will cease to act by reason of the lack of ammunition.

(11.27.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): It now appears that the right hon. Gentleman has had this Bill drafted in an obscure manner. We are able to gather that the intention of the Government is to apply a sum of £30,000,000 or £40,000,000 belonging to the people of this country for the purposes of this Bill, and the more we study the measure the more puzzling does it become. I think we are entitled to further consideration of this extremely obscure Bill. It is impossible at this time of night that we should understand it, and in order that we may have a fair opportunity of realising what it is, I think the best plan would be for me to move to report Progress. I therefore beg to do that.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I cannot receive that Motion, because I regard it as an abuse of the Rules of the House.

(11.30.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: The further this discussion proceeds, the clearer does it become that these are the governing words of the whole Bill; and I think we are perfectly entitled to raise the question as to the extent of the advances to be made under the Bill. As my hon. and learned Friend has pointed out, a blunder has confessedly been made in the drafting of the measure, and the right hon. Gentleman does not deny that.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The accusation against the Government was that it had pursued a tortuous policy in regard to the Bill; and this is what I do deny.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I do not intend to impute to the right hon. Gentleman anything in the nature of a tortuous policy. But I think, after the candid statements we have heard from him and from the Attorney General for Ireland, that it has been made abundantly clear that if this Bill were to pass to-morrow unamended, no lawyer would advise the Treasury to advance one single sixpence over and above the £10,000,000 already authorised to be lent under the Ashbourne Acts. That I take to be the clear effect of Section 6.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman is not entitled to discuss that point. It is anticipating the interpretation to be placed upon a subsequent clause. The Amendment before the House does not raise that question.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Of course, Sir, I see the force of your ruling; and I will not ask as to the meaning of these words in advance. But I may inquire do the words "other advances" apply to the £10,000,000 already authorised?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Then I hope the right hon. Gentleman will tell us to what they do apply, and, when we reach a later stage of the Bill, will make the whole matter clear to us.

*(11.33.) MR. MADDEN: I am clearly of opinion that the new limitation contained in this Bill is substituted for, and repeals by implication, the limitation contained in the existing financial provisions. Those provisions have been altogether superseded by the different financial arrangements of the present Bill. But if any hon. Member feels any doubt on this point I do not think we should be justified in taking up the time of the House in arguing this, especially as the introduction of a few words at the proper time would obviate all necessity for a Debate. When Section 6 of the Bill is reached, words will be introduced which will put the matter about which hon. Members opposite feel difficulty beyond the reach of doubt. It would be extremely unsafe to accept the Amendment before the Committee, as it would dislocate the framework of the Bill which has been deliberately adopted. I can only repeat that the point of difference is this, the Bill of last year embodied a complete Code in itself, whereas this Bill engrafts the machinery of the Act of 1885.

*MR. MADDEN: Repeal by implication is a phrase well understood among lawyers.

MR. J. MORLEY: Well, I venture to say that when this House is dealing with an immense loan of money mere implication is not sufficient. Now I ask the Government will they state plainly what words they are prepared to introduce in order to carry out their avowed intention. If they do that, then my hon. and learned Friend may be well advised in withdrawing his Amendment. But we must know exactly what words the Government will put into the clause in order to carry out their intention. Another point to which I wish to draw attention is this—in the Bill of 1890 it was laid down that the Land Commission should only begin operating where agreements had been arrived at between landlord and tenant, but this preliminary condition is not mentioned in the present measure. Ought it not to be specified in the clause; or is it merely left out for drafting purposes? This preliminary agreement is to my mind an important part of the whole operation.

(11.39.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As far as I can gather the views of hon. Members opposite will be met, if the first portion of Sub-section 2 of Clause 6 is amended so as to read as follows:—

"The advances under this Act for the purchase of holdings in any county may be made to the amount of, but shall not exceed, except in so far as is hereafter provided, 25 times the share of the county in the Guarantee Fund."

I think that will leave no doubt as to what the intentions of the Government are.

*(11.40.) MR. KEAY: The right hon. Gentleman has quoted words which he says will, if added to Clause 6, define the limit of advances. But I want to ask him how the alteration of that clause will make it possible.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! It is quite irregular to discuss in advance what would be the effect of the alteration of the clause. We are now concerned with an Amendment to the 1st clause.

*MR. KEAY: The right hon. Gentleman says that advances to the extent of £30,000,000 may be made under the Ashbourne Acts. I say that will be impossible.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

*MR. KEAY: Very well, Sir, I will not discuss that matter any further. So much has been said as to the possibility of defining the amount in this Bill that I may point out to the right hon. Gentleman that he will have a very difficult task in framing words which will secure the end we desire. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has not answered one question I put to him. He has defended the Government against the charge of having pursued a tortuous policy in regard to this Bill, solely by alleging that the Ashbourne Acts are named in every clause of it; but he has not pointed out any single clause in which the Act of 1885 and 1888 are mentioned, except that in which their operation is terminated.

(11.43.) MR. E. ROBERTSON: The right hon. Gentleman very courteously said he did not suppose that I intended to obstruct the Bill. That is true, and as I have succeeded in gaining my point, I will withdraw the Amendment. In the words suggested by the right hon. Gentleman, there are, I think, possibilities of great dangers similar to those I have pointed out to the Committee; and, therefore, the words ought to be carefully considered. The right hon. Member for Newcastle has mentioned an important point, which I omitted to notice, and that is that the Bill of last year required a preliminary agreement between landlord and tenant, which preliminary agreement has disappeared from this Bill. My object is to force upon the Committee the duty of facing this grant in direct words, to which they can say "Yes" or "No," and it will not be contended that there are any such words in the Bill as it stands.

(11.46.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I do not think my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundee has done good service, because he has awakened hon. Members to the precipice over which they were rushing. I wish to absolve myself from any charge of obstruction, and I propose that you should at once pass every clause of the Bill without Amendment. I gather that the result would be we should pass a Bill which would be absolutely worthless for the objects for which it was framed, to which objects I strongly object. If this course were adopted we might read the Bill a third time to-morrow.

(11.47.) MR. CONYBEARE: I have now to move an Amendment, the effect of which would be to limit the risk of loss to advances under this Bill. If hon. Members will refer to the definition clauses under the Bill they will find that the expression "Land Purchase Act" is given a very wide interpretation indeed, for it includes Acts passed in 1870, 1872, 1881, 1883, 1885, 1888 and 1889. I regard the whole proposal under this Bill as essentially objectionable, and I desire to limit its operation as far as possible and to reduce the mischief and risk of loss to the ratepayers of this country to the lowest possible limit. I therefore propose that no previous Acts shall be brought within the purview of this Bill, and that its operation shall be strictly limited to loans granted under it. I am not going to trouble the Committee at this moment with any further remarks in support of the Amendment. I shall be happy to hear what answer the right hon. Gentleman has to make to the Amendment, and if necessary—if I am forced to do so by the perfunctory character of his reply—I will take leave to address myself again to the Committee.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, to leave out the words "the Land Purchase Acts after the commencement of."—(Mr. Conybeare.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'the Land Purchase Acts' stand part of the Clause."

(11.50.) MR. T. M. HEALY: There is no reason why the £500,000 remaining unadvanced under the Ashbourne Acts should be clogged by the very objectionable proposals imported for the first time into this Act. Let me point out to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary what the Amendment of the hon. Member for Camborne involves. You have on two occasions advanced £5,000,000. The first amount was in 1885 and the second in 1888. Nine millions of that money has been already spent. Are you now going by the rejection of this Amendment to declare that that money has been mis-spent, or that it has been advanced without proper checks and safeguards, which it has taken you all these years to discover? Why, I ask, do the Government seek to go back upon the grant which Parliament has already made, and made so long as six years ago in one case and three years in the other? Are you now going to say that your whole Ashbourne policy was a mistake, and that your disbursements under the 1885 and 1888 Acts were made without proper precautions? Have you suddenly discovered that the whole principle on which you acted in this matter was wrong? If you have not, then why do you adopt this cheese-paring and niggardly way of dealing with the question? I think that, bearing in mind the fact that the Land Purchase Commission is a new body, and also not forgetting the view of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway, that the tenants with but few exceptions will pay their instalments without being coerced by the crowbar into doing so, that this is a case in which the Government might fairly yield. I think they would act sensibly in doing so.

(11.56.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government cannot accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Camborne, as it would cut this Bill off from the parent Act of 1888. The hon. Member who has just sat down raised quite a distinct point—a point which I have considered a great deal, and on which I think there is a good deal to be said on both sides. There is a small balance of £900,000 still remaining under the Act of 1888, and the question is whether that sum should be administered under this Bill, or be used up under the Acts of 1885 and 1888. On the whole, the Government think it would be simpler to have only one system of land purchase. If the hon. and learned Member opposite wishes this balance to be spent under the old Act I have no objection to that; but the proper way to do it will not be by omitting the words the hon. Member for Camborne proposes to omit, but by introducing words which will modify a subsequent section of the Bill. That can be done by introducing in their proper place the words "for the purpose of such prior proceedings."

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow, at Two of the clock.

As amended, considered.

Amendments made.

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 2, page 1, leave out "other than in relation to Land Tax," and insert "in the due execution of the Acts relating to the Land Tax and Inhabited House Duties."—(Mr. Jackson.)

(12.5.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I do not find that anyone understands this Bill, and I beg to move the Adjournment.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The object of the Bill is simply to provide for payment of officials by salary instead of by poundage.

(12.6.) MR. CONYBEARE: I am not at all convinced in my own mind of the propriety of such a change, and I must protest against the very objectionable practice on the part of the Government of moving important Amendments without a single word of explanation.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill to be read the third time to-morrow, at Two of the clock.

PRESUMPTION OF LIFE LIMITATION (SCOTLAND) BILL—(No. 248.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

SUPPLY [6th APRIL] REPORT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [7th April],

Mr. A. J. Balfour

"That this House doth agree with the Committee in the Sixth Resolution, 'That a sum not exceeding £28,461, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1892, for Expenditure in respect of Art and Science Buildings, Great Britain.'"

Question put, and agreed to.

7. "That a sum, not exceeding £41,758, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892, for Expenditure in respect of Dip'omatic and Consular Buildings, and for the maintenance of certain Cemeteries Abroad."

8. "That a sum, not exceeding £281,350, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892, for the Customs, Inland Revenue, Post Office, and Post Office Telegraph Buildings in Great Britain, including Furniture, Fuel, and sundry Miscellaneous Services."

9. "That a sum, not exceeding £147,450, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892, in respect of sundry Public Buildings in Great Britain, not provided for on other Votes."

Resolutions agreed to.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): This is a one clause Bill. Owing to the death of Lord Truro, it has become necessary to appoint somebody to discharge the duties performed by him under Statute. It is proposed to transfer the duties to the Middlesex Registry Department. The saving will be between £4,000 and £5,000. It is necessary that the Bill should be passed without delay, and I hope the House will welcome the opportunity of effecting so substantial an economy.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Jackson.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman state the politics of the gentleman who is to get the job?

MR. JACKSON: No new officer will be appointed; there will simply be a transference of the duties which have been discharged by, or been under the care of, Lord Truro to an existing officer. ["Who is he?"] The Land Registrar, whoever he may be.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): That involves the consideration, what are the duties, and whether the Registrar is capable of discharging them?

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I hope my hon. Friends will not persist in opposing this Bill. There are many reasons why the Bill should be passed with the least possible delay, if the House of Commons wishes to save this £5,000 a year. It is not intended to create any new office. At present there is only an assistant Registrar. He has no politics; he is a member of the Civil Service. This is really a question whether the House of Commons wishes to put an end to a sinecure with £5,000 a year.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Can the Assistant Registrar gain anything by change of status?

MR. JACKSON: Nothing whatever.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): In whose favour will the economy be effected? The registry is one for the County of Middlesex alone, and I should like to know whether it is a fact that money obligations which rest on one county will be transferred to the country generally.

MR. JACKSON: The fees hitherto paid have gone into the pocket of Lord Truro. In future the fees will go into the Exchequer.

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

"SHARP V. WAKEFIELD," AND THE IRISH LICENSING LAWS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the decision of the House of Lords, in the case of "Sharp v. Wakefield," overrules the judgment given in the Irish Court of Queen's Bench in 1876, in the case of "Clitheroe v. the Recorder of Dublin," in which it was held that the Irish publican had a vested interest in his licence?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The case of "Sharp v. Wakefield" was decided by the House of Lords on a different state of facts and upon different statutes from those which were before the Irish Court of Queen's Bench in the case known as Clitheroe's case. It, therefore, does not overrule the last-mentioned decision. How far the principles on which the House of Lords rested their decision are applicable to the Irish Licensing Code, in any particular state of facts, is another and a different question, in regard to which I ought not to do more than point out that the matter can be raised before the Licensing Authority by any person interested, and, if it is thought advisable, taken to the Courts of Appeal.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): May I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether he has not now set a precedent which may be followed subsequently in answering a legal question addressed to him by a Unionist Member?

MR. MADDEN: I have never refused to answer a legal question which related to a matter which came within my province. I have answered the question of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, (Mr. T. W. Russell) as far as it was within my province and duty to do so; but I declined to express any opinion as the question may hereafter be brought before another tribunal.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I wish to know whether the case mentioned in the question is one which may go before another Court?

MR. MADDEN: Does the hon. Baronet mean the Irish case?

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Yes.

MR. MADDEN: The Irish case mentioned in the question arose before the passing of the Irish Judicature Act and the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench was final. If a similar case were to arise in Ireland now, it might be carried before a Court of Appeal and ultimately to the House of Lords.

THE IRISH FISHERIES.

MR. FOLEY (Galway, Connemara): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is correctly reported as having recently stated to a deputation on the subject of Irish fisheries, that—

"Only that morning he had heard from a benevolent lady who had two large boats constructed regardless of expense, costing, he believed, nearly £1,000 a piece, and she sent them to Clifden for the purpose of developing the fishing industry, but the fishing population there did not know how to manage them, and if they had tried, the only result would have been that the boats would have been wrecked and the crews probably drowned;"

whether he has since been informed that such statement is incorrect; and whether the Government will, during the present period of intense distress, assist in its alleviation by employing the people in the erection of suitable piers and harbours along the west coast which are greatly required, and the erection of which would facilitate the development of the fishing industry referred to?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The report of the statement attributed to me is substantially correct, except that the vessels were to be used at, not had been actually sent to, Clifden. That statement, which I have no ground for believing to be otherwise than accurate, was based upon the report of the shipbuilder who had built the vessels, and who had, by direction of the proposed donor, visited the neighbourhood with a view to make arrangements for their reception. The erection of piers and harbours is seldom the best way of providing employment in districts where acute distress prevails.

DISTRESS IN DONEGAL.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what steps, if any, have been taken to start relief works in Ranafast, Ranomona, and Loughnanoran, in West Donegal; whether he is aware that there is much fever in these districts; and what means of subsistence there are for the 783 inhabitants from this time till June, and for the women and children from June till the return of the wage-earners from the Scotch harvest in August?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to defer the question until Monday. I have not yet been able to obtain full particulars; but I hope to have a Report by that time.

SALE OF INDIAN OPIUM IN ENGLAND.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether opium, the manufacture of the Indian Government, imported into the United Kingdom for the use of Chinese or others for smoking or other purposes, will be allowed to be sold here as in India without being labelled "Poison," as is required by law to be done as regards opium sold for use as medicine and under penalties enforceable in the Criminal Courts?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): According to the provisions of the Pharmacy Act opium cannot be sold in Great Britain unless, together with the name of the article, the word "Poison" is used, and the name and address of the seller are given.

ABDUL RASOUL.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he has further considered the case of Abdul Rasoul, and what he proposes to do for him?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (SIR J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): In the absence of my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary for India, I am requested to say that Abdul Rasoul was offered the payment of his expenses in this country, a passage to Bombay, and a safe conduct to Kashmir. He declined these terms unless he also received some Government appointment or a pecuniary equivalent. The Secretary of State refused to extend the offer specified above, and on the 20th of March Abdul Rasoul was informed that if he did not avail himself of those terms within 14 days, they would be withdrawn. He has made no communication since then.

MR. CONYBEARE: I should like to be informed what the offence was for which Abdul Rasoul was imprisoned, and whether he is not entitled to some compensation for the illegal manner in which he was arrested and imprisoned for nine months in India without trial and without any accusation of any kind having been brought against him? I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Government are prepared to admit that the imprisonment of Abdul Rasoul was illegal, or what the accusation was upon which he was imprisoned?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hon. Member put the same questions some time ago, and they were answered by my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. My question has not been answered yet. What I want to know is what justification the Government had for kidnapping Abdul Rasoul and keeping him in prison without trial for nine months?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I will read the answer of my right hon. Friend to which I referred:—

"If Abdul Rasoul demands compensation, he should address himself in the first instance to the Government of India, and in the event of the Government refusing redress, he should appeal to the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State is not in possession of information to enable him to answer the question."

MR. CONYBEARE: The Under Secretary promised some time ago to get the information. May I ask whether the Government have obtained it, and when it will be communicated to the House?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: That question does not arise out of the answer to the question on the Paper, and as I do not represent the Indian Department I decline to go into it.

FEVER IN MULL.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to a paragraph headed "Outbreak of fever in Mull," in the Scotsman, of April 6th, in which, after a description of the manner in which the relatives of a man, said to have died of typhus, were refused food, shelter, and the means of escape from the district, the following passage occurs:—

"At last Craignure was reached, and one house, after a search, gave admission to the woman and girl, but the two men could find no shelter, and they seemed to have wandered about the entire night. Next morning the body of the hawker was seen lying in a sand-pit, death being due either to exposure or to the fever. Here again it was found impossible to get anyone to coffin the remains;"

whether it is true that an outbreak of typhus has occurred in Mull; and, if so, what steps have been taken by the Board of Supervision for the purpose of dealing with it; and whether it is true that a hawker was found dead "from exposure or fever," as described; and, if so, was any inquiry made, and by whom, and on what date, into the circumstances attending his death?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): Several cases of typhus have occurred in the Island of Mull; but, so far as known, only one case has resulted fatally. The Board of Supervision have obtained a full Report from the County Medical Officer, and have called upon the Sanitary Inspectors who failed in their duty to state any reasons why the Board should not dismiss them from office. The facts about the death of a hawker appear to be substantially as stated in the Scotsman. His death, however, is attributed to exposure, and not to fever. No special inquiry seems to have been made into the death of the hawker. The Secretary for Scotland will call for a full Report from the Board of Supervision, and will also direct the attention of the County Council to the lamentable state of matters revealed by this case.

DR. CAMERON: Was any inquiry made into the circumstances of the case?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I understand that no special inquiry was made.

DR. CAMERON: Will the right hon. Gentleman direct an inquiry to be made?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The hon. Gentleman can hardly have heard the last part of my answer, namely, that "the Secretary for Scotland will call for a full Report from the Board of Supervision."

THE TUBERCULOSIS COMMISSION.

MR. FURNESS (Hartlepool): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether his attention has been called to the hardship entailed upon butchers through the seizure, without compensation, of the carcasses of animals infected with tuberculosis, evidence of which it is practically almost impossible to obtain until the animals are slaughtered; when he expects the Royal Commission on tuberculosis to Report; and whether the Government will consider the advisability of extending the provisions of "The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1876," and the amending Act of last Session, to tuberculosis, as far as compensation is concerned?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): My attention has been called to the subject on more than one occasion. It is quite true that it was first introduced by the hon. Member for West Salford by a Motion in this House, and upon April 24th, 1890, a deputation on the question was received by the President of the Local Government Board and myself. A Royal Commission was subsequently appointed by my right hon. Friend to investigate the subject. I am unable to say when their labours are likely to be concluded, and, pending the issue of their Report, I do not contemplate extending the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts in the direction desired. I sympathise sincerely with the hardships of the present position, so far as the butchers are concerned; but I may point out that the cases of pleuro-pneumonia and tuberculosis differ so greatly that, even if I took the course suggested, I am afraid it would not have the effect which is anticipated either by the hon. Member or by those whom he represents.

ROADS AND BRIDGES ACT.

MR. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether any power is given to the burgh Local Authorities in the Roads and Bridges Act to borrow money for the making and re-forming of footpaths within burghs; and whether the Commissioners of Police have power under the Rutherford Act, 13 and 14 Victoria, c. 33, to borrow money for those purposes and to assess for the same?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The first part of the question must, I think, be answered in the negative. On the other hand, comparing the 210th and 340th sections of the Act 13 and 14th Victoria, cap. 33., the power in question seems to exist under that statute.

COLONISATION OF CROFTERS.

MR. SETON-KARR (St. Helen's): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is proposed to continue the colonisation of crofters from the Highlands and Islands of Scotland to North West Canada, by sending out any more families this Spring or in the Spring of 1892; if so, by what date they will be sent; how many; and whether to the existing crofter settlements of Saltcoats and Killarney, or to some other district in the Dominion?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The recommendations made by the Select Committee on Colonisation are at present receiving the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, but whatever their ultimate decision may be, it will not be possible for the Secretary for Scotland to make the arrangements contemplated by the hon. Member during this Spring as the season is already too far advanced for colonisation this year.

MR. SETON-KARR: As to next Spring?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I cannot say.

VOTES FOR ELECTION OF GUARDIANS.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether ratepayers whose rates are paid by their landlords have the right to vote in the election of Guardians of the poor?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): Provided that persons are rated, it does not matter whether their rates are, or are not, paid directly to the landlord, as far as the right to vote in the elections of Guardians is concerned. Their names must be on the rate books.

MR. MORTON: Does the term "rate-payers" mean that the name is on the rate book?

SIR R. WEBSTER: Yes, Sir.

THE BUDGET.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): May I ask whether the First Lord of the Treasury can now state when the Budget will be taken?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): It will not be taken before Monday week, but I will give notice on Monday, or on Thursday at the latest, of the precise date on which it will be taken.

THE LABOUR COMMISSION.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I stated yesterday that I hoped to be able to make a statement with regard to the proposed Royal Commission on Labour Questions; and, as I received last night the sanction of Her Majesty to the Royal Commission, I now propose to read to the House first the terms of Reference and then the names of the Royal Commissioners approved by Her Majesty—

"To inquire into the questions affecting the relations between employer and employed, the combinations of employers and of employed, and the conditions of labour, which have been raised during the recent trade disputes in the United Kingdom; and to report whether legislation can with advantage be directed to the remedy of any evils that may be disclosed; and, if so, in what manner."

The Marquess of Hartington, M.P., the Earl of Derby, K.G., Sir Michael Hicks Beach, M.P., Sir John Gorst, M.P., Mr. Mundella, M.P., Mr. L. Courtney, M.P., Mr. H. Fowler, M.P., Sir E. Harland, M.P. (Shipbuilder and Engineer), Mr. J. C. Bolton, M.P. (Chairman, Caledonian Railway), Mr. Gerald Balfour, M.P., Mr. Jesse Collings, M.P., Mr. T. Burt, M.P. (Secretary, Northumberland Miners' Association), Mr. W. Abraham, M.P. (South Wales Miners' Committee), Sir Frederick Pollock (Corpus Professor of Jurisprudence, Oxford), Professor Marshall (Professor of Political Economy, Cambridge), Sir W. Lewis (Manager of Bute Docks, Cardiff), Mr. T. H. Ismay (Managing Director of White Star Steamship Company), Mr. David Dale (ironmaster), Mr. G. Livesey (Chairman of South Metropolitan Gas Company), Mr.

W. Tunstall (Cotton Manufacturer), Mr. J. Mawdsley (Amalgamated Association of Operative Cotton Spinners), Mr. Tom Mann (President of Dock Labourers' Union), Mr. Edward Trow (Secretary of Board of Conciliation of the Iron and Steel Trades), Mr. Henry Tait (Chairman of the United Trades Council, Glasgow), Mr. S. Plimsoll, Mr. Hewlett (Managing Director of Wigan Coal and Iron Company), and Mr. M. Austin (Secretary, Irish Democratic Labour Federation).

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) [SALARIES, &c.]

Committee to consider of authorising the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of any salaries, remuneration, and expenses, which may become payable under any Act of the present Session to amend the Procedure in regard to Private Bills relating to Scotland (Queen's Recommendation signified), upon Monday next.—(Mr. Jackson.)

THE LABOUR COMMISSION.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY, Member for Londonderry City, rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, "the refusal of Her Majesty's Government to recommend the appointment of Mr. Michael Davitt as a member of the Royal Commission on Labour;" but the pleasure of the House not having been signified, Mr. Speaker called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places, and less than 40 Members having accordingly risen, the House proceeded to the Business of the day.

MOTIONS.

SEA WARE, CROFTING COUNTIES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 274.]

PUBLIC FOOTPATHS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Jesse Collings, Bill for the preservation of Public Footpaths, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jesse Collings, Mr.

Llewellyn, Mr. Hobhouse, Sir Edward Birkbeck, and Mr. Taylor.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 275.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

MIDDLESEX REGISTRY BILL.

(No. 265.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

(2.35.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): This appears to be only a temporary provision, and I therefore object to the attempt of the Government to pass it in such haste. The Government were allowed by the courtesy of the House to go into Committee on the Bill last night, and we now find that the result of yielding to the Government upon a supposed non-contentious Bill at a late hour of the night is that measures of an urgent character are postponed in order that precedence may be given to this measure. I think the least we can expect is that the Bill should have been properly drawn, carefully considered, and fully adequate for the purpose, but we find that it is only a temporary measure.

(2.36.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): Perhaps I may be allowed to explain that the object of the Bill is merely to empower the Government not to fill up an office which it is not necessary to fill up. The late Lord Truro held the sinecure office of Registrar of Land Transfers in Middlesex for many years, and it is this office, which has now come to an end, which the Bill proposes to abolish, thus effecting a considerable economy. But in order to do that it is absolutely necessary that legislation should take place. If the Bill is not passed, persons who have transferred land would lack the protection of registration. The reason why the word "temporary" has been inserted is that in consequence of an Act passed two years ago the whole of the question of land registry is awaiting further legislation. The only object of bringing in this Bill is to protect persons who may transfer land and allow the transfers to be registered in the ordinary way. I may add that the Lord Chancellor already possesses the power to make a rule, so that it is purely a formal matter.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then what excessive mischief could arise to the State if this Bill is not pressed forward? No injury would be done to the State, but people who may have paid their money for land would not have the protection of registration.

*(2.37.) MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I should like to have a little further explanation. In the county in which I live we have a Land Registry, and therefore we are in the habit of paying certain fees when we purchase land, and it is duly transferred. I presume that the landowners of Middlesex are in the same position, and I want to know what the financial effect of this Bill will be. Will the fees in future be paid into the Exchequer?

(2.38.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I made a statement on this subject last night. The position of the matter is this. Under the arrangement which has hitherto existed one half of the surplus fees, after payment of expenses, went to Lord Truro as Registrar. There is under the statute not only a power to appoint a successor to Lord Truro, but also a power to the successor who may be appointed to appoint a deputy. The surplus fees amount to about £9,200 a year, of which £4,600 has gone to the Exchequer, while the other £4,600 went into the pocket of Lord Truro. It is now proposed, as the Attorney General has pointed out, that the work shall be continued to be done by the existing officers, and that the whole of the surplus fees shall go into the Exchequer.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: I am much obliged for the explanation, but these figures were not mentioned last night. That is just the kind of way of doing business which leads to difficulty and inconvenience sometimes in regard to the passing of a Bill. It is desirable, I think, when the Government attempt to hurry a Bill through the House after 12 o'clock at night that a full explanation should be given of its provisions.

(2.40.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman may be satisfactory, but I think it would be more satisfactory if the way in which the money is to be disposed of appeared on the face of the Bill. As far as the Bill is concerned, the fees payable for the registration of land transfer may go anywhere. There is no security under the Bill that they will go to the State. I think there ought to be a special arrangement in the measure itself as to the disposal of the money, and I would, therefore, ask the Government to give some assurance on the matter.

(2.41.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): The Attorney General spoke of the urgency of the Bill. May I ask whether there have been any memorials for registration since Lord Truro's death? I gather from the silence of the hon. and learned Gentleman that there have not been. Then how are the gentlemen protected who have been concerned in the transactions to which the Bill relates? He says that unless this Bill is passed immediately the persons interested in these transactions will suffer. I shall be glad if he will explain how the interests of those persons are protected who have presented memorials since the death of Lord Truro?

(2.42.) SIR R. WEBSTER: What I said was that the Bill provides for the fulfilment of an extremely important as well as statutory duty. I will not go into the question whether any memorials have been presented within the last few days or not. It is not necessary to insert words in this Bill to safeguard the interests of those who have presented memorials, but the object of the measure is simply and solely to enable Her Majesty not to fill up the appointment rendered vacant by the death of Lord Truro. If an appointment is made, the officer appointed could appoint a deputy and get the fees.

(2.43.) MR. SEXTON: The hon. and learned Gentleman has not answered the question at all. What is the objection to stating on the face of the Bill what is to be the use and destination of the money hereafter?

SIR R. WEBSTER: Lord Truro received one-half of the surplus fees during his life time, and unless some one is appointed to fill up the vacant office the fees will go into the Treasury. If it is found necessary to insert words in the direction suggested by the hon. Member it could be done in another place.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I put a question last night to the Secretary to the Treasury in regard to this Bill, and my recollection is that he only made a general statement to the effect that it would secure economy. It now appears to be a much more important Bill than was imagined. There is nothing on the face of the Bill to show what the powers of the registrar or masters are, and there has been no time to consult the statutes in order to ascertain what those powers are. I wish the Government to let the Committee know distinctly what economy the proposed change will effect. It appears from the explanation of the Secretary to the Treasury that the sum of £4,600 a year went into the pocket of Lord Truro, but it does not point out whether anything will in future be paid to the officers of the Land Registry in addition to the salaries they now get. Nor are we told what is to become of the vacant office, except parenthetically by the Attorney General, that it will not be filled up, but the fees will go into the Treasury. Anything that is calculated to effect economy will have full support on this side of the House. ["Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial Benches.] I am glad to hear that cheer, and to find that there is as strong a desire for economy on the other side of the House as upon this. What I wish to know is whether the Land Registry is to benefit from the abolition of the office. It has not had much to do hitherto, and I would ask whether an increased expenditure in connection with the office is contemplated. In that case I think we are entitled to know distinctly what economy the Bill will effect.

(2.45.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I think I can explain the ground of the last appointment. The appointment was in the hands of the Lord Chancellor, and a son of the Lord Chancellor got it. ["No," from the Treasury Bench.] At any rate the Lord Chancellor had a voice in the matter. There are three fees paid; one for registering the sale of land; another for registering a mortgage, and another for inquiries. All these fees went into the pocket of Lord Truro. What I particularly complain of in the matter is that the inhabitants of Middlesex are to be called upon to pay greater or heavier fees than would meet the cost of the office, the benefit of which is to go to the Treasury. I claim that the fees charged should be so estimated that they would only pay expenses, and seeing how unsatisfactorily the business has been done in the past, I hope a thorough investigation will be made into the office, and that some better arrangement will be made for the future. Complaints have been made for years of the surplus fees which went into Lord Truro's pocket, and now the Government seem to think it right that the Treasury should inherit those fees. Not only are exorbitant fees paid, but when there is a mortgage on the property transferred extra fees have to be paid, and in addition there is an exceedingly bad index kept. So far as the late Lord Truro was concerned the office was an absolute sinecure, the whole of the work being done by subordinates.

(2.50.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I wish to call attention to the fact that no reference is made in the Bill either to the old arrangement or any proposed new arrangement. I claim that a more definite explanation of the arrangement made ought to be given by the Government, and that more time should be allowed to hon. Members to consider the matter. My main objection to the Bill, however, is of a general character. It may be impossible to so amend the Bill as to make the system of registration compulsory throughout the country, but I believe that is the only reasonable course which can be taken. If registration is good for Middlesex, it is equally good for the whole country, and I object to this partial and piecemeal kind of legislation.

(2.55.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I must remind the Committee that my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast (Mr. Sexton) has already pointed out that it has not been made clear that the alleged economy to be effected by this Bill will be appropriated in the manner intended. However that may be, I agree with the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) in contending that there is no reason why the Imperial Exchequer should make a profit out of a local land registry; but it has not been made clear how the money, or really what amount of money, will go into the Exchequer under the Bill. I believe, however, that the Government would do well to defer the consideration of the measure, which was only circulated yesterday, especially as the persons who have to resort to this office would not be damnified by a short delay. The haste of the Government in the matter and the communications that have been going on between the two front Benches seem to me to be very suspicious. Whenever we see past and present Ministers combining together to get the Speaker out of the Chair, I think we ought to have our suspicions aroused. We all know that hitherto one-half of the fees have been pocketed by a descendant of Lord Truro. Who are the other Registrars? Are they noble Lords also? When we find the Government bringing in a Bill of this kind to the confusion of their supporters, and the First Lord of the Treasury throwing up his hands in despair at any idea of opposition, we ought to insist upon a full and complete explanation. If the Bill is seriously intended, the schedules should be so drawn as to show that the money will go into the Exchequer.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): Referring to a remark of the hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) about the two Front Benches conferring together, I may say that I remember when I was a young Member of the House, the present Chief Secretary for Ireland giving me a lesson in procedure. The right hon. Gentleman told me that whenever I saw the two Front Benches agreeing, I might come to the conclusion that there was some mischief on foot. But I may remind the hon. Member for North Longford that every question that comes before that House is not a Party question. There are great and important questions of finance and administration altogether outside Party considerations, and I am perfectly sure that both sides recognise the wisdom at times of carrying out important works of public good and public economy by concerted action between the Party Leaders. I may point out that the salary connected with this office being on the Votes, the hon. Member for Northampton will have the opportunity, on the Vote for the Land Registry Office, of raising the whole question of the cost of the office. But this is not the time to raise that question. In the same way, with regard to the hon. Member for Camborne's (Mr. Conybeare) suggestions as to the compulsory registration of titles, this is not a Registration of Title Bill, but a Registrar's Fees Bill, and the two things are very different. Here is an office which, under existing legislation, has the right to levy certain fees. For a considerable number of years one half of those fees have gone into the public purse, and the other half into the pockets of the private sinecurist. This is a Bill to terminate the private sinecurist, and to provide that the whole of the fees shall in future go into the public purse. It has been asked, Why the hurry in this matter? The hurry is £5,000 a year. What would my hon. Friend below the Gangway say if in the present week this sinecure place were filled up, and a vested right created which could not be abolished without large compensation. I ask the House of Commons to rise above all Party feelings in a matter of this sort, for I see great danger of this opportunity of effecting a real saving of £5,000 a year being lost if the House does not proceed rapidly to the passing of the Bill.

(3.5.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): By this Bill certain important duties are transferred. May I ask whether the Registrar will derive any additional emoluments under the Bill?

MR. JACKSON: I thought I had explained that matter last night. The position is this: There were originally three of these Registers, as they were called, in the Act of Parliament, and after paying the expenses of the office the surplus fees were divided among the three. One of the offices lapsed and the fees were then divided between the remaining two. Another died, and the Lord Chancellor, with whom the appointment rested, appointed the Queen's Remembrancer, on the condition that the fees to which he was nominally entitled were paid into the Exchequer. Another vacancy having arisen it is not proposed to make a fresh appointment, but to pay the whole of the surplus fees into the Exchequer. The question of increasing existing salaries has never been considered. If application were made for another £100 a year in respect of extra duties, I do not want to shut myself out from considering it, but no change in that direction is contemplated, so far as the Bill is concerned; the fees must go into the Exchequer under the new arrangement.

(3.10.) MR. SEXTON: After the statement of the right hon. Gentleman I hope the Government will see no objection to put an end to all doubt upon the subject by declaring in terms in the Bill that all fees or additional fees received under the powers now given shall be paid into the Exchequer. There may be some arrangement which does not appear in the Bill, and we ask that the intentions of the Government shall be placed beyond all doubt by being embodied in the Act.

*(3.11.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I trust the hon. Member will be satisfied with the assurance that the Bill carries out the intention he desires, but it would be decidedly injurious to the public interest to introduce such a provision in the Bill, because if the arrangements were to become stereotyped, then it might not be possible to attempt any reduction upon the Votes, as has been foreshadowed by the right hon. Member opposite (Mr. H. H. Fowler). The Bill is the bond fide outcome of a desire on the part of the Government to effect a great public economy by transferring these fees to the Exchequer. The Government say, upon their responsibility, that the measure accomplishes that purpose fairly and fully, and, having made that statement, I must leave to the House the responsibility of proceeding with the measure or not.

MR. CONYBEARE: Will the Government recite in the Bill the arrangement proposed?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, no.

MR. CONYBEARE: Then I think we had better report Progress.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): Perhaps the Financial Secretary will not mind my asking a bond fide question—namely, whether we may take it as absolutely understood that the rules which the Lord Chancellor has power to make in the first Section of the Bill relate solely to procedure, and will have nothing whatever to do with salaries or fees?

MR. JACKSON: Oh, certainly.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If it was possible for the Lord Chancellor to appoint the Queen's Remembrancer on a former occasion there is nothing in this Bill to prevent anybody else being appointed now.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The appointment does not rest with the Government or with the Officers of the Government. It rests with a person wholly independent of the Government.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Who is he?

The question was not answered.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Bill reported without Amendment.

*(3.15.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I trust that the House will now allow the Bill to be read the third time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. T. M. HEALY: Now that we have granted the passing of this Bill I desire to explain the true inwardness of the position of the Government in this matter. Formerly the appointment to this office was vested at one moment in the Lord Chancellor, and in another in the Lord Chief Justice of England. The Lord Chief Justice at the present moment is a Liberal; the Lord Chancellor is a Tory. Had the office remained in the gift of the Lord Chancellor, he would have been allowed to job it away. But, as the office will now be in the gift of Lord Coleridge, a Liberal, and, therefore, one to whom Her Majesty's Government are inimical, this Bill is brought in and extreme pressure put upon the House by the Tory economists to pass it after 12 o'clock at night, all in order to take a piece of patronage out of the hands of Lord Coleridge. And this Bill has to-day been put in the front of the pièce de résistance of the Government, the Irish Land Bill, so important is it to prevent a Liberal Judge from having a piece of patronage. We all know that jobbery exists in various holes and corners of this Kingdom, but if there is any office that requires remodelling, refreshing, cleansing, and purifying, it is the patronage in the hands of the Lord Chancellor. No hurry is ever shown when an office falls vacant that is in the patronage of the Lord Chancellor. The only desire is to fill it up if it happens to be a sinecure. On the present occasion I have to congratulate Her Majesty's Government on their splendid zeal for economy, because the patronage happens to be in the hands of Lord Chief Justice Coleridge. That is the sole explanation of this Bill. I have tried to get out of the Government what their wonderful afflatus was, but having failed, it only remained for me to bell the cat.

(3.18.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I desire to mention, with reference to the remarks of the hon. and learned Member with regard to the Lord Chancellor, that when the vacancy fell to him to fill up, he appointed the Queen's Remembrancer, on the condition that the fees were paid into the Exchequer.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) BILL.

(No. 111.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, to leave out the words "the Land Purchase Acts after the commencement of."—(Mr. Conybeare.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'the Land Purchase Acts' stand part of the Clause."

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I am satisfied with the Debate which occurred last night. I understand that the Chief Secretary has undertaken to make some alteration of the Bill.

(3.19.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I wish to point out, with regard to the Amendment moved last night by the hon. Member for Camborne, that the hon. Member for Longford had suggested that it would be an improvement if we allowed the £900,000, or so, out of the £10,000,000 originally granted under the Ashbourne Act to be allocated under this Act. That is not a matter with regard to which the Government has a strong opinion one way or another. I think it would be better to have one system of land purchase in Ireland, but I have no objection to the Amendment. However, the proper way would be to omit "for the purpose of such prior proceedings." If the hon. Member will withdraw the Amendment I will at the proper time move the omission of these words.

MR. CONYBEARE: I am quite willing to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I have placed on the Paper an Amendment to this effect: In line 1, Sub-section 1, after the word "Acts" to insert "as amended by this Act."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I accept the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in Sub-section 1, after "Acts" insert "as amended by this Act."—(Mr. E. Robertson.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 8, to omit the words "for the purpose of such prior proceeding."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

(3.24.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I have now to move to omit from line 10 in the clause the word "guaranteed." This is an important Amendment, because if it is accepted there will unquestionably have to be a considerable change in the Bill in regard to the mode of procedure. I object to a Guaranteed Stock, because I believe that the responsibility of the country should not be nominal, but real, and at the last election the country decided against incurring any liability for the objects of this Bill. I do not think those objects are such as to justify us in throwing more responsibility on the taxpayers. There is, in the Bill, both a suppressio veri and a suggestio falsi; and the Government try to persuade the unfortunate taxpayer that he will incur no liability. If we assume that estates of value of £150,000,000 are to be sold, we may take it that, before getting back on Sinking Fund in full, at least a century will elapse. From whom do we buy these estates? We buy them from the Irish landlord for cash. To whom do we sell them? We sell the estates to the present tenants. Many of these tenants have very small holdings, and Sir James Caird says there is no economic rent in these small holdings. We should thus come into the legal right to extort what ought not to be extorted. The Chief Secretary says there would be a margin, but that depends on whether the price of produce would be maintained. Who can guarantee that the price of produce will not fall during the next century? In all probability it will fall. We know that there has been a heavy fall in the price of produce during the last 20 years. While the purchase of land will be regarded by business men as a bad investment in Ireland, there are special reasons why it might be regarded as a bad speculation. In Ireland there are a large number of properties supposed to be worth millions, which are now in the Encumbered Estate Court or in Chancery, and cannot find purchasers. Only two years ago the Land Commissioners reported that 15 years was too long a term to grant without a revision of rent owing to the rise and fall in the price of produce. If these properties had been bought in 20 years ago, the purchasers would have been told that their security was perfectly safe, and yet we now know that the loss would have been very considerable. We may, therefore, fairly say that it is problematical that in the next 20 years there may not be a fall equivalent to that which has taken place within the last 20 years. Whilst the purchase of land in England would be regarded by business men as a bad or questionable investment, in Ireland there are special reasons why it would be regarded as a bad speculation. Rent in Ireland has not the sanctity of property which rent elsewhere has. There is a feeling—I do not say whether it is right or wrong—against rent in Ireland. Landlords in Ireland are not popular. Does anyone suppose this feeling will diminish? Does anyone suppose that landlords will be more popular when England is made the landlord in many cases? Common sense tells us the reverse will be the case. It tells us rent will soon be called Land Tax or tribute paid to an alien Government. Last year the Chief Secretary told us we were entirely mistaken in supposing there would be any opposition to the payment of this tribute or annuity, because no one had protested under the Ashbourne Act. But we find there are numerous protests against that Act. There are many persons unwilling or unable to pay rent, and who ask for a reduction of the annuity. You may take it that although the tenants may possibly be able to pay their rents, there will be what I may term a political strike against rent. That assuredly is possible, and I think it exceedingly probable. It is absolutely impossible to meet this by eviction. You cannot, for a moment, think of evicting hundreds of thousands of persons because they do not choose to pay their rent. I have here a statement by a right hon. Gentleman who, with hon. Gentlemen opposite, is a great authority upon this matter, I allude to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain). Speaking in Scotland he said—

“Working men of England and Scotland, you will be Irish landlords; you will have to evict the tenants; you will have to collect your rent at the point of the bayonet, and I refuse to be a party to such contingencies.”

What does the right hon. Gentleman say now? Is he not a party to such contingencies? These contingent securities cannot be impounded until evictions have taken place; therefore, evictions are the first things that will have to take place. Suppose the right hon. Gentleman overcomes his refusal to be a party to these contingencies, where are we to get buyers? Who in the name of wonder would buy these holdings? At present when a man is evicted you have the greatest difficulty to induce anyone else to take the farms owing to the strength of public opinion which is brought to bear against the persons who take evicted farms. Unquestionably that difficulty would be very greatly increased if evictions were to take place at the instance of the British Government. But the Bill suggests you should farm these farms yourselves. Can anything be more ridiculous? Practically, all we have for the repayment by the tenants is their goodwill. They will decide in their own consciences whether they will pay or not. No doubt you will find a very large number of persons who in some place or other will decide they will not pay. I have here also the opinions of other eminent men. What does Lord Selborne say? He considers the tenants would not pay rent, and he proves satisfactorily to himself and to me that Solomon was of the same opinion. He says—

"I know very well that Mr. Gladstone has persuaded himself that, if this immense accession is made to the National Debt, we may rely on the Irish re-paying. Now, I have authority even higher than Mr. Gladstone's for warning you against suretyships, even for a less amount. In a certain Book of Proverbs it is said, 'He that is surety for a stranger shall smart for it, and he that hateth suretyship is sure.' Look at the party from whom repayment is expected in this case. I feel sure that if the country enters into these transactions it must expect to pay."

So much for Lord Selborne, backed up by Solomon. The noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) said—

"The first effect will be that the tribute asked from Ireland will be unpaid. It would be idle to think of exacting tribute, or the interest on any loans you may advance to a starving peasantry or to the unemployed artisans of once flourishing communities."

The right hon. Member for West Birmingham, addressing some people somewhere, said—

"Yes, and you were to take the risk, which at the beginning was to be £50,000,000, and which very soon would have been £200,000,000, and you were to take that on a security on which I venture to say no private individual and no Financial Company would have advanced one farthing."

It is said we do not advance more than £30,000,000. Personally, I think we involve ourselves in the necessity, if we agree to this grant, of advancing a very much greater sum. I put the minimum at £150,000,000. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian limited in his Bill the liability to £50,000,000, and then hon. Gentlemen opposite said we should be forced to advance £200,000,000 or £250,000,000. The same arguments which went to show that if you advanced under the right hon. Gentleman's Bill £50,000,000 you would have to advance a larger sum, go to show that if you advance £30,000,000 at present you will have to advance a larger sum, only they are considerably stronger now than they were then. We do not select estates. It is the first come, first served. This is proved by what took place under the Ashbourne

Mr. Labouchere

Act. Under that Act the Duke of Abercorn received £267,000, and the Duke of Leinster received £244,000. I do not say they were in any way bad landlords, but they applied first and they got the money. What will be the result of the operation of this Bill? We shall have two classes of tenants in Ireland. The first class will be what I may term the tenants of the State. They will pay lower rent than the other tenants, and will at the end of 49 years obtain their holdings. The other class will be the tenants of private individuals. They will pay a higher rent than the tenants of the State, and at the end of 49 years they will not get their holdings. It seems to me obvious that this will create such agitation and confusion that the only way out of the difficulty will be to buy all the land of Ireland. But the Bill only deals with £30,000,000, and it is asserted that if the tenants do not pay, we are to secure repayment from other sources. I admire the ability of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in trying to make a really good financial omelette out of rotten eggs, as I shall show the other securities to be. The first of the other securities is that we retain one-fifth of the purchase money in our hands. This would undoubtedly be a cover so far as one-fifth is concerned if we were to give the real value of the estate, but as a matter of fact we begin by giving about one-fifth more than the value of the estate. The Chief Secretary said we buy on a certain number of years' purchase on the net value. We do not buy on the net value, we buy on the gross value, less the local contributions of the landlord. No allowance of any sort or kind is made for expenses of management, local charges, cost of eviction, or other incidentals. This one-fifth is perfectly illusory. We are told the British taxpayer is absolutely and entirely protected from any chance of having to pay. We collect £1,169,000 from Ireland every year by way of Imperial taxation. This, capitalised, amounts to £29,717,000, which it is proposed to advance in these guaranteed bonds. It is said, therefore, that the British taxpayer is secure by holding this money in his hand even if the tenants or annuitants do not pay. That is very pretty in theory, but let us look at the fact. The £1,169,000 is made up of a considerable number of items. In the Return which is furnished to us of the amount of each item, the first class of items is called the cash portion of the guarantee fund. That amount is not in any way allocated at the present moment to any particular service. That amounts to £293,000 per annum. I think the Government might have added £40,000 or £35,000, the Customs portion. I admit this is absolute cover, so far as it goes, although it is doubtful whether we could really refuse to give it to Ireland, and whether, if we did refuse to give it as now, we should not be called upon to give it to Ireland in some other shape or form—in meal, or malt, or something else. If I add £35,000 to the £293,000, it gives us £328,000. The capitalisation of this sum is £8,025,000. Therefore, we have to find somewhere else £841,924 in order to make the capitalisation up to £29,717,000. How is this done? And here comes in the ingenuity of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman takes the Imperial contributions to local charges—to the maintenance of lunatics in workhouses, the salaries to workhouse schoolmasters, allowances to medical officers, and payments for medicine for dispensaries and medical appliances. I assert this expenditure could not be withheld. It is absolutely necessary for the future of civil society. It is absurd to say we could allow the lunatics to go at large. We could not refuse to pay schoolmasters and others in Ireland because a number of tenants—our tenants—had refused to pay us their rents. If the counties did not meet this expenditure you would have to meet it. The State pays a portion of the charge for the police of London. Does anyone say that we might mortgage that portion and go without the police? What have these unfortunate lunatics, these schoolmasters, these paupers specially to do with the fact that the Imperial Parliament takes upon itself to enter into these transactions? Are you to say to a lunatic: "I will turn you loose if a tenant in Tipperary does not pay me"; are you to say to an unfortunate schoolmaster: "Go; you shall not have your salary"; are you to say to the pauper: "You shall starve because I cannot get some money from the tenant?" The real amount of cover from Ireland is £328,000, which capitalised will make £8,025,000. That leaves £21,691,000 absolutely uncovered. The Government have another plan for getting back our money, although, if their former plan were good they would not trouble themselves to provide other securities. They propose, if the money is not paid by the tenants, that the Lord Lieutenant shall be empowered to issue a precept to any defaulting county to make up by means of a rate the amount due. If the default is owing to distress, how can we get the rate any more than the rent? The same may be said in the case of a political strike. If the people should say, "We are not going to pay the rent," are they likely to recognise their obligation to pay the rate? Then I ask what does the grocer in Tipperary gain from your giving credit to the Tipperary farmer? Yet you say, "If the Tipperary farmer does not pay you come down on the Tipperary grocer." You do not intend to obtain the consent of the county to levy this local rate or to enter into these transactions. You impose these transactions on the county and, having done so, if the individual does not pay you call on the whole county to pay. Yet this is the Government which, during the last few years, has been prating about introducing a grand scheme of local self-government for Ireland. I think one thing seems to be forgotten. Before you can impound any of the local money, or levy any rates, you must exhaust all possible means of getting the money from the particular individual who owes it to you, that is to say you must proceed by eviction. We have the statement of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) that he never will assent to the contingency of eviction, and, therefore, he never will assent to our obtaining our money in any other way, because eviction must be the primary step. But allowing that the £30,000,000 are amply covered by the securities, I think that a fatal mistake has been made in the calculations. As the money comes in we are to reinvest it in fresh purchases. New credits are to be opened before the old are extinguished. The consequence is that there is an overlapping. What will happen in the fortieth year? The State will in that year have £1,169,000 covered, but it will in that year lose about £2,250,000, and therefore will be above £1,000,000 short. Assuming the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be perfectly right, we shall not be protected so far; because, instead of investing the money in Consols, we are to invest it in other securities risky in themselves. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham has said that if we could show that the securities were not covered he would be an inconsistent person. I have shown it. Now, what advantage, social or political, is to be derived from this purchase of land, which outweighs the risk? In 1881 an Act was passed creating dual ownership in Ireland. That was regarded as a perfect panacea for all the ills of Ireland; but now we are told that it is so unjust and injurious a measure that we ought to risk £30,000,000 to get rid of it. What is this dual ownership? I take it as simply meaning fixity of tenure and fair rent. If the rent is not fair let it be made fair. You have laid it down that a fair rent is the margin that remains after the tenant is allowed to live and thrive. You based your legislation of 1881 on the landlord being only allowed to exact a fair rent. If the rent is unfair then reduce it. But if the rent is fair, why change it; why not leave it as it is? I see no earthly reason why the taxpayers should pay in order to convert these exceedingly fortunate tenants into freeholders—they are much better off than English agricultural occupiers, and why, because they are better off, are they to be converted into owners at the risk of the British taxpayers? Now, here in London we have dual ownership, we have heavy ground rents, and very few people are able to get freeholds; the people of London pay excessive rents and they are badly lodged owing to the high price of land resulting from this system of dual ownership. We have long complained of this, and we have urged reform, but we have never come to the State for assistance. When the Londoners ask for the enfranchisement of leaseholds they do not ask the State to lend them the money for 49 years, they say they are willing to pay for this; and if people in Ireland want to be freeholders why should they not pay for it? Why are we in London to incur the cost of making the Irish tenants freeholders? Let them in Ireland as in London, if they want to become freeholders, pay for it themselves and not come sponging on the State for credit and assistance. Further, why should it be for agricultural tenants only that State aid in this direction should be invoked? There are plenty of manufacturers and traders who, if they could obtain capital at 2½ per cent., with 49 years given to pay the principal, would be able greatly to benefit themselves and to give a share of the benefits to their employés under them. There is a name I can mention which will command respect on both sides of the House—the late Mr. John Bright. What does he say on this question of dual ownership in Ireland? Mr. Bright, writing to Lord Kilmorey in 1887, said—

“The Land Act of 1881 and the Land Courts have given 15 years leases to the tenants at a rent fixed by the Courts during the period of 15 years. To me there seems no reason why, under those leases, landlord and tenant should not live in as much harmony as they have lived in past times, under ordinary leases in Ireland, and as they live now in Great Britain. I do not agree with those who are saying so much about the dual ownership, as if there is great importance in that phrase.”

Well, I do not see why tenants should not be left to this dual ownership. It is somewhat curious that hon. Gentlemen opposite and Liberal Unionists should be now so anxious for the extinction of landlords in Ireland, that they should consider they have a sort of function of a political St. Patrick to drive out landlords from Ireland, as if they were so many snakes. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian made a proposal of this kind all those gentlemen denounced it as a perfect monstrosity. Lord Salisbury said—

“If the money is to be spent, for Heaven’s sake let it be spent in a common-sense way, not spent in a fantastic scheme which never, in the experience of the human race, has been attempted before. I can show the Prime Minister a better way of spending the money than in buying the landlords out. I do not say I recommend it, because I am not at all convinced that the electors of Great Britain ought to bear such a tremendous burden; but, assuming that the Government is right in thinking that they ought to bear it, I would point out to them that if they could only emigrate another million of the Irish people, they might do it for a great deal less than that sum.”

Again, speaking to an assembly of Primrose dames and knights, on the same date, Lord Salisbury said—

"Buying out landlords for the purpose of evading the duty of protecting them would be a cowardly shirking of our responsibility."

What did the President of the Board of Trade say speaking to his constituents at Bristol?—

"If a large liability is to be incurred for Ireland by this country, it would be better spent in promoting emigration rather than in that wild scheme of buying out the Irish landlords which Mr. Gladstone proposes."

In a manifesto of Liberal Unionists at Liverpool, signed by Lord Derby, the measure of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was thus described—

"A measure bad in itself, likely to be disastrous to Ireland and injurious to Great Britain, pregnant with danger of future strife and collision, and involving the expenditure of many millions of the hard-earned money of the taxpayer."

What did the Chancellor of the Exchequer say? Upon finance I may say I am a disciple of the right hon. Gentleman, and I treasure up everything he says. Speaking in Scotland the right hon. Gentleman said—

"You are going to expropriate and expatriate the whole of the landlords in Ireland to other parts of the United Kingdom. You are leaving Ireland to fight her way alone with this burden on her, having removed from the country most of those who might contribute to her support."

Does the right hon. Gentleman say "Hear, hear" to that? [Mr. GOSCHEN: Hear, hear!] Very well. The Duke of Rutland, too, was very indignant with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian for bringing in the measure. Speaking at Hatfield he said—

"Part of the scheme of the Government was the expropriation of the existing landlords of Ireland. What class was it that maintained the large section of the Irish people, the day labourers, the grooms, the gardeners, the men-servants and the maid-servants, the vast body of people who could not be reckoned either as landlords, tenants, or manufacturers? Why it was the landlords of Ireland, whom it was proposed to exile from their native land. These people would have to emigrate to England, and the English labourer and artisan would find additional Irish competition not only beating down their wages but rendering it impossible for wages to be sustained or increased."

Well, I do not find myself able to agree with all the Duke of Rutland has said, but I am inclined to agree with him here. If you remove the rents and the landlords it would be beneficial, but if you remove the landlords and substitute a great absentee landlord in the State, if you carry away the rents to another country, then I think the Duke of Rutland is entirely right and that you do harm by spending money in this way. We have in this country a large revenue derived from land, especially in rents, and imagine what this country would suffer if all these rents were paid into France and withdrawn from this country. But in Ireland the case is much stronger. Here we have other industries than that of agriculture, but agriculture is practically the only industry in Ireland, and yet you lightly say you are going to take away the rents arising out of this industry, and that you will benefit the country by so doing. I say the money we are asked to vote now will be wasted, and that for all the good it will do you might just as well convert it into bullion and cast it into the sea. The Government will not effect their own purpose by this measure. Their object is to do away with dual ownership in Ireland; but there will still be dual ownership between the State and the tenants. They will establish in place of the dual ownership between the tenants and the landlords, some of whom are resident, a dual ownership between the tenants and the non-spending State, and this is to go on for 49 years. What happens at the end of that term I do not care, and I do not know that anyone does. As practical men we must look a little closer to the immediate future than that. Then, again if you convert the tenant into owner he may and no doubt will sell or let. You cannot prevent it by legislation, you cannot make the people adscriptus glebæ, a sort of caste as in India—an agricultural caste, and say, "You were born on this land, you must remain on this land, and throughout your life you must continue to cultivate this spot of land." Who really does benefit by all this outlay? Do the landlords? Some undoubtedly do. Some landlords will sell well. They will pocket their money and go somewhere else to enjoy it. But many landlords do not wish to do that. What will their position be?—for instance, I take the case of the hon. and gallant Member for Armagh (Colonel Saunderson). I believe he is a landlord who deals fairly with his tenants, and he probably wishes to remain in Ireland. Look at the unfortunate position in which he will be placed. I think it ought to induce him to come to our assistance in our endeavour to do away with this guarantee. He is on good terms with his tenants, and they pay only fair rents. But neighbouring tenants are suddenly enabled, by the use of British credit, to pay less rent and to take possession of their holdings at the end of 49 years. Will he not thus be placed in a false position? Will he not find himself at feud with his tenants from whom he demands nothing but a fair rent, or will he not have to reduce his rents below that which is fair simply because others around have had their rents reduced by the assistance of the State? I appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite, for the sake of the hon. and gallant Gentleman in his position as a fair landlord, to pause before they assent to the scheme of the Government. Do the tenants profit in any way? I do not think they will if they keep faith. They will have to pay a fixed amount for 49 years. I would rather pay on a sliding scale with a revision every 15 years than pay a fixed amount in 49 years. It may be a good bargain or a bad one. I can conceive it being such a bad bargain that they could not pay; but as they have not the remotest intention to pay and as they know that it is the British taxpayer who will have to pay, in that sense they will make a good bargain for themselves. Will Ireland be benefited? I have pointed out the effect of the absenteeism proposed to be created. Will the relations between the two countries be improved? Surely not. When we become the owners of the land in Ireland we shall inherit all the ill-feeling engendered by centuries of injustice, and be hated as landlords of the country. Who, then, will get the benefit? Some landlords will, and the tenants will if they do not pay; but the real persons who will gain will be our friends in the City here—the mortgagees. Companies have advanced enormous sums on estates in Ireland, for while in England they get 4 per cent. they get 5 per cent. in Ireland, and there is the natural result of high interest and bad security. These companies cannot foreclose; they cannot get their interest, and they are delighted with the Bill because it will enable them to be paid in full. The mortgagees will be the beneficiaries.

Mr. Labouchere

How are the Irish Members going to vote? My impression is that they are going to vote for the guarantee because they regard the money as a gift. As sensible men, they know that much nonsense is talked about security, but that nobody in Ireland dreams of paying a halfpenny. A few months ago, I read a speech of Lord Salisbury's, in which he urged as a reason why this Bill should be passed that it would render Home Rule impossible. Irish Members are therefore selling their birthright for a mess of pottage, and a rotten mess of pottage it is, too. Still, with us Home Rule is a principle, and, come what may, we still remain Home Rulers. There is Home Rule and Home Rule, and by aiding the Government to pass this Bill Irish Members are making it somewhat difficult for Radicals to give them that very large measure of Home Rule which they desire. Control over the land of Ireland is a portion of the measure of Home Rule which should be given to Ireland; but the electors will say, "It is not Irishmen's land, it is our land. The Irishmen have bargained it away for our money, and we must look after that land, and exercise some sort of control over it. We may be base and bloody Saxons, but we are mortgagees—we have our rights, and must look after them." It is suggested that the Bill may remove a difficulty, that if they get hold of the land the Tories will perhaps agree to allow the Irish to exercise control; but the Tories will do nothing of the sort. On the contrary, they will use the fact of this money being advanced as an argument against giving the Irish control over the land. It may be said, some Liberals do not go so far as others as to the amount of control to be granted, and that if the Bill passes we shall become a happy family in this matter. Well, I do not see how the difficulty that exists is to be removed by the Bill. There can be no absolute finality in legislation on land. Whether you pass this Bill or not you must place the control over land with an English or an Irish Parliament, and the difficulty will exist whether you pass the Bill or not. Personally I could never understand how any one calling himself a Liberal, much less a Radical, can hesitate for a moment to give the Irish full control over the land. I not understand the distinction between property in land and anything else. I can understand the opposition to Home Rule; but that anybody in favour of Home Rule should say we will give the Irish Parliament full power to deal with manufacturers and other property, but reserve to the English Parliament the right of control over land, seems to me absolutely illogical. It may be asked why are we so indignant at this guarantee, particularly as the Liberal Government brought in a Bill with a similar sort of guarantee. Well, that does not concern me, for I voted against it, and undoubtedly of the two Bills that was the better. The annuities were to be paid from the Irish Exchequer, and if we had an Irish Parliament the Irish Local Authorities would act as a buffer between us and the actual tenants. But the real point is this, that it is no use going back to that; we must recognise the fact that at the last General Election the people declared against any species of Imperial guarantee being given for the purpose of purchasing land. No great measure involving a huge liability like this should be passed without the approval of the country being obtained to it, and a fortiori no great measure like this should be passed when the country has expressed disapproval of such a measure, as the country at the General Election did. At the last General Election not only did Members on this side declare against an Imperial guarantee, but almost every Tory, as well as Liberal Unionist, went to the electors with the cry, "Do not return the Liberals to Parliament, although Mr. Gladstone has declared the Land Purchase Bill is dead, for it is humanly possible that he may bring it in in another shape. Send us to Parliament as the guardians and protectors of the Imperial Exchequer against the possible raids of Mr. Gladstone." I have in my pocket 69 addresses of Conservative and Liberal Unionists [Cries of "Read, read"] which I have obtained at the British Museum. The hon. Gentleman would not say "Read" if he realised the utter sameness in the addresses. I will, however, read one or two as samples. Here is one signed "Algernon Borthwick," who is, I presume, the Member for South Kensington. He said—

VOL. CCCLII. [THIRD SERIES.]

"The English taxpayer in these times of hardship and depression is to be asked to contribute millions on millions upon the chance of the Irish tenant farmers paying their rents to the permanently-absentee landlord—the British Treasury. Common sense, honesty, loyalty, and law all condemn the wild and dangerous scheme which the Premier (Mr. Gladstone) has adopted."

The next extract is from the address of Mr. Bartley, the Member for North Islington, who said—

"The very heavy additional burden of taxation which the policy of the Government involves in buying out the Irish landlords seems to me to be both unjust and unnecessary to the English, Scotch, and Welsh taxpayer."

Viscount Baring, the Member for the Biggleswade Division, said—

"I am opposed to the Land Bill, because the British taxpayer would become liable to a charge of at least £30,000,000, and probably not less than £200,000,000, for the purchase of the property of the landlords of Ireland."

Lord Henry Bruce, Chippenham, in his address, said—

"That you, the British taxpayer, should, out of your hard-earned incomes,"

—we all know this style—

"be called upon to pay the fabulous sum of from £50,000,000 to £150,000,000 to buy out the landlords, and that in future the odium is to devolve on your shoulders of collecting their rents—which will assuredly be considered foreign tribute—is a burden which I imagine you will not for a moment tolerate."

Mr. Gathorne-Hardy, East Grinstead Division, said—

"The second Bill provided for buying out the landlords at an enormous expense, which would almost certainly eventually fall upon the British taxpayer. It was the principle of this scheme, and no mere Resolution, which was decisively rejected by Parliament."

I have taken these as the most moderate samples, but all alike condemn the principle of an Imperial guarantee. The present Bill unquestionably gives such a guarantee, and that guarantee is justified by the most transparent of subterfuges, the subterfuge being, I fancy, the effort of the Member for West Birmingham. That right hon. Gentleman explained all over the country that he had a plan for reducing rents and making occupiers owners with no loss to landlords, no Imperial guarantee, no liability to the British taxpayer. Well, we wondered how he was going to do this, and for a long time he did not produce his plan, but at last this plan is produced, and, I presume, we owe it to him. He says that guarantee is merely nominal, and there is no real liability. But I think I have shown that there is, and I think we can, as men of business, judge of the security. I put it to men of business, if you were to go into the City and ask for a loan on this security in the Bill without this guarantee would you get it? How much money would you get? I defy the Chancellor of the Exchequer to get up in his place and fairly and honestly say that, from his knowledge of the City of London, he could place a loan for the purposes of the Bill without a general Imperial guarantee at 5, 7, or even 10 per cent. But this violation of a pledge on the part of a great Party is really more important than the financial loss, because it strikes at the confidence that ought to be entertained by the country in the majority of the House of Commons, whether Liberal or Conservative. The Party opposite call themselves constitutional; I think their conduct in this matter is unconstitutional—so unconstitutional that I was going to say it was “dishonourable;” but I will not do that; I will say, “Brutus is an honourable man.” We know that if this Bill is passed here, there is no chance of its being thrown out in the House of Lords, which is a mere pale reflex of the majority in this House. I suppose if the Liberal Party were to bring in a Bill in opposition to their pledges to the country, the House of Lords would throw it out; and they would be justified in doing so. But you do not expect the House of Lords to do that now. The head of the House of Lords is the head of the Government, and gentlemen sitting on the Front Bench opposite are merely his clerks. These are my chief reasons for moving this Amendment. I have not a vestige of doubt that I shall be beaten, because I do not believe that the present Government could propose anything, no matter how monstrous, no matter how contrary to the pledges that had been given at an election, which their henchmen on that side and on this side would not vote for. Though we shall be beaten, we shall have done our duty. We shall have protested against this guarantee on its merits, and have protested against it as one of the grossest violations of confidence ever perpetrated by Representatives against those they represent. Though we shall be beaten, I have no doubt that the electors will take the matter up at the next General Election. Two days ago an eminent Member of this House, taking part in the proceedings on some festive occasion, in returning thanks, said this House was on its death-bed. My only prayer is that it may never rise from its death-bed.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 10, to leave out the word “guaranteed.”—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘guaranteed’ stand part of the Clause.”

(4.35.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member who has just sat down has taken the opportunity afforded by the Amendment standing in his name to make a most elaborate Second Reading speech against the Bill. No topic touched upon in the prolonged Debates that took place last year on the Second Reading, so far as my recollection serves me, has been left untouched—I will not say unadorned—by the hon. Member. He has discussed the necessity, or absence of necessity, for land purchase. He has discussed the advantages and disadvantages of landlordism, and he has discussed the advantages and disadvantages of dual ownership. Whether the course taken by the hon. Member was strictly in order it is not for me to say. [Opposition cries of “Order!” “Chair!” and “Withdraw!”]

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; whether he was strictly in order it is not for me to say. I think that it will, at all events, be admitted that is not my bounden duty to follow the hon. Member closely through all the topics to which he has thought fit to refer. One observation made by the hon. Member caused me some surprise. The hon. Member expressed his inability to understand the frame of mind of any person who thought that a legislative distinction could be drawn between landed property in Ireland and other kinds of property. He said he could understand the frame of mind of those who oppose Home Rule, but that the frame of mind of anyone who could be so silly as to suppose that legislative precautions had to be taken in the case of Irish land which need not be taken in the case of other property in Ireland was a degree of stupidity that he could not understand. If the hon. Member's view is right, the most stupid men in this House are the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian and the right hon. Member for Newcastle, and their stupidity is shared by nearly every considerable Member of this House, except the hon. Member himself, who has in the last 10 or 15 years expressed an opinion upon the Irish land question. Then the hon. Member raised a topic which is not raised for the first time in this House. He dwelt on what he termed the inconsistency of the Tory Party in making themselves responsible for a large scheme of land purchase in Ireland, and quoted some election addresses to show that objection was taken by Conservative Members to the Bill of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. Of course, objection was taken to that Bill; and if it should be revived, I think the hon. Member would find that the same objections would be taken by the same people, and on the same grounds, and that it would not be necessary to express them in different language to that which was used in 1886. The objection made in 1886 was not to land purchase in the abstract. [Laughter.] The opinion I am expressing is founded entirely upon the extracts quoted by the hon. Member. The Committee will see from those extracts that what was objected to was the risk of loss to which the British taxpayer was exposed by the Bill of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. But those who opposed that measure do not think that risk is thrown upon the British taxpayer by the Bill before the Committee. They may be right or wrong. I shall in a few moments have to explain why I think they are right; but whether they are right or wrong, there is no inconsistency in their position, which is that the scheme advanced by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian in 1886, connected as it was with a scheme for a Home Rule Parliament, was essentially insecure; whereas the present Bill, with its entirely different sets of guarantees and its different machinery for recouping the British taxpayer, and with no association with a Home Rule measure, is a Bill which may be accepted in perfect security by even the most anxious economist. The hon. Member has asked us—and again this is a question which has been asked before in the House—what financial house in the City would lend money upon the security provided by this Bill. I reply that if you were to go into the City and say, "You shall have absolute control over that part of the Imperial Fund which goes to support Irish local taxation; the Guarantee Fund shall be put into your till if there is any insufficiency of payment," there is no house that would refuse to accept the proposal. The security is absolute. If you gave an Imperial pledge—if this House were to give a pledge that the £30,000,000—to name a sum—of the Guarantee Fund should be paid to the City house in case of insufficiency in the receipts from Irish land, of course no firm would refuse to take the responsibility, and the House of Commons is in exactly the same position as this hypothetical firm.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The Government are under the prior obligation of keeping the lunatics in Ireland.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no obligation of a financial kind to keep the lunatics.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): How about the police and removables?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I trust we shall not hear much more about this hypothetical firm. The hon. Member for Northampton has criticised the security for the advance of money by the State, saying that agricultural produce is very likely to fall in value. The hon. Member said that arrangements are going to be made with the tenants which will cover a period of 49 years, that during that period any number of vicissitudes may affect agriculture as they have done in the past, and that as the income the occupier receives is diminished, so his ability to pay will diminish with it, and we may find we have lent our money on agricultural security which has greatly shrunk in value. Of course, no one can absolutely forecast the future, and what the hon. Member predicts with regard to the value of agricultural produce may come to pass, but there are two observations with which I may meet the hon. Member's criticism. The small tenants whom the hon. Member has in his mind as those who will suffer most by a shrinkage in the value of agricultural produce sell only a small and insignificant portion of the produce of their holdings. The greater part they consume themselves; and in respect of that part, therefore, it matters not a farthing whether the price goes up or down. Then I believe the tenants will very seldom have to pay more than 80 per cent. of their present rents; and in the case of the small petty holdings which afford least security, no doubt the number of years' purchase will be proportionately small, and the reduction in the annual payments in proportion to the present rents comparatively large. In the poorer districts of the West I suppose there will be few cases of more than 15 years' purchase, and the reductions will probably be reductions of 40, 50, or even 60 per cent. upon the rents now paid. The margin supplied by such reductions is so enormous that I think we may look forward with perfect equanimity to anything that may happen to agriculture in the next 49 years, and not anticipate any difficulty of the kind the hon. Member has referred to. We must also bear in mind that the eventuality of periods of exceptional distress is met by the creation of two kinds of Reserve Funds which will, I believe, be adequate to bear any strain that is likely to be thrown upon them. So much for the objection of the hon. Gentleman, on the score that the land on which the money is lent will fall in value. But then the hon. Gentleman complains that the Government give too much for the land, and settle too long a term of years for the purchase. I think that the hon. Gentleman must have had in view the Bill of last year; the Bill of this year mentions no number of years' purchase, and leaves the whole question entirely to the landlord and tenant to settle what price they shall receive and give, subject to the decision of the Land Commissioner that the land given in security is ample to meet the loan made upon it. The hon. Gentleman has based his speech upon, not memory, but forgetfulness of last year's Bill. The hon. Gentleman, however, has preserved the greater portion of his criticism for the Guarantee Fund. For my own part, I fully accept the principle that the Government cannot ask the House of Commons or the country to lend more money than they have already lent on the security of Irish land without supplementing the security in some effective manner. I contend that we have succeeded in doing so. The hon. Member has, first, taken the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund, and his criticism is, "I grant that the cash portion fully covers the £8,000,000 or so advanced, but even as far as the cash portion is concerned, you will have to evict before you use it, and eviction is a thing from which you will shrink, and is a thing in which the right hon. Member for West Birmingham has expressed the opinion that he will never take part." But it being accepted that the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund is inadequate, the hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken with regard to the question of eviction, which is not in any way an essential preliminary. The Bill provides that as soon as there is any deficiency in the Land Purchase Account in consequence of the non-payment of annuities, immediately the Treasury shall seize upon an amount of the cash in its possession equivalent to the default, quite irrespective of any payment on the part of the tenant, or of selling his holding. The criticism of the hon. Gentleman on the cash portion is, therefore, based upon an imperfect acquaintance with the contents of the Bill. With regard to the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund, the criticism is that since that portion of the money is devoted to such local purposes as the support of pauper lunatics and other analogous purposes, it will be impossible for this House, under any circumstances, to touch it. For my own part, I fully believe that under no conceivable circumstances which any practical statesman can contemplate will it ever be necessary to touch the contingent portion of the fund. Even the hon. Member himself does not contemplate a general conspiracy against the payment of the annuities. But if there were, for my own part I do not believe that the House would shrink from requiring the locality to pay a tax sufficient fully to pay the deficiency in the cash portion. Before we can arrive at the contingent portion we have to conceive a universal conspiracy against payment of the annuities all over Ireland, that the localities refuse to pay the tax legally put upon them to meet the deficiency; and that this House will be a soft-hearted — I was going to say pusillanimous—as to meet this deliberate conspiracy against the taxpayers of this country by calmly repealing the Act and giving to the localities—who must have been privy to the conspiracy—funds to which they have no earthly right. I do not believe that the House would hesitate for a moment if the contingency arose. But is this possible? I contend that it is not. I dealt with this question at very great length last year, both on the First and on the Second Reading of the Bill, when I gave detailed financial arguments and figures which nobody has attempted to meet. Does the hon. Gentleman think that it is so easy to get up a universal conspiracy against the payment of annuities?

MR. LABOUCHERE: Yes.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then I maintain that the hon. Gentleman knows little about Ireland. In order to make such a universal conspiracy successful they must, in the first place, deal with a landlord whose pecuniary position is such that he cannot stand by himself; secondly, the conspiracy must be backed up by a system of boycotting and intimidation; and thirdly, the conspirators must have enormous funds at their disposal. I believe that the amount paid out of the Land League funds to each evicted tenant is about £3 a month, and from that anybody may calculate what sum it would need to back up a universal conspiracy against the payment of annuities. It would require millions, and where are they going to get those millions? The hon. Member seemed to think that the Government would be under the necessity of cultivating the holdings. What the Government would do would be simply to turn the tenants out of their holdings. [Ironical Opposition cheers.] I suppose if there was a conspiracy nobody would object to that? Then they would have to be supported out of other funds; and, of course, the thing would break down. I suppose they would build a certain number of Land League huts, but the conspiracy would break down, and a great many of the people would come back to their holdings. But a general refusal to pay is quite impossible to contemplate. Whether from historical reasons or otherwise, there undoubtedly exists in the minds of a certain portion of the Irish tenantry an idea, which is backed up by the Irish in America, that there is something inherently wicked in what they are pleased to call "landlordism," and that a tenant fighting his landlord is a proper object of sympathy and has some peculiar rights not known to the Common Law. But what sympathy would there be for men who had got a reduction of from 20 to 40 per cent. on the original rents, and who had been aided by the British taxpayer to become proprietors of their holdings, on the part of any section of opinion in Ireland, in this country, or in America? They would get no sympathy, and they would deserve none. They would occupy the position of an ordinary debtor who, having the power to fulfil his obligations, absolutely declines to do so, and they would utterly fail in receiving assistance from America. I do not believe that any such struggle, if attempted by the most insane agitator, would meet with the slightest degree of support from the Irish purchaser. We have had 20 years' experience in these purchase matters, and in no case has there been the slightest indication of such an attempt. We have had to deal with purchasers under the Acts of 1869, 1870, 1881, 1885, and 1888; and if our experience proves anything, it proves that the Irish purchaser is not the scoundrel which the hon. Member for Northampton endeavours to make out. But if by any possibility we can conceive any conspiracy against the payment of annuities on so enormous, so gigantic, and so inconceivable a scale that the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund will not be sufficient to meet the deficiency in the annuities—if we accept such a wild hypothesis—then I do not think that the Legislature of this country would hesitate to meet that conspiracy by the only arm by which it properly could be met; they would refuse to pay the ratepayers of the counties, who must have abetted the conspiracy, funds to which they had no legal title; and they would fail in their duty not only to this country, but to the Irish people, if they allowed the provisions with regard to the contingent portion of the fund to remain a dead letter. Never was there, or can there be conceived to be, a safer financial transaction than that which the Bill asks the House to undertake; the whole advance is, and must be, covered. Imagination may wander at will over various possible contingencies—potato failure, conspiracy against rent, what you please; but, if the figures involved in any fancied hypothesis are worked out, the conclusion must be reached that, whether the Bill is a good Bill or a bad one, whether it is suited to the needs of Ireland or it is not, whether it will or will not contribute to the solution of one of the greatest difficulties that ever arose in the government of Ireland, it is financially a perfectly sound and secure measure.

*(5.1.) MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I have listened with much pleasure to the address of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, but I notice that he made one important mistake, and that was when he stated that he had answered in detail all the different points raised by the hon. Member for Northampton. I wish to remind him of what appears to me to be the most important point in the hon. Gentleman's speech to which he did not allude at all. I refer to the challenge given by the hon. Member for Northampton to the right hon. Gentleman to say whether my hon. Friend was or was not right in giving certain figures which would be the deficit between the amount of the Guarantee Fund at its 40th year on the one hand, and the amount due from the tenants in the 40th year on the other hand.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I admit that I did not touch that point, because, although I felt the importance of it, I thought it much better to defer allusion to it, because it is not strictly relevant to this Amendment. In dealing with such complicated figures as I shall have to present, I prefer to deal with them at a later stage.

*MR. KEAY: Of course, the right hon. Gentleman is entitled to his opinion; but, at the same time, I think that the point which he so gracefully elided is one which presents in the most forcible manner the risks that the British taxpayer has to incur under the guarantee which is the subject of the present Amendment. I am very glad the right hon. Gentleman has adopted and endorsed in the speech just made all he said last year on the First and Second Reading of this and of the former Bill. As the matter is fresh in the memory of the House, it would be well for me to deal with the statement on which he has laid particular stress on the present occasion. In what I thought was a very courageous, if not a boastful, spirit, he spoke of his description of last year as to how the tenants' instalment was to be met in case of total repudiation, and he said that the figures given by him on that occasion had never been controverted. Now, in my humble way I attempted to controvert those figures in my speech on the Second Reading of the present measure, and I was further prepared, after the Amendment we were then discussing was disposed of, to have addressed the House on the Main Question; but, by some subtle influence for which I cannot account, it appeared to be known on the Treasury Bench that it was this point as to the insufficiency of the Guarantee Fund that I intended to touch on, and the result was that no sooner had I risen in my place than I was promptly closed by the First Lord of the Treasury. I am bound to add that that was the solitary occasion on which during the period I have sat in this House I was appointed Teller on a Division, that Division being on the Closure. I will now ask the House to allow me to read from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman to which I have just alluded. It certainly was what he has called an exhaustive speech. I will not trouble the House with the preliminary passages in which he boastfully alluded to how the tenants' instalment was to be met from the Guarantee Fund in case of total repudiation. The right hon. Gentleman very properly accepted universal repudiation as the only contingency that was worth considering when discussing the financial solvency or otherwise of the Guarantee Fund. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"Very well, instalments at 4 per cent. on an advance of £30,000,000 amount to £1,200,000 a year. Let me suppose that in one year—the hypothesis is an absolutely unfavourable one—not a single sixpence of the annuity was paid, what funds would there be at the disposal of the Treasury, and of the Land Commission to meet the deficiency?"

I should here tell the House that this speech of the right hon. Gentleman has been very carefully revised by himself, and that I am quoting it from Hansard. The right hon. Gentleman goes on to say—

"We shall have, first, the £200,000 reserve fund; secondly, there would be the £200,000 annual probate grant; and, thirdly, £40,000 of the new Exchequer contribution, and £75,000, being the $\frac{1}{4}$ percentage on £1,200,000, and there would be besides that, if we accept the hypothesis of 17 years' purchase, £1,118,000 of tenants' reserve; so that without touching the £5,000,000, which is the landlord's fifth, and without touching a sixpence of the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund, you have £1,633,000 to meet a call of £1,200,000, on the extreme and absurd hypothesis of not one sixpence of annuity being paid during the year in question."

Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman said that these figures had never been controverted. I am sorry he has left his place, because I am going to controvert them now. He spoke of the reserve of £200,000. That was the first item. To that I answer that that reserve is only available for one single year, and that in the following year it would not exist. The second item is the Probate Duty grant, which he put at £200,000, whereas the Returns show that it ought to be £189,000. Then there is the Exchequer contribution of £40,000 a year. I accept this, and I have put it to both sides of the account. He then tells us that in some mysterious way there will be £75,000, being a $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. of the tenant's 4 per cent. instalments, called the county percentage. How he could ever have imagined that, on the assumption that the 4 per cent. instalment was to be withheld bodily by repudiation, the $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. was to come in and the $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. were not to come in, I should be glad if he would explain to the House. The last item is one which had a great effect upon the House. He said there was the tenant's reserve of £1,118,000, adding, in a qualifying parenthesis, that that was on the assumption of 17 years' purchase being the average rate. But the right hon. Gentleman must know, and it is shown by the Return presented to this House, that whenever 20 years' purchase is reached no tenant's reserve can come into existence at all. The present Bill provides that 20, or even 30, or 50 years' purchase may not only be the price of the land, but may be advanced by the Treasury. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman was not justified in talking about the tenant's reserve being a guarantee at all, seeing that it is merely contingent on the improbability of the tenant getting the land from the landlord at only 17 years' purchase. What, then, are the incontrovertible figures the right hon. Gentleman rests on? I have summed them up in two columns. I have one column containing what the right hon. Gentleman says was the amount last year of the safeguard of the British taxpayer, and I have put the truth of the matter in the other column. The right hon. Gentleman's column comes to £1,633,000 of cash held against tenants' instalments of £1,200,000. The truth is, that the actual amount would be £229,000 only, which would leave an odd £1,000,000 totally uncovered.

(5.15.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I think the hon. Member has shown that there is a superabundance of guarantees, and there is an annual income of £1,000,000 to cover deficiencies. I object to the multiplicity of guarantees, which are totally unnecessary. I should prefer the simple guarantee of the Consolidated Fund to all these local guarantees, which I would like to see swept away altogether. It is quite certain that no person in the City would advance money so cheaply as the Government. There was a dispute between the hon. Member for Northampton and the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The hon. Member said that no person in the City would advance 10 or 15 per cent. and the Chief Secretary plainly showed that the Government advances would be a good speculation. I do not think that any firm in the City would advance money so cheaply if there were no Government guarantee. In my opinion, the great advantage of this Bill is that the small tenants of Ireland would get their farms at a much cheaper rate per year than they would if there was no guarantee by the Government. That is why I think the Bill a good one for the Irish tenant. Now, to come to the point as to the English taxpayer. If hon. Members on this side of the House think that the English taxpayer ought not to guarantee the funds, I think they are justified in voting against the Bill. But if it can be proved that the taxpayer ought to pay, then I do not think that in order to gain a Party advantage they ought to sacrifice the tenants of Ireland. The whole sum involved is about £1,000,000 a year, or £30,000,000 in the aggregate. What is likely to be the probable deficiency? Experience of the various Land Acts of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and of Lord Ashbourne's Acts, shows that the deficiency will be very trifling. It has not yet amounted to anything like 5 per cent. of the annual income. The British taxpayer would in all probability have a very small sum indeed to meet, even if all the local guarantees were swept away, and the Irish tenants would gain a considerable advantage. The outside cost to the British taxpayer would be about £50,000, if that much. It is not a great deal to provide. Ireland in five days provides £50,000 for the conveyance of British troops to any part of the world, and in the same period for that and other purposes she contributes £100,000. Therefore, the surplus contribution of Ireland for five days alone is all that the Imperial Exchequer is likely to be called upon to pay. The sum required is extremely small compared with what Ireland contributes; and I think the taxpayers may fairly come forward and say the sum is so small they are willing to pay it. I intend to vote against most of the local guarantees, because I think the charge should be borne by the Imperial Exchequer. I think the small tenants in Ireland have certainly very strong claims which cannot possibly be met without the Imperial guarantee.

(5.24.) Mr. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I am one of those who are strongly against a guarantee for any purpose contemplated by this Bill. I think in the country some rather unjust reproaches have been levelled against this side of the House, because of unwillingness to allow the guarantee. Were it intended for the congested districts or to mitigate the unfortunate consequences of our policy in Ireland, I should not be unprepared to accede to the proposal. But that is a wholly different business from the proposals of this Bill, which are not designed primarily for those who are poor and in distress. The guarantee is mainly on behalf of those who are by no means poor. The Bill proposes to make advances irrespective of the financial necessity or position of those who receive them. Under the Ashbourne Acts, during the last five years, the money has been spent not in the poor districts of Ireland at all, but in Ulster and other prosperous parts of Ireland, outside Ulster; and what has been the experience of the past may reasonably be anticipated as the experience of the future. I doubt whether this guarantee would close accounts between landlords and tenants, for it would still be competent for the landlord, after receiving a certain number of years' purchase under this Bill, to stipulate for further sums for the tenants who get their farms by purchase. The landlord will be able to refuse his consent to the tenant getting the benefit of this guarantee, and by that means he will be able to appropriate to himself the bonus created by the use of British credit. That objection alone is, to my mind, fatal to the use of British credit in this way. The use of British credit will create a certain bonus in the hands of those persons for whose benefit it is applied. If you say that it is to be applied to the very poor people of Ireland, then I can understand it. But you apply it indiscriminately to all the tenants of Ireland. As an illustration, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, when he first introduced his Bill, spoke of a tenant paying a fair rent of £100, which would be reduced to £68, thus putting into his pocket a bonus of £32 a year. If you are going to use British credit for the benefit of a tenant who can pay £100 a year, how will you refuse to use it for the benefit of the poorer classes of this country, or all classes in a like position in this country, when they ask for it to be extended to them? The strongest ground of opposition of all is that the use of the guarantee will put the British taxpayers in the position of the landlords of Ireland. That point, however, has been so much dwelt upon that I will not pursue it. I am not going to suppose a general strike against rent; still, it would be necessary for the Government to evict a considerable number of persons, or otherwise they would not be able to enforce payment. I do not think it necessary to say anything about the securities. Had the Bill been a good or a fair measure, or one intended to benefit the poor people, and not the landlords, I should not have looked too closely or jealously at the securities; but when we consider the nature of the securities it is found that they have been condemned wholesale by the most competent authorities. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who spoke just now said that the debt was so good that no security was required. I do not know how that may be. The noble Lord the Member for Paddington, in a series of letters which have not been answered, and the hon. Member for Elgin and Nairn, in a pamphlet which cannot be answered, have demonstrated that these securities are absolutely worthless. It is quite true that the Bill introduced by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian in 1886 was a much safer proposal, and although it could be defended on the ground that it was part of the general settlement of the government of Ireland, still I cannot say that I liked it; indeed, I declared at the General Election that I would not support it. But it is no answer to the damaging criticisms which have been made against this Bill to say that similar proposals have been made in past times. No doubt, had it not been for the land proposals of 1886, the Liberal Party would have now been in power, and it does seem to me inconsistent with the honour of Parliament that a Party whose success at the polls was due to its attacks on the land scheme of 1886 should now propose a Bill of a more dangerous character. It is of no use dealing further with this point. I am perfectly sensible of the position in which we now are. The Opposition appear to be in this position: that they are hampered by the unfortunate fact that in 1886 a similar Bill was brought forward. It is of no use our offering any arguments to hon. Gentlemen opposite dealing with the Irish question. For the last five years we have been trying to persuade the Conservative Party to share in our views, but not much attention has been paid to the arguments. It is, therefore, a hopeless struggle; but, notwithstanding this, I trust that the Opposition will fight this Bill in Committee right through, thus doing our duty to our constituents. Although the Government may betray their constituents we will not betray ours.

(5.35.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I think it is a little too unjust to reproach my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton with having travelled beyond the limits of the subject now before us in the able speech which he delivered, and which contained a great deal of matter of great importance submitted for the guidance of the House. I am not going to alarm the Government with the idea of an extended speech, but I am ready to give my opinion that there was not a word in the speech of my hon. Friend which was not perfectly relevant to the scope of the subject before the Committee. I will not speak of any implied reproach upon yourself, Sir; but I think it was conveyed in the question put by the Chief Secretary whether the speech of my hon. Friend was in order. I own it appears to me that, if it were the pleasure of the Committee so to do on this question whether the guarantee of the British Treasury is to be afforded to the outlay of a large sum of money, nothing could be more clear than that the Committee, if so minded, has a perfect right to discuss all the conditions of that guarantee. That is the protest I make on my part against the attempt at undue limitation, perhaps made without sufficient consideration, of the power of the Committee. I shall only make one or two observations upon what has fallen from the various hon. Members in the course of the Debate. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway—I will not say has objected to the Bill, but has observed on the Bill that his difficulty is to make out a justification or necessity for all the securities which the Chief Secretary and the Government have promised to provide. He thinks that, viewing the good disposition of the Irish people to pay their debts, there would undoubtedly be a moderate loss; still, that loss ought to be cheerfully borne by the British taxpayer, who ought not to condescend to place between himself and the possible loss these elaborately provided securities. Let me say that the scope of that moderate loss was not quite accurately estimated by the hon. and gallant Member. He stated that the amount of the risk which was incurred by this Bill was limited by the sum of £30,000,000; whereas, as has been frankly told to us from the first, the £30,000,000 is to be a circulating fund invested and re-invested until it has performed the whole of its operation, which may extend, with certain exceptions, to all the agricultural land of Ireland; and a sum near £100,000,000, being a good deal within the mark, was stated by the Chief Secretary as the extent of the liabilities that would ultimately devolve. I do not think that the hon. and gallant Member will find that there are many candidates for seats in any portion of Great Britain who would like to announce in their addresses to their constituents the doctrines which he has announced to-day. I perfectly understand the position of the Irish Members. Their position is a very difficult one. They have an unsettled money account between England and Ireland, in respect of which England is largely indebted to Ireland, although that debt has not been acknowledged, and has not been paid. Whenever a grant is made or proposed in this House it is the universal practice of Irish Members to accept that grant, but to frankly admit that they accept it without acknowledgment and without gratitude. They accept those grants as part payments of a sum of money which they hold—and, in my opinion, within limits, justly hold—as due to Ireland; and they regard the distribution of that sum of money by an authority of which they consider the moral competency to be more than doubtful, as portion of a policy expressly based upon, and intended to secure, the permanent refusal to Ireland of her rights of constitutional self-government, and to intercept and frustrate the attainment of the dearest wish of their country. That appears to me to constitute a case for them quite distinct from our point of view. We have to consider our own obligations to our constituents generally, and we ought to remember the circumstances under which in the present Parliament we have to comply with those obligations. Reference has been made to the subject of dual ownership, and the abolition of dual ownership by the plan now before us. Dual ownership, as has been stated by the hon. Member for Northampton, is not about to be abolished. For the ownership of the landlord the ownership of the British Exchequer is to be substituted, and our belief is that to present that ownership of the British Exchequer to the Irish occupier in general in lieu of the ownership of the landlord is a course dangerous and impolitic. That is a course in respect of which we, the authors of the Bill of 1886, stand in no embarrassment whatever, because there was no ownership at all on the part of the British Treasury—the ownership was that of the Irish authority. It was the Irish authority, and the Irish authority alone, which would in any circumstances have been called upon to settle with the Irish occupier the question of the repayment of the instalments due to the plan of land purchase. There is another point which, in my opinion, is of importance—the City firm. A challenge was thrown out by the hon. Member for Northampton to this effect—“What City firm would lend money on the securities that are offered by this Bill?” It is necessary to distinguish, of course, between the security and the guarantee. A City firm would lend money freely enough on the guarantee; but the question is whether the guarantee ought to be given. The Government say that this proposal is safe; that there is no liability at all; it is a nominal guarantee. But my hon. Friend proposes to test the question whether upon those securities a City firm would propose to lend money. What is the answer of the Chief Secretary? It was this—that if the House of Commons is prepared to place at the disposal of the City firm the Votes which it is now proposed to make, and which are under our control, for Irish purposes, then the City firm would lend the money. Our contention is that the House of Commons cannot place those grants at the disposal of any creditor in the manner intended by the Government. It would be impossible to prevent the application of them to their legitimate purposes. But what I want to observe is that the answer of the right hon. Gentleman is absolutely suicidal, because, if the allocation of the securities gives a sufficient guarantee for the City firm to lend its money, why are we to have an Imperial guarantee? Does the right hon. Gentleman not see that he has himself supplied the best argument for the proposition that is now before the House—that no Imperial guarantee ought to be given unless that guarantee is necessary? For the guarantee he now proposes there is no case whatever, and the Bill ought to rest alone on the validity and sufficiency of the securities he proposes. But I wish to state in a few words the main ground—indeed, I may say, the one sufficient ground—upon which I feel myself absolutely precluded under the present circumstances, and in the present Parliament, from dealing with any question whatever of British guarantee for an expenditure of this kind. It is quite true that the Bill of 1886 was condemned at the General Election. Of that there can be no doubt. But it was not condemned, as has been asserted, on account of the principle of guarantee which was involved in it, but on the ground of the conditions with which that principle was accompanied, and the manner in which it was applied. I suppose the main argument of the Chief Secretary would be that which has been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham—that it was the withdrawal of Imperial control from the government of Ireland, which really constituted the reason for condemning and refusing such a guarantee as was then proposed. I wish, however, before making an answer to that proposition, frankly and honestly to confess that the Bill of 1886 was condemned by many gentlemen sitting on the Liberal side of this House and by many constituencies. Whether it was condemned after sufficient discussion is another matter. Whether the principle of the guarantee of British credit of funds for Irish purposes is admissible, I do not feel myself at all obliged at the present time to question or decide. It is no doubt a question for the people of this country to decide, and they ought to decide it after full discussion, and with full knowledge of what they are about. But it is obvious that all those Liberal Members and constituencies who were disposed to condemn the guarantee of 1886 did not in the least degree condemn it on the ground supposed by the Chief Secretary, but on other grounds totally distinct. They did not disapprove of, but, on the contrary, they approved of, the granting of self-government to Ireland, and considered that to be a great recommendation of the plan proposed by the Land Purchase Bill of 1886, which had this recommendation, at any rate—that it was presented as a portion of the settlement of the Irish question. That question now remains unsettled, and has to be dealt with if this Bill should become law. I wish to affirm in the strongest manner—I am not speaking the opinions of Liberal

Members of this House, or of Liberals outside its walls, but the general opinion of the country in 1886, without distinction of Party, whether that opinion was hastily given, whether it is revocable or not—there can be no doubt that that opinion was absolutely hostile at that time, at the time when the country gave its commission to the present Parliament, to the granting of this guarantee in any form. That, I hold, is entirely beyond question. I do not think we are here simply to act upon definite instructions from the Government. We are a deliberative Assembly. The general rule of our procedure must be to hear the entire case, and freely decide on the various issues that are before us; but, at the same time, there are given circumstances under which we are bound by pledges, which ought not to be disregarded. In my opinion, a large portion of the minority, and certainly the whole of the majority, of this House, speaking generally—I admit the right hon. Member for West Birmingham is an exception—were returned with the fullest conviction on the part of the country that they were not to pledge the credit of the British Exchequer for this purpose. That conviction, I should say, constitutes a pledge. Nothing can be more important as a principle of the Constitution than that whatever understanding has prevailed at the time when the nation gave us our commission should be fully and absolutely maintained. My opinion is that the nation arrived at the conclusion that this guarantee ought not to be given. It might alter it. I do not scruple to say that there was an open pecuniary account between England and Ireland, and that that account will have to be settled on liberal terms. The nation will have to consider whether in those terms the use of the Imperial credit should be introduced. Undoubtedly, in 1886, speaking for myself, my view was that the Bill then introduced for the purchase of Irish land was a Bill that without risk to the British Exchequer—though I confess I feel some scruple in using those words after the way they have been used on the opposite side of the House—conferred a boon on Ireland which was demanded by justice. Whether that was a wise form of proceeding is a matter I do not consider myself able to discuss, because I think the proceedings of the election of 1886 have limited the arena in which we are to act. The nation at that time had arrived at an understanding, which we are bound to respect. Do not let it be supposed for a moment that I question the motives of any gentleman in this House, or presume to impeach his full right to determine for himself the limits of his duty; but, according to the best opinion I can form on public affairs, I think it would be a breach of faith to the country if we now proceed to pledge the credit of the British Exchequer to a great scheme of land purchase in Ireland, we being here, not as perpetual legislators for this country, but as those who received a certain commission in 1886, to the terms of which we are bound rigidly and loyally to adhere. I feel myself entirely shut out, therefore, from assenting to this principle; and, as I have taken the opportunity to declare it in previous discussions on the Bill, so I shall feel it my duty to give to-night no hesitating vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton.

(5.57.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Courtesy demands a few words from me in reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian; but they shall be very few and said in no hostile spirit. The main point of his contention was that the objection the country felt in 1886 to the Bill he proposed was one based on the broad fact that British credit was to be used. I differ from him. I say the objection of the country was based on an impression, right or wrong, but in my opinion right, that the credit of the country was not only going to be used, but was also going to be imperilled. Although the country expressed that opinion with no uncertain sound against the Bill which the right hon. Gentleman introduced, yet he now asks this House not to support a Bill which differs in almost every essential particular from his. It may differ for better or worse, but it does differ. It has a different set of guarantees, and a different set of securities, and, whatever its merits or demerits, it is not to be judged by any argument that may properly be urged against the Bill of which the right hon. Gentleman was the author. The right hon. Gentleman made one statement which struck me with surprise—that, in his opinion, a pecuniary boon was given to Ireland by his Bill, a boon which is equally given now, and demanded by justice. Sir, if the boon given by his Bill was demanded by justice, I cannot understand how the author of that Bill—let the verdict of the country be what it might—can now retreat from that position. If strong political justice is involved in a scheme of this kind, I cannot understand how the right hon. Gentleman can reconcile the lofty grounds on which he proposed his Bill of 1886 with his action against the measure now before the House. I probably should not do anything that would be conducive to the brevity or the amenity of the Debate if I were to explain the reasons which make me think that the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman imperilled British credit. I submit that his Bill should be excluded from this discussion. The present Bill must be judged on its own merits, and by what it contains; and I repeat the conviction which I expressed to the Committee two hours ago—that, whatever else this Bill may do, it does not imperil the credit of the British taxpayer.

(6.0.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I regard this matter from a different standpoint to that of the hon. Member for Northampton, and what I have to ask the Government for is some explanation of the meaning of the word "guaranteed." While the hon. Member for Northampton objects to what may be called the original guarantee, I, on my part, object to guaranteeing the guarantors. I am amazed that the Irish Secretary abstained from defending that branch of the scheme which is so obnoxious to Irish Nationalist Members, but which is equally covered by the word "guaranteed." As a matter of drafting, what is the necessity of this word "guaranteed" at all in this part of the Bill? It may either be inserted or omitted, without any damage whatever; and, for my part, I do not think the Government were well advised in drawing the fiat of the hon. Member for Northampton and of the Irish Members on the same matter, though from a wholly different point of view. From my point of view, I am entitled to argue this; if this House is not really building a castle in Spain for the purpose of holding out a mirage to English electors with the idea that they have a solid bulwark to resist Irish non-payment, I would ask why should you ask the pauper lunatic to pay rather than the policeman? You give £90,000 for education in Ireland every year, and you cover that under your guarantee. You have for one schoolmaster receiving £1 a week three policemen receiving 30s. If you want a guarantee, why not draw it from the policeman, who is a useless object? ["Oh!"] Well—I think I can gratify hon. Gentlemen opposite—who will become a useless object when the Bill passes, because we are told that it is the Irish agrarian question which poisons the social life in Ireland. The moment you withdraw and settle the Irish agrarian difficulty the necessity for the policeman disappears. I think I have heard that argument somewhere from Leicestershire. Accordingly, I say that if you declare that your advance of £30,000,000 is justified by the foundation of social peace in Ireland, then, having regard to the force, which exists to an enormous extent because of the agrarian difficulty, it would be more natural to hypothecate the police rate or charge rather than the charge for national education in Ireland. I think that is an unanswerable argument; but there is another. If we have any need for the police in Ireland, will even the Member for South Hunts contend that we have need for the removables? You have them in Ireland now 80 or 90 strong, enjoying salaries and allowances, which I imagine come to about £150,000 a year. They have their staffs of policemen attached to them, so that the removables, so to speak, breed an expenditure of a quarter of a million a year. Why, then, in face of the existence of this body, should you hypothecate the funds which go to pauper lunatics, schoolmasters and mistresses, medical officers of workhouses and dispensaries, and medicines and surgical appliances? If the Government are sincere and genuine in their proposal, knowing, as they must know, that the charge for education is more likely to increase than to diminish, and that the charge for the removables and police ought to diminish rather than to increase, why do they hypothecate these sums and not the charges for removables and police? Will anyone answer that argument? The Government have thought it well to entirely elude that branch of the discussion, and yet it is as fully covered by the word the hon. Member for Northampton objects to as the question of the Imperial guarantee. The losses to the Imperial taxpayer sit very lightly on my mind. I suppose I may consider myself to some extent an Imperial taxpayer. If this charge of £30,000,000 were distributed equally all round it would come, I suppose, to 6s. 8d. a head of the population of the United Kingdom. My view of this proposal is that it is a contemptible spirit for the House of Commons to display with regard to an Imperial guarantee in respect of a nation to which, as the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian declares, the Imperial Exchequer is still largely in debt. The imposing of this local guarantee upon Ireland, I say, is more odious to Irish Nationalist Members than is the Imperial guarantee to the hon. Member for Northampton. The Government are not sincere in the guarantee. No one knows in his heart better than the Chief Secretary that not a penny of the pauper lunatics' or schoolmasters' money is ever likely to be called on. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen say "Hear, hear!" then why do they put it in the Bill? Surely there is such a thing as frankness and sincerity in the conduct of the business of the State. We object to the schoolmaster having his interest imperilled. Why do not you include the policeman and the removable rather than the schoolmaster? Assuming it is desirable to have a local guarantee, there can be no answer whatever to that branch of the argument. But is it necessary to have a local guarantee? [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!] By his "Hear, hear!" the right hon. Gentleman thinks not, but he belies himself—of course, I use the expression without offence—by the drafting of the Bill. It is the poison you instilled at the General Election of 1886 into the minds of the electorate, and the fears you yourselves created in your minds for the purpose of shipwrecking Home Rule and destroying the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, which brings about this fanciful and inartistic guarantee. Either act in an Imperial spirit in this business or do not act at all. When this Bill is passed you will go to your constituents and say, "Oh, what a grand boon we have given to the Irish. How good is Mother England to her Irish children, or adopted children. Once more the great Imperial milch cow has given cream to the starving Irish." At the same time, you take very good care to make the starving Irish guarantee you against every shilling of loss. You declare that is generosity: I say it is the height of meanness. If you wished to act generously you would abandon this local guarantee altogether. You know every shilling of the advance will be repaid, and yet, for the purpose of laying the bogey you have raised, you persist in this local guarantee. If that is my view in regard to the pauper lunatics, schoolmasters and others, what is to be said of the fourth guarantee which you insist on getting from the localities? I ask for a definition of this particular guarantee stock. Having denuded us of our education, having deprived us of the sustenance of the pauper lunatics, is it creditable or decent in you to insist on a further guarantee out of the local rates, and to do it under a system which deprives the local ratepayers of the smallest amount of control over the advances which are to be made? Not only are we to be deprived of local control, but you yourselves declare you will not even allow the Members of the House of Lords to vote year by year the salaries of the gentlemen who are to pay out these moneys. I, therefore, might fairly vote with the hon. Member for Northampton, but I do not feel inclined to do so. To hear you talk about Imperial guarantees, one would think that Ireland is no portion of the British Dominions. The Income Tax gatherer comes round in Ireland as regularly as he does in England and Scotland. To speak of yourselves as the British taxpayers, when Ireland pays three times more than her fair share into the Imperial Treasury, is, in my opinion, a piece of Imperial impudence. Ireland's debt at the time of the Union was £13,000,000, but now the Imperial Debt is £800,000,000. Our view in this matter is entirely different to that of English and Scotch Representatives. We take exception to the word "guarantee," on the sole ground that it involves and implies a local guarantee just as much as an Imperial guarantee. We say that a local guarantee is unjust and iniquitous, and we wish to obtain from the Government some assurance that it will be struck out of the Bill. If you do require a local guarantee you might very well find it in the provision for the police, or the removables, or the Judges, or some other branch of the Civil Service, which certainly might fairly be expected to be cut down if a scheme of this kind is passed to bring social peace into our country.

*(6.20.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): There is no passage in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) which will be so heartily echoed by every Radical in the country as his frank recognition of the debt due from this country to Ireland. But it is just because we consider the proposals of this Bill will tend to defeat the payment of the real debt to Ireland, and because we Radicals intend to give Ireland the full control of the land question, that I, for one, oppose the Bill. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) said he hoped we were not opposing the granting of a British guarantee for Party reasons. Those of us who have tried to think out the question oppose this scheme, as we should oppose any such scheme of land purchase, because we consider it calculated to do injury to the Irish people themselves, and calculated to promote discontent and dissatisfaction among them—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That line of argument is not relevant to the question of the guarantee.

MR. CHANNING: I am opposing the giving of this guarantee Sir, because I consider that it will only unsettle the land question in Ireland instead of settling it. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has made it very doubtful whether he intends to deal with the local guarantee at all; and one feels inclined to ask whether he really proposes when the cash portion of the guarantee fund is exhausted to go straight to the rates. One can hardly read his pledge otherwise than as a pledge to the people of Ireland not to deal with the local funds, which are made part of the security, but to go straight to the rates instead. The British taxpayer is asked to give a guarantee in this matter, although he has no satisfactory pledge or security that the price to be paid for the land is a just and a fair price. You deny to the people of the locality the consent of some representative authority to the pledging of their credit. My main objection, however, to the Government proposal is that we are asked to guarantee the application of money to the carrying out of a scheme which will lead to social disorder and discontent in the future, and will discourage national thrift in Ireland. I think it would be wiser if the Government were to introduce some form of local control. There has been, in my opinion, but one sound proposal of land purchase put before the House of Commons, and that was the scheme proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan) in 1884.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is wandering from the subject. That is quite apart from the question of the guarantee.

MR. CHANNING: I will conclude, then, by saying that we oppose the granting of this guarantee, because it is given not to set Ireland free, but to forge for her a fresh chain.

(6.27.) MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Before deciding on the retention or rejection of the word "guaranteed," I think the House had better ascertain what the word means. I have been at some pains to examine the Bill, but I am in a state of considerable doubt about it. The drafting of the measure is of such a character that, at any rate to one who has not studied it very closely indeed, it appears to be self-contradictory. The Government had to admit yesterday that the advance which the Bill is intended to authorise could not be made until some important Amendment had been inserted. In considering the present Amendment one is driven to the examination of those portions of the Bill which are likely to throw light upon its signification, and I would invite Members opposite, who have copies of the Bill, to look at the last two lines of the first page and the first line of the second. There it is provided that the dividends and payments to the Sinking Fund shall be paid out of the Land Purchase Fund, and, if that is insufficient, shall be paid, as a temporary advance, out of the Consolidated Fund. On page 4, lines 5, 6 and 7, it is provided that if the Land Purchase Account is at any time insufficient to meet the dividends and Sinking Fund payments, the deficiency shall be a charge on the Guarantee Fund, and so on. Having read these pages, I am bound to admit that I cannot make out clearly what is to be the nature of the guarantee for the land stock issued to meet this difference. It is a very simple question to answer—what is it exactly that the House is undertaking to guarantee, and what is the guarantee here expressly referred to worth? The House ought to pause, I think, before deciding the question.

(6.30.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I think it is pretty evident from what has been said that what Irish Members want is to get our money under an illusory security. I object to a British guarantee in any shape or form, and so I shall support the hon. Member for Northampton. The Chief Secretary has made a long Second Reading speech, but he has failed to justify this dangerous, insidious proposal contained in the Bill. The hon. Member for Northampton has done well to attack the whole principle of the guarantee. The Bill is like some marine monster, with all its machinery under water. We do not really know what it means; we only know that in some shape it means the guarantee of the British taxpayer, and to that I have the strongest objection. There is no necessity for a guarantee for the Irish tenants; they are fairly prosperous, they are well off, and there is no reason why we should be burdened in order to turn them into landlords. There are certain parts of Ireland, called the congested districts, where distress exists, and with which we deal in another part of this Bill, and with which this Amendment does not deal. Putting aside these parts of Ireland, it seems to me the Irish tenants are an exceedingly prosperous set of people—they get good prices for good crops, and they have an exceedingly valuable property; as a matter of fact, I believe the only kind of property that is saleable at a good price in Ireland is tenant-right. I am not one of those who object to dual ownership. I think it is the right thing. In the interest he has in his holding it seems to me the Irish tenant has all the advantages of a real peasant proprietor in the true sense of the word, and this Bill proposes to turn him into a landlord at the expense of the British taxpayer. This will be of no advantage to Ireland, but, on the contrary, it will do a great deal of harm, creating a new set of evils with a new set of landlords. The Act of 1881 was founded on a right principle, and the Irish tenants are well off under it. I do not see why the British taxpayers, who do not own their houses, should be called upon to give this enormous security that the Irish tenants may become owners, and therefore I shall vote with the hon. Member for Northampton.

(6.35.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): Such an important Amendment as this, in which the enormous amount of £30,000,000 is concerned, requires to be fully debated before we come to a decision. On many grounds I object to this guarantee, and one strong reason is in the fact that I, in common, I think, with the majority of Members in the House, am pledged against supporting a proposal to use British credit to buy out Irish landlords. In itself that should be a reason for supporting the Amendment, and our duty to our constituents requires that we should carefully consider the chances of repayment of these advances. The security is hardly good enough for the English people, and but for the British credit behind it, every business man will say the money could not be raised. I do not say the time might not arrive when it might be right to consider whether we should allow the Imperial credit to be used for settling the land question; but the time has not arrived yet, because we shall practically be compelling the Irish tenants to pay more than the actual value of their holdings. I say distinctly you have no right to use British credit until you have decided in the first place what is the fair rent for the tenants to pay, and the number of years' purchase at that fair rent. If by any means the Irish tenants think they will not be compelled to pay back the money, then for the sake of a present advantage, the interest being less than their rent, they may be induced to agree to purchase at more than the land is worth, and by-and-by they will urge this as a reason for being relieved from their debt to the State. Before British credit is pledged in this way, the question of fair rent should be settled, and the actual value of the land determined. I do not accept the statement that the object of this guarantee is the benefit of the Irish tenants, but rather, I think, the object is to obtain money for the Irish landlords. They know, as we know, and the people of this country know, that Home Rule must come before long; and so the Government are trying to make the best terms they can for their friends the landlords while they have the opportunity. If you are going to use the Imperial credit, so that people may get money at 3 per cent., let the whole of the people benefit by the transaction. Why should you confine the advantage to agricultural tenants? If a scheme were proposed whereby tenants would continue in the occupation of their land at a fair rent, and for the benefit of the whole country, I could see some reason for using the Imperial credit so that money might be borrowed at a cheap rate; but why is this scheme to be carried out in this manner for the interest of one particular class? Have not tenants in England, Scotland, and Wales an equal right to the advantage of borrowing money at 3 per cent., or do you put a premium on agitation? Are the tenants in England and Scotland to take to heart the lesson that if they carry an agitation to extremity, they may hope to have a similar advantage conferred upon themselves?

THE INDIAN OPIUM TRAFFIC.

*(9.0.) SIR J. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): Although it has fallen to my lot on several occasions in years gone by to address this House upon the question of the Indian opium trade, I think I may honestly say that I never rose in my place for this purpose with so much feeling of responsibility on my shoulders as I do at the present moment. The House is well aware—individual Members are well aware—of the very large and increased interest that has been taken in this subject during the last two years, especially by the Christian Churches of this country; and I felt—on finding my own table as well as the tables of my Friends who are supporting this Motion on both sides of the House, covered with letters and Petitions—how very little any poor ability I may have is worth in representing that which so many of the best people of this country have laid earnestly to heart. This question has never been a Party question. My hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcudbrightshire, on the other side of the House (Mr. Mark Stewart), was dealing with it before I dealt with it. My hon. Friend the Member for the Honiton Division of Devonshire (Sir John Kenna-way), who has just entered the House, took a considerable and leading part in the question before I did so. My hon. Friend and relative the Member for the City of London (Sir R. Fowler), who supports me, and who is moving an Amendment to my Resolution, before any of us, I believe, took a part in the discussion of this opium question. I am now about to attack the entire Indian opium question. I look upon India and this country as inseparable, though that doctrine is not popular with some of my friends. But I believe it is a doctrine we have to maintain. I hold that we have to look at the interests of India and the interests of this country as identical. We, practically, appoint the Government of India; we, practically, make the laws which govern the Government of India, and we are responsible for the fact that all things go on in India under the jurisdiction of this country. In the first Resolution that I placed on the Paper, I did not propose to deal with what is called the Malwa opium question—that is, the transit duty on the opium coming out of the independent States—but on looking further into the question I found that it was so intimately connected with the Indian opium question that although, if I drew degrees of morality, I should not think the Malwa question is as immoral as our Indian opium cultivation and trade. I felt it was so bound up with the whole matter that it was necessary to deal with the Transit Duty as well as the cultivation of the poppy in India by the Indian Government. I think I shall show that the Malwa Pass Duty is as open to attack as any portion of the Opium Revenue. I say we cannot separate the Government of India from our Government. I look upon our connection with the manufacture of this drug as most wretched and wicked. We cannot look upon the moral question with indifference. My object will be to show that opium is a drug, that it is to be treated and used as a drug if it is to be used, but that its abuse is universally the source of human misery, demoralisation and crime. We must admit that, as a nation, we have, for the sake of pecuniary gain, fostered, promoted and encouraged the growth of the poppy and the sale of the poppy. There is no similar case in the whole history of this country where this country has become a trader in the most obnoxious article you could imagine, a trader in an article which has done damage to mankind wherever it has been introduced. We not only license the land, but we pay subsistence to the planter; we manufacture the article, we sell it for consumption, we store it in the warehouses, we send it in such quantities into the tenant-right. I am not one of those who object to dual ownership. I think it is the right thing. In the interest he has in his holding it seems to me the Irish tenant has all the advantages of a real peasant proprietor in the true sense of the word, and this Bill proposes to turn him into a landlord at the expense of the British taxpayer. less of this Motion as I have the last few hours conferred with the members of the House and telegrams from the country. I will now come to the question of the Motion.

As regards the question of the Motion, because there has not been a statesman on either side of the House who has ever said a word in favour of the morality of this trade. I have heard the pecuniary argument over and over again. With that argument I will presently deal. What I have to prove at the present moment is what are the effects of the trade when it has taken hold of the country. As regards China the effect of the opium trade there is a very terrible one. In 1838, it was a contraband trade. It was one of the grounds for the impeachment of Warren Hastings. At that time opium smoking was almost unknown in China, and our trade with China in that year was 3,000 chests. In 1842, the date of the first war, it had increased to 31,000 chests. In 1856, although it was still a contraband, it had reached 60,000 chests. The trade was legalised in 1862, and by 1862 it had reached 94,000 chests, and in 1879 it was 94,000 chests, and it continues at about 80,000 chests.

But we have taught the Chinese to smoke more of it for themselves. The opening of Chefoo was made by Sir James Wade in 1876 with the Chinese Government, under which it was proposed to leave the Likin opium duties in the hands of the Chinese Government themselves. Sir Louis Malet, in one of his very clear Memorandums, laid down the view that after careful reading of the Treaty of Tien-Tsin he was of opinion that the Chinese had a perfect right to impose any Likin duty they liked. The English Government refused to do so by Article 3 from 1876 to 1885. Members who took an interest in the question will recollect that some of the year after year, from 1876 to 1885, we have left the Governments alone on the question. It was contrary to the policy pursued between India and China, and they resisted it. For nine years we held out, because, as Lord Salisbury said, we should neutralise all our policy with regard to this drug. We have deprived the Chinese during these years of their power of unlimited pro-

market as we feel will keep up the market price and value, we advertise the article on the main line of railway from Bombay to Baroda. On our railroad placards are posted in three native languages, showing the native traveller where he can purchase this article, and we are traders in every respect in this article. I ask the House—suppose we had the entire whiskey trade under the management of this House, would there not be a great outcry in the country? Opium is far worse than whiskey. ["Oh!"] Some hon. Gentleman says "Oh!" but I will prove before I resume my seat that opium is far worse than whiskey. I merely take it as a parallel. If this House had all the whiskey distilleries of the country in its hands and advertised their whiskey—advertised it as the Indian Government do opium—what an outcry there would be amongst civilised people and amongst every one interested in the promotion of temperance and morality. I say, and I shall try to prove, that for this greed of gain we have sacrificed every principle of political economy—that we have sacrificed every principle of morality, and that we are sacrificing every principle of Christianity. Now, I lay down as the moral law that, whatever other nations may do, it ought to be no guide to us. It is no argument for us to do wrong. It is no argument for our supplying China with opium that the Chinese are growing opium themselves. It seems to me we have no alternative but to wash our hands of a traffic which is a disgrace to our Christianity and our morality. We ought to deal with this drug as a poison. In this country the seller of opium must be a registered chemist. If he dies his death has to be reported. Opium is scheduled as a poison in the 31st and 32nd Vict. c. 121. Every box, bottle, vessel, wrapper, or cover must be labelled "Opium—Poison," and be marked with the address of the seller. The Lancet, in a recent number, confirmed this view and said, "Opium is from first to last a drug and a poison." Perhaps there is no testimony more affecting than that of the unhappy Coleridge. He said—

"I used to think the text in St. James that 'he who offendeth in one point offends in all' very harsh, but now I feel the awful, the tremendous truth of it. In the one crime of opium what crimes have I not made myself guilty of? Ingratitude to my Maker; to my benefactor, injustice; and unnatural cruelty to my poor children; self contempt for my repeated promise—breach, nay, too often, actual falsehood. After my death I earnestly entreat that a full and unqualified narration of my wretchedness, and of its guilty cause, may be made public, that at least some little good may be effected by the dreadful example."

Sir George Staunton, the representative of the East India Company at Canton, said many years ago—

"It is mere trifling to place the abuse of opium on the same level with the abuse of spirituous liquors. It is (i.e. the abuse) the main purpose in the former case, but in the latter it is only the exception."

Sir Thomas Wade, who represented us for many years in China, gave evidence before a Select Committee of the House of Commons on the subject. The Committee in their Report said—

"The demoralising influences of the opium trade are incontestable and inseparable from its existence."

Sir Thomas Wade said—

"It is to me vain to think otherwise of the use of the drug in China than as of a habit many times more pernicious, nationally speaking, than the gin and whiskey drinking we deplore at home."

The late Rev. Dr. Williamson, an extensive traveller and experienced missionary, said—

I put it to the House that opium is a most excellent medicine and drug, but it has to be used with the greatest possible caution. If any hon. Member feels any doubt as to the medical testimony on this subject, I would refer him to the wonderfully good speech delivered in this House by Lord Shaftesbury—then Lord Ashley—in 1844, in which he stated the opinions of all the greatest medical men of the day. It is a drug which cannot be used by any man with impunity for very long; it deteriorates the constitution, and unfits a man for all the duties of life. I intend to prove to-night from the history of China, Java, Burmah, California, and our own colonies in Australia, the evil that is done by this drug in which we traffic. I have received during the last few weeks appeals on this subject from the Chinese Christians of Hong Kong, from the Christian Churches at Shanghai, from the Christian Churches at Canton, from the Pekin Anti-Opium Society, and I yesterday presented a Petition, with 1,100 signatures, from Singapore deploring the trade, and imploring the Government to put a stop to the importation of Indian opium. During the last few years I have presented Petitions to this House from the Convocations of York and Canterbury, from the Wesleyan Conference, the Free Church Methodists, the Baptists, the Congregationalists, the Presbyterians of England, the Scotch Church, the Free Church of Scotland, Cardinal Manning, and all the Roman Catholic Bishops of the United Kingdom, the Unitarians, the Society of Friends, the missionaries in China, the Bishop of Bombay and 300 clergy of Bombay. In 1883 I presented a memorial to the then Prime Minister signed by 3 Archbishops, 12 Bishops, several Peers, 60 Members of Parliament, and 30 Mayors and Provosts. I think that shows how very strong the feeling in this country is. I have just received a telegram from Bombay stating that a meeting has been held thereto-day, with the Bishop in the chair, which unanimously voted in favour of my Resolution. I presented to this House a Petition signed by a large number of the principal clergy in this great City of London. It was signed by the Dean of St. Paul's, the Archdeacon of London, Canons Newbolt, Russell, and Lang, the Archdeacon of Middlesex, Canon Furse, and the Rev. E. Carr Glynn. I presented to this House this afternoon a Petition signed by 4,100 inhabitants of India. I have looked carefully through the Petitions, and I have presented between 400 and 500 within the last few days to this House—and I never saw such Petitions in my life, in the long experience I have had in this House. They are signed by clergymen of all denominations, and by the leading inhabitants of towns. I have received them from Argyllshire in the North, to Devonshire and Cornwall in the South and West. Every Member of this House has been receiving Petitions from his constituents on this subject. I have never seen, since I have dealt with this subject, so much enthusiasm in the country, and I have never had so many prayers forwarded to me for the success of this Motion as I have had during the last few hours contained in letters and telegrams from all parts of the country. I will not go into the question of the opinions of statesmen, because there has never been a statesman on either side of the House who has ever dared to say a word in favour of the morality of this trade. We have had the pecuniary argument over and over again. With that pecuniary argument I will presently deal; but what I have to prove at the present moment is what are the effects of the opium trade when it has taken hold of a people. As regards China the history of the opium trade there is a very simple, but a very terrible one. Up to 1858, it was a contraband trade. It was one of the grounds for the impeachment of Warren Hastings. In 1820, opium smoking was almost unknown in China, and our trade with China in that year was 3,000 chests. In 1839, the date of the first war, it had reached 31,000 chests. In 1856, although it was contraband, it had reached 60,000 chests. The trade was legalized in 1858, and by 1862 it had reached 75,000 chests, and in 1879 it was 94,000 chests, and it continues at about 80,000 chests. But we have taught the Chinese to grow more of it for themselves. The Convention of Chefoo was made by Sir Thomas Wade in 1876 with the Chinese Government, under which it was proposed to leave the Likin opium duties in the hands of the Chinese Government themselves. Sir Louis Malet, in one of his very clear Memorandums, laid down the view that after careful reading of the Treaty of Tien-Tsin he was of opinion that the Chinese had a perfect right to impose any Likin duty they liked. For nine years we held out, because, as Lord Salisbury said, we should neutralise all our policy with regard to this drug. We deprived the Chinese during these years of their power of unlimited prohibition; we drove them to cultivate their own opium. They raised the Imperial Tax of 30 taels to 110 taels by adding a fixed Likin duty of 80 taels per chest. After May 6th, 1890, either party may terminate the Chefoo Treaty, by 12 months' notice, but then we fall back to our old position under the Treaty of Tien-Tsin. What has been the effect of this opium trade on China? Out of an enormous number of testimonies which I have collected I will give a very few, and I believe I have taken them honestly, selecting them by date over a considerable period. The late Dr. Medhurst said—

"That, calculating the shortened lives, the frequent diseases, and the actual starvation which are the results of opium smoking in China, we may so venture to assert that this pernicious drug annually destroys myriads of individuals. Slavery is not productive of more misery and death, than is the opium traffic, nor were Britons more implicated in the former than in the latter. Those who grow and sell the drug, while they profit by the speculation, would do well to follow the consumer into the haunts of vice, and mark the wretchedness, poverty, disease, and death which follow the indulgence, for did they but know the thousandth part of the evils resulting from it they would not, they could not continue to engage in the transaction. It has been told, and it shall be rung in the ears of the British public again and again, that opium is demoralising China, and become the greatest barrier to the introduction of Christianity which can be conceived of."

Dr. Osgood, who in 1879 was chief Medical Missionary at the Shanghai Hospital, wrote—

"I hope I shall not be accused of egotism or cant when I write that in my opinion the use of opium is an unmitigated curse. I have never heard a heathen Chinaman defend the use or sale of opium, but on the contrary, they universally condemn them. The only apologists have been representatives of Christian lands."

Many of the North countrymen in the House would know the name of David Hill, a well known Dissenting minister at York. His son gave me the following, and I asked him to write it down. He was a missionary in the centre of China—

"The effect of opium smoking among the Chinese has again and again been depicted to the British public in strong and earnest language; never, I think, too strong, certainly never too earnest. No language could fully picture to others the deplorable consequences of opium smoking, which I myself have seen in China, even in the case of some of my own Chinese acquaintances."

Sir J. Pease

That gentleman told me that when he went into one of the interior provinces, the city walls were placarded with papers warning the people against his coming, as it was the missionary who brought the opium trade, and who brought Christianity. The two things were coupled together, and if we are a Christian people, which I trust we are, I trust we may take away from ourselves the curse of preventing the spread of what we believe to be the purest form of religion amongst these poor heathens. I have several more quotations. Mr. Frederick Porter Smith founder and manager of the Hankow Medical Mission Hospital, Central China, said—

"I wish to place on record that after an intimate acquaintance with the people, the literature, the language and the commerce of one large province of central China, I am compelled to describe the infatuation, the miserable saturation of the country, the change of type of the character of the nation, and the miseries wrought upon individual habit, constitution, temper, and fortune, all exhibited in the course and consequences of the vice of opium smoking in China, as forming an unique instance of national lunacy and suicide. No epidemic possession of any people or sect reads with such terrible details as are afforded by the simple story of this horror. At the same time I protest against gratuitous exaggeration being imported into the question, now able to take care of itself."

Dr. Pringle wrote to the Lord Mayor—

"If those who have spent, as I have spent, 30 years in India, came forward on behalf of poor China, I am certain a weight of practical evidence would be forthcoming which would swamp anything that can be opposed to it, and would end in the Government of India washing its hands of what, without doubt, in these days of increased education in India is viewed as a sad blot in the rule of a Christian Power."

Some time ago a Petition was presented to this House signed by all the Protestant missionaries in China. I will only read one or two extracts:—

"The connection of the British Government with the trade in this pernicious drug creates prejudice against us as Christian missionaries, burdens our work. It strikes the people as an inconsistency that while the British nation offers them the beneficent teaching of the Gospel it should, at the same time, bring to their shores a drug which degrades and ruins them."

They describe opium as—

"A great evil to China, and that the baneful effects of its use cannot be easily overstated. It enslaves its victim, squanders his substance, destroys his health, weakens his mental powers, lessens his self-esteem, deadens his conscience, unfits him for his duties and leads to his steady descent morally, socially, and physically."

That was the evidence of the missionaries—there was a stronger testimony even than that. It was a letter from Archdeacon Wolfe of the Chinese Mission. He says—

"The people are being ruined by it, and it is indeed a lamentable spectacle to see professing Christian men speaking and writing in defence of the horrible crime. The pernicious results of this soul and body destroying vice are apparent all around. Cadaverous-looking faces meet one on every side, and the slovenly habits and the filthy appearance of the people generally testify too plainly to the evil it is working on this once industrious and energetic population. The rapid progress which opium smoking has made during the last 20 years among all classes of this population is a very serious matter for us missionaries. Humanly speaking opium smokers are beyond the reach of conversion, as the vice unfits them for the perception of any moral or spiritual truths. Can the Church of Christ in England do nothing to influence the nation to withdraw from the abominable traffic which is causing so much moral, spiritual, physical, ruin to this great people. It is a sad reflection on the Church of Christ in England that it seems powerless to influence the English people in so important a matter as the Indian traffic in opium. Almost the entire population in some places is abandoned to the use of this poisonous drug. The effects are witnessed in the extreme poverty of the people, in the broken down and dilapidated dwellings all through the village, and in the gross immorality which prevails amongst the inhabitants. Even openly and without shame they prostitute their wives in order to secure for themselves the means of indulging in opium smoking. Little children are sold as slaves and turned away from the embrace of their helpless mothers in order that their degraded fathers may have money to buy opium. And this and much more may be told of the effects of opium smoking on the miserable people; yet professed Christians in England see no harm in it, and openly advocate the abominable traffic which makes it possible, and comparatively easy, for the Chinese people to ruin themselves and their wives and children for time and for eternity."

It may be said, on the other side, that this state of things in China does not entirely arise from our action with regard to the traffic in opium. Certainly not, and no one for a long time has said that it did; but, at any rate, we are participators in that trade. We are sending 80,000 chests of opium a year to China, and, therefore, are helping largely to produce that state of things. The Indian Government are trying to make a profit out of that trade, and although it is becoming smaller, we are keeping it up as much as possible. There is one argument which has been used in this House again and again, I will not attempt to go into it. I think I hear the voice of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell). I remember that he said a few years ago that it was better that the people of China should be poisoned by our good opium than by the bad opium they produced themselves. That may be regarded as an argument by the hon. Gentleman, but I do not think it is one that will have the assent of the House. I will refer to a statement made by a well-known writer in a publication, the last edition of which I had the honour of publishing in conjunction with my late excellent friend who, I may say, was one of the greatest ornaments this House has ever had, the late Mr. John Bright. Mr. Dymond, in his Essays on Morality, says—

"If I were to sell a man arsenic or a pistol, knowing that the buyer wants to commit murder, should I not be a bad man? If I let a house, knowing that the renter wanted it for purposes of wickedness, am I an innocent man?"

Mr. Dymond treats the argument that if we did not do it some one else would, as follows:—

"Upon such reasoning you might rob a traveller on the road, if you knew that at the next turning a foot pad was waiting to plunder him. To sell property or goods for bad purposes because if you do not do it some one else will, is like selling slaves because you thought it criminal to keep them in bondage."

Now, Sir, I have done with the case of China, which I have only used as an illustration of what the traffic in opium does. I have not said we could get the Chinese Government to alter their plans. I have not said we propose to try to get the Chinese Government to do so. My case is that we ought to put our house in order, that we ought to have clean hands in regard to this business, and it does not make the slightest difference to us as to what we ought to do when it is said that China now grows opium for herself. Let us, if we can, be moral and do what is right, independent of all other considerations. I now come to Burma. There can be no doubt that we introduced the opium trade into Burma. An official Report of the hibition; we drove them to cultivate their own opium. They raised the Imperial Tax of 30 taels to 110 taels by adding a fixed Likin duty of 80 taels per chest. After May 6th, 1890, either party may terminate the Chefoo Treaty, by 12 months' notice, but then we fall back to our old position under the Treaty of Tien-Tsin. What has been the effect of this opium trade on China? Out of an enormous number of testimonies which I have collected I will give a very few, and I believe I have taken them honestly, selecting them by date over a considerable period. Can the Church of Christ in England do nothing to influence the nation to withdraw from the abominable traffic which is causing so much moral, spiritual, physical, ruin to this great people. It is a sad reflection on the Church of Christ in England that it seems powerless to influence the English people in so important a matter as the Indian traffic in opium. Almost the entire population in some places is abandoned to the use of this poisonous drug. The effects are witnessed in the extreme poverty of the people, in the broken down and dilapidated dwellings all through the village, and in the gross immorality which prevails amongst the inhabitants. Even openly and without shame they prostitute their wives in order to secure for themselves the means of indulging in opium smoking. Little children are sold as slaves and turned away from the embrace of their helpless mothers in order that their degraded fathers may have money to buy opium. And this and much more may be told of the effects of opium smoking on the miserable people: yet professed Christians in England see no harm in it, and openly advocate the abominable traffic which makes it possible, and comparatively easy, for the Chinese people to ruin themselves and their wives and children for time and for eternity."

It may be said, on the other side, that this state of things in China does not entirely arise from our action with regard to the traffic in opium. Certainly not, and no one for a long time has said that it did; but, at any rate, we are participators in that trade. We are sending 80,000 chests of opium a year to China, and, therefore, are helping largely to produce that state of things. The Indian Government are trying to make a profit out of that trade, and although it is becoming smaller, we are keeping it up as much as possible. There is one argument which has been used in this House again and again, I will not attempt to go into it. I think I hear the voice of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell). I remember that he said a few years ago that it was better that the people of China should be poisoned by our good opium than by the bad opium they produced themselves. That may be regarded as an argument by the hon. Gentleman, but I do not think it is one that will have the assent of the House. I will refer to a statement made by a well-known writer in a publication, the last edition of which I had the honour of publishing in conjunction with my late excellent friend who, I may say, was one of the greatest ornaments this House has ever had, the late Mr. John Bright. Mr. Dymond, in his Essays on Morality, says—

"If I were to sell a man arsenic or a pistol, knowing that the buyer wants to commit murder, should I not be a bad man? If I let a house, knowing that the renter wanted it for purposes of wickedness, am I an innocent man?"

Mr. Dymond treats the argument that if we did not do it some one else would, as follows:—

"Upon such reasoning you might rob a traveller on the road, if you knew that at the next turning a foot pad was waiting to plunder him. To sell property or goods for bad purposes because if you do not do it some one else will, is like selling slaves because you thought it criminal to keep them in bondage."

Now, Sir, I have done with the case of China, which I have only used as an illustration of what the traffic in opium does. I have not said we could get the Chinese Government to alter their plans. I have not said we propose to try to get the Chinese Government to do so. My case is that we ought to put our house in order, that we ought to have clean hands in regard to this business, and it does not make the slightest difference to us as to what we ought to do when it is said that China now grows opium for herself. Let us, if we can, be moral and do what is right, independent of all other considerations. I now come to Burma. There can be no doubt that we introduced the opium trade into Burma. An official Report of the tenant-right. I am not one of those who object to dual ownership. I think it is the right thing. In the interest he has in his holding it seems to me the Irish tenant has all the advantages of a real peasant proprietor in the true sense of the word, and this Bill proposes to turn him into a landlord at the expense of the British taxpayer. This will be of no advantage to Ireland, but, on the contrary, it will do a great deal of harm, creating a new set of evils with a new set of landlords. The Act of 1881 was founded on a right principle, and the Irish tenants are well off under it. I do not see why the British taxpayers, who do not own their houses, should be called upon to give this enormous security that the Irish tenants may become owners, and therefore I shall vote with the hon. Member for Northampton.

(6.35.) Mr. MORTON (Peterborough): Such an important Amendment as this, in which the enormous amount of £30,000,000 is concerned, requires to be fully debated before we come to a decision. On many grounds I object to this guarantee, and one strong reason is in the fact that I, in common, I think, with the majority of Members in the House, am pledged against supporting a proposal to use British credit to buy out Irish landlords. In itself that should be a reason for supporting the Amendment, and our duty to our constituents requires that we should carefully consider the chances of repayment of these advances. The security is hardly good enough for the English people, and but for the British credit behind it, every business man will say the money could not be raised. I do not say the time might not arrive when it might be right to consider whether we should allow the Imperial credit to be used for settling the land question; but the time has not arrived yet, because we shall practically be compelling the Irish tenants to pay more than the actual value of their holdings. I say distinctly you have no right to use British credit until you have decided in the first place what is the fair rent for the tenants to pay, and the number of years' purchase at that fair rent. If by any means the Irish tenants think they will not be compelled to pay back the money, then for the sake of a present advantage, the interest being less than their rent, they may be induced to agree to purchase at more than the land is worth, and by-and-by they will urge this as a reason for being relieved from their debt to the State. Before British credit is pledged in this way, the question of fair rent should be settled, and the actual value of the land determined. I do not accept the statement that the object of this guarantee is the benefit of the Irish tenants, but rather, I think, the object is to obtain money for the Irish landlords. They know, as we know, and the people of this country know, that Home Rule must come before long; and so the Government are trying to make the best terms they can for their friends the landlords while they have the opportunity. If you are going to use the Imperial credit, so that people may get money at 3 per cent., let the whole of the people benefit by the transaction. Why should you confine the advantage to agricultural tenants? If a scheme were proposed whereby tenants would continue in the occupation of their land at a fair rent, and for the benefit of the whole country, I could see some reason for using the Imperial credit so that money might be borrowed at a cheap rate; but why is this scheme to be carried out in this manner for the interest of one particular class? Have not tenants in England, Scotland, and Wales an equal right to the advantage of borrowing money at 3 per cent., or do you put a premium on agitation? Are the tenants in England and Scotland to take to heart the lesson that if they carry an agitation to extremity, they may hope to have a similar advantage conferred upon themselves?

THE INDIAN OPIUM TRAFFIC.

*(9.0.) SIR J. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): Although it has fallen to my lot on several occasions in years gone by to address this House upon the question of the Indian opium trade, I think I may honestly say that I never rose in my place for this purpose with so much feeling of responsibility on my shoulders as I do at the present moment. The House is well aware—individual Members are well aware—of the very large and increased interest that has been taken in this subject during the last two years, especially by the Christian Churches of this country; and I felt—on finding my own table as well as the tables of my Friends who are supporting this Motion on both sides of the House, covered with letters and Petitions—how very little any poor ability I may have is worth in representing that which so many of the best people of this country have laid earnestly to heart. This question has never been a Party question. My hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcudbrightshire, on the other side of the House (Mr. Mark Stewart), was dealing with it before I dealt with it. My hon. Friend the Member for the Honiton Division of Devonshire (Sir John Kenna-way), who has just entered the House, took a considerable and leading part in the question before I did so. My hon. Friend and relative the Member for the City of London (Sir R. Fowler), who supports me, and who is moving an Amendment to my Resolution, before any of us, I believe, took a part in the discussion of this opium question. I am now about to attack the entire Indian opium question. I look upon India and this country as inseparable, though that doctrine is not popular with some of my friends. But I believe it is a doctrine we have to maintain. I hold that we have to look at the interests of India and the interests of this country as identical. We, practically, appoint the Government of India; we, practically, make the laws which govern the Government of India, and we are responsible for the fact that all things go on in India under the jurisdiction of this country. In the first Resolution that I placed on the Paper, I did not propose to deal with what is called the Malwa opium question—that is, the transit duty on the opium coming out of the independent States—but on looking further into the question I found that it was so intimately connected with the Indian opium question that although, if I drew degrees of morality, I should not think the Malwa question is as immoral as our Indian opium cultivation and trade. I felt it was so bound up with the whole matter that it was necessary to deal with the Transit Duty as well as the cultivation of the poppy in India by the Indian Government. I think I shall show that the Malwa Pass Duty is as open to attack as any portion of the Opium Revenue. I say we cannot separate the Government of India from our Government. I look upon our connection with the manufacture of this drug as most wretched and wicked. We cannot look upon the moral question with indifference. My object will be to show that opium is a drug, that it is to be treated and used as a drug if it is to be used, but that its abuse is universally the source of human misery, demoralisation and crime. We must admit that, as a nation, we have, for the sake of pecuniary gain, fostered, promoted and encouraged the growth of the poppy and the sale of the poppy. There is no similar case in the whole history of this country where this country has become a trader in the most obnoxious article you could imagine, a trader in an article which has done damage to mankind wherever it has been introduced. We not only license the land, but we pay subsistence to the planter; we manufacture the article, we sell it for consumption, we store it in the warehouses, we send it in such quantities into the market as we feel will keep up the market price and value, we advertise the article on the main line of railway from Bombay to Baroda. On our railroad placards are posted in three native languages, showing the native traveller where he can purchase this article, and we are traders in every respect in this article. I ask the House—suppose we had the entire whiskey trade under the management of this House, would there not be a great outcry in the country? Opium is far worse than whiskey. ["Oh!"] Some hon. Gentleman says "Oh!" but I will prove before I resume my seat that opium is far worse than whiskey. I merely take it as a parallel. If this House had all the whiskey distilleries of the country in its hands and advertised their whiskey—advertised it as the Indian Government do opium—what an outcry there would be amongst civilised people and amongst every one interested in the promotion of temperance and morality. I say, and I shall try to prove, that for this greed of gain we have sacrificed every principle of political economy—that we have sacrificed every principle of morality, and that we are sacrificing every principle of Christianity. Now, I lay down as the moral law that, whatever other nations may do, it ought to be no guide to us. It is no argument for us to do wrong. It is no argument for our supplying China with opium that the Chinese are growing opium themselves. It seems to me we have no alternative but to wash our hands of a traffic which is a disgrace to our Christianity and our morality. We ought to deal with this drug as a poison. In this country the seller of opium must be a registered chemist. If he dies his death has to be reported. Opium is scheduled as a poison in the 31st and 32nd Vict. c. 121. Every box, bottle, vessel, wrapper, or cover must be labelled "Opium—Poison," and be marked with the address of the seller. The Lancet, in a recent number, confirmed this view and said, "Opium is from first to last a drug and a poison." Perhaps there is no testimony more affecting than that of the unhappy Coleridge. He said—

"I used to think the text in St. James that 'he who offendeth in one point offendeth in all' very harsh, but now I feel the awful, the tremendous truth of it. In the one crime of opium what crimes have I not made myself guilty of? Ingratitude to my Maker; to my benefactor, injustice; and unnatural cruelty to my poor children; self contempt for my repeated promise—breach, nay, too often, actual falsehood. After my death I earnestly entreat that a full and unqualified narration of my wretchedness, and of its guilty cause, may be made public, that at least some little good may be effected by the dreadful example."

Sir George Staunton, the representative of the East India Company at Canton, said many years ago—

"It is more trifling to place the abuse of opium on the same level with the abuse of spirituous liquors. It is (i.e. the abuse) the main purpose in the former case, but in the latter it is only the exception."

Sir Thomas Wade, who represented us for many years in China, gave evidence before a Select Committee of the House of Commons on the subject. The Committee in their Report said—

"The demoralising influences of the opium trade are incontestable and inseparable from its existence."

Sir Thomas Wade said—

"It is to me vain to think otherwise of the use of the drug in China than as of a habit many times more pernicious, nationally speaking, than the gin and whiskey drinking we deplore at home."

The late Rev. Dr. Williamson, an extensive traveller and experienced missionary, said—

I put it to the House that opium is a most excellent medicine and drug, but it has to be used with the greatest possible caution. If any hon. Member feels any doubt as to the medical testimony on this subject, I would refer him to the wonderfully good speech delivered in this House by Lord Shaftesbury—then Lord Ashley—in 1844, in which he stated the opinions of all the greatest medical men of the day. It is a drug which cannot be used by any man with impunity for very long; it deteriorates the constitution, and unfits a man for all the duties of life. I intend to prove to-night from the history of China, Java, Burmah, California, and our own colonies in Australia, the evil that is done by this drug in which we traffic. I have received during the last few weeks appeals on this subject from the Chinese Christians of Hong Kong, from the Christian Churches at Shanghai, from the Christian Churches at Canton, from the Pekin Anti-Opium Society, and I yesterday presented a Petition, with 1,100 signatures, from Singapore deploring the trade, and imploring the Government to put a stop to the importation of Indian opium. During the last few years I have presented Petitions to this House from the Convocations of York and Canterbury, from the Wesleyan Conference, the Free Church Methodists, the Baptists, the Congregationalists, the Presbyterians of England, the Scotch Church, the Free Church of Scotland, Cardinal Manning, and all the Roman Catholic Bishops of the United Kingdom, the Unitarians, the Society of Friends, the missionaries in China, the Bishop of Bombay and 300 clergy of Bombay. In 1883 I presented a memorial to the then Prime Minister signed by 3 Archbishops, 12 Bishops, several Peers, 60 Members of Parliament, and 30 Mayors and Provosts. I think that shows how very strong the feeling in this country is. I have just received a telegram from Bombay stating that a meeting has been held thereto-day, with the Bishop in the chair, which unanimously voted in favour of my Resolution. I presented to this House a Petition signed by a large number of the principal clergy in this great City of London. It was signed by the Dean of St. Paul's, the Archdeacon of London, Canons Newbolt, Russell, and Lang, the Archdeacon of Middlesex, Canon Furze, and the Rev. E. Carr Glynn. I presented to this House this afternoon a Petition signed by 4,100 inhabitants of India. I have looked carefully through the Petitions, and I have presented between 400 and 500 within the last few days to this House—and I never saw such Petitions in my life, in the long experience I have had in this House. They are signed by clergymen of all denominations, and by the leading inhabitants of towns. I have received them from Argyllshire in the North, to Devonshire and Cornwall in the South and West. Every Member of this House has been receiving Petitions from his constituents on this subject. I have never seen, since I have dealt with this subject, so much enthusiasm in the country, and I have never had so many prayers forwarded to me

for the success of this Motion as I have had during the last few hours contained in letters and telegrams from all parts of the country. I will not go into the question of the opinions of statesmen, because there has never been a statesman on either side of the House who has ever dared to say a word in favour of the morality of this trade. We have had the pecuniary argument over and over again. With that pecuniary argument I will presently deal; but what I have to prove at the present moment is what are the effects of the opium trade when it has taken hold of a people. As regards China the history of the opium trade there is a very simple, but a very terrible one. Up to 1858, it was a contraband trade. It was one of the grounds for the impeachment of Warren Hastings. In 1820, opium smoking was almost unknown in China, and our trade with China in that year was 3,000 chests. In 1839, the date of the first war, it had reached 31,000 chests. In 1856, although it was contraband, it had reached 60,000 chests. The trade was legalised in 1858, and by 1862 it had reached 75,000 chests, and in 1879 it was 94,000 chests, and it continues at about 80,000 chests. But we have taught the Chinese to grow more of it for themselves. The Convention of Chefoo was made by Sir Thomas Wade in 1876 with the Chinese Government, under which it was proposed to leave the Likin opium duties in the hands of the Chinese Government themselves. Sir Louis Malet, in one of his very clear Memorandums, laid down the view that after careful reading of the Treaty of Tien-Tsin he was of opinion that the Chinese had a perfect right to impose any Likin duty they liked. The English Government refused to ratify Article 3 from 1876 to 1885. Hon. Members who took an interest in the question will recollect that some of us, year after year, from 1876 to 1885, never left the Governments alone on the question. It was contrary to the policy we pursued between India and China, and they resisted it. For nine years we held out, because, as Lord Salisbury said, we should neutralise all our policy with regard to this drug. We deprived the Chinese during these years of their power of unlimited prohibition; we drove them to cultivate their own opium. They raised the Imperial Tax of 30 taels to 110 taels by adding a fixed Likin duty of 80 taels per chest. After May 6th, 1890, either party may terminate the Chefoo Treaty, by 12 months' notice, but then we fall back to our old position under the Treaty of Tien-Tsin. What has been the effect of this opium trade on China? Out of an enormous number of testimonies which I have collected I will give a very few, and I believe I have taken them honestly, selecting them by date over a considerable period. The late Dr. Medhurst said—

“That, calculating the shortened lives, the frequent diseases, and the actual starvation which are the results of opium smoking in China, we may so venture to assert that this pernicious drug annually destroys myriads of individuals. Slavery is not productive of more misery and death, than is the opium traffic, nor were Britons more implicated in the former than in the latter. Those who grow and sell the drug, while they profit by the speculation, would do well to follow the consumer into the haunts of vice, and mark the wretchedness, poverty, disease, and death which follow the indulgence, for did they but know the thousandth part of the evils resulting from it they would not, they could not continue to engage in the transaction. It has been told, and it shall be rung in the ears of the British public again and again, that opium is demoralising China, and become the greatest barrier to the introduction of Christianity which can be conceived of.”

“I hope I shall not be accused of egotism or cant when I write that in my opinion the use of opium is an unmitigated curse. I have never heard a heathen Chinaman defend the use or sale of opium, but on the contrary, they universally condemn them. The only apologists have been representatives of Christian lands.”

Many of the North countrymen in the House would know the name of David Hill, a well known Dissenting minister at York. His son gave me the following, and I asked him to write it down. He was a missionary in the centre of China—

“The effect of opium smoking among the Chinese has again and again been depicted to the British public in strong and earnest language; never, I think, too strong, certainly never too earnest. No language could fully picture to others the deplorable consequences of opium smoking, which I myself have seen in China, even in the case of some of my own Chinese acquaintances.”

Sir J. Pease

That gentleman told me that when he went into one of the interior provinces, the city walls were placarded with papers warning the people against his coming, as it was the missionary who brought the opium trade, and who brought Christianity. The two things were coupled together, and if we are a Christian people, which I trust we are, I trust we may take away from ourselves the curse of preventing the spread of what we believe to be the purest form of religion amongst these poor heathens. I have several more quotations. Mr. Frederick Porter Smith founder and manager of the Hankow Medical Mission Hospital, Central China, said—

“I wish to place on record that after an intimate acquaintance with the people, the literature, the language and the commerce of one large province of central China, I am compelled to describe the infatuation, the miserable saturation of the country, the change of type of the character of the nation, and the miseries wrought upon individual habit, constitution, temper, and fortune, all exhibited in the course and consequences of the vice of opium smoking in China, as forming an unique instance of national lunacy and suicide. No epidemic possession of any people or sect reads with such terrible details as are afforded by the simple story of this horror. At the same time I protest against gratuitous exaggeration being imported into the question, now able to take care of itself.”

Dr. Pringle wrote to the Lord Mayor—

“If those who have spent, as I have spent, 30 years in India, came forward on behalf of poor China, I am certain a weight of practical evidence would be forthcoming which would swamp anything that can be opposed to it, and would end in the Government of India washing its hands of what, without doubt, in these days of increased education in India is viewed as a sad blot in the rule of a Christian Power.”

Some time ago a Petition was presented to this House signed by all the Protestant missionaries in China. I will only read one or two extracts:—

“The connection of the British Government with the trade in this pernicious drug creates prejudice against us as Christian missionaries, burdens our work. It strikes the people as an inconsistency that while the British nation offers them the beneficent teaching of the Gospel it should, at the same time, bring to their shores a drug which degrades and ruins them.”

They describe opium as—

lessens his self-esteem, deadens his conscience, unfits him for his duties and leads to his steady descent morally, socially, and physically."

That was the evidence of the missionaries—there was a stronger testimony even than that. It was a letter from Archdeacon Wolfe of the Chinese Mission. He says—

"The people are being ruined by it, and it is indeed a lamentable spectacle to see professing Christian men speaking and writing in defence of the horrible crime. The pernicious results of this soul and body destroying vice are apparent all around. Cadaverous-looking faces meet one on every side, and the slovenly habits and the filthy appearance of the people generally testify too plainly to the evil it is working on this once industrious and energetic population. The rapid progress which opium smoking has made during the last 20 years among all classes of this population is a very serious matter for us missionaries. Humanly speaking opium smokers are beyond the reach of conversion, as the vice unfits them for the perception of any moral or spiritual truths. Can the Church of Christ in England do nothing to influence the nation to withdraw from the abominable traffic which is causing so much moral, spiritual, physical, ruin to this great people. It is a sad reflection on the Church of Christ in England that it seems powerless to influence the English people in so important a matter as the Indian traffic in opium. Almost the entire population in some places is abandoned to the use of this poisonous drug. The effects are witnessed in the extreme poverty of the people, in the broken down and dilapidated dwellings all through the village, and in the gross immorality which prevails amongst the inhabitants. Even openly and without shame they prostitute their wives in order to secure for themselves the means of indulging in opium smoking. Little children are sold as slaves and turned away from the embrace of their helpless mothers in order that their degraded fathers may have money to buy opium. And this and much more may be told of the effects of opium smoking on the miserable people; yet professed Christians in England see no harm in it, and openly advocate the abominable traffic which makes it possible, and comparatively easy, for the Chinese people to ruin themselves and their wives and children for time and for eternity."

It may be said, on the other side, that this state of things in China does not entirely arise from our action with regard to the traffic in opium. Certainly not, and no one for a long time has said that it did; but, at any rate, we are participators in that trade. We are sending 80,000 chests of opium a year to China, and, therefore, are helping largely to produce that state of things. The Indian Government are trying to make a profit out of that trade, and although it is becoming smaller, we are keeping it up as much as possible. There is one argument which has been used in this House again and again, I will not attempt to go into it. I think I hear the voice of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell). I remember that he said a few years ago that it was better that the people of China should be poisoned by our good opium than by the bad opium they produced themselves. That may be regarded as an argument by the hon. Gentleman, but I do not think it is one that will have the assent of the House. I will refer to a statement made by a well-known writer in a publication, the last edition of which I had the honour of publishing in conjunction with my late excellent friend who, I may say, was one of the greatest ornaments this House has ever had, the late Mr. John Bright. Mr. Dymond, in his Essays on Morality, says—

"If I were to sell a man arsenic or a pistol, knowing that the buyer wants to commit murder, should I not be a bad man? If I let a house, knowing that the renter wanted it for purposes of wickedness, am I an innocent man?"

Mr. Dymond treats the argument that if we did not do it some one else would, as follows:—

"Upon such reasoning you might rob a traveller on the road, if you knew that at the next turning a foot pad was waiting to plunder him. To sell property or goods for bad purposes because if you do not do it some one else will, is like selling slaves because you thought it criminal to keep them in bondage."

Now, Sir, I have done with the case of China, which I have only used as an illustration of what the traffic in opium does. I have not said we could get the Chinese Government to alter their plans. I have not said we propose to try to get the Chinese Government to do so. My case is that we ought to put our house in order, that we ought to have clean hands in regard to this business, and it does not make the slightest difference to us as to what we ought to do when it is said that China now grows opium for herself. Let us, if we can, be moral and do what is right, independent of all other considerations. I now come to Burma. There can be no doubt that we introduced the opium trade into Burma. An official Report of the Government in 1870, states that "Opium eating is not a Burma habit: it is a new vice." The Report of the Burma Baptist Missionary Convention in 1866, states that—

"The Burmese, as a race, were remarkably free from the use of intoxicating drinks and drugs 50 years ago."

The Rev. C. Bennett said—

"When I first arrived in the country in 1830, opium was rarely used, and almost entirely confined to Chinamen. There were, however, a few Burmese who used it, and they were looked upon by their countrymen as outcasts, and worse than thieves."

It is said that we are trying to prevent the use of this drug in the opium houses, that we have ceased to licence a great number of them, but still the number of opium houses in Burma is almost kept up, and the smaller number of houses by selling to others vend almost as much opium as was formerly sold by the larger number. A late traveller in Burma states:—

"It is perfectly true that there is only one opium shop in the Akyab district dealing directly with the Government. But this opium shop distributes the Government opium to many hundreds of other shops. I myself saw yesterday at Akyab 50 of these dens in less than 45 minutes. The number of smokers in each den was from four to eight. The great majority of them were Burmese. These 50 dens lay all around one of the chief Police Stations of the district, and within a gun shot of the Custom House. Mr. Htoonkyawoo told me that his estimate of the number of dens in the Akyab district, the town included, was at least 1,000, all supplied by the one licensed shop which appears in the Government Report. If this rate is correct the 30 shops we have been told so often are the only ones in Burma represent 30,000 others. Certainly I can scarcely imagine any town in China worse than the portion of Akyab that I visited. The shops lay three and four together, and entire streets seemed to consist to a large extent of these opium dens."

I have always wondered how any Member of this House can get over the testimony which has been so often read of Sir C. Aitchison, although in my opinion his testimony is not so strong as that of some of his subordinate officers. He shows in the Report I hold in my hand, but which I will not read, that the land is in danger of going out of cultivation owing to this drug. That the people are emaciated by it, that it saps both physical and mental energies, that it predisposes them to disease, induces indolent and filthy habits, destroys self-respect, is one of the most fertile sources of misery, destitution, and crime, that it fills the gaols with men of relaxed frame predisposed to dysentery and cholera. This Report is more than confirmed by those of the subsidiary officers who furnish information on the same subject. But I may be told that the Burmese people are weaker people constitutionally than the Chinese; but surely difference of constitution cannot account for one people being benefited by the drug, and the other being materially reduced in their moral and physical being. I see that in the Government proposals with regard to the people of Upper Burma, there is a Report signed by Lord Dufferin, C. P. Ilbert, T. C. Hope, A. Colvin, G. Chestrey, and J. B. Peile. They say—

This Report is written and signed by the Governor General of India, the very country for which we are trying to keep up the opium revenue. I think I have proved that this traffic has done great damage both in Burma and in China; and I say the time has come when we ought to wash our hands of any participation in a traffic which produces so much moral and material injury. I do not propose to deal with the damage done to the people of India. That point will be taken up by my hon. Friend who is to follow me. We know the effects that have been produced, not only in those places but amongst those who have gone forth to our colonies in different parts of the world. Only the other day a very curious piece of fresh evidence came to my notice. In the month of March, meetings were held in the City of Amsterdam for the purpose of inducing the Dutch Government to put a stop to the opium trade in Java. Java, in 1815, had an English

Governor, Sir Stamford Raffles, who put down the opium trade by decree. In 1816 it was opened again by protests from Bengal. The Dutch Government rule in Java over 22,000,000 of people, amongst whom are 250,000 Chinese. Services were held in Amsterdam at nearly every church, and meetings were held for the purpose of impressing upon the Dutch Government the necessity of stopping this iniquitous trade, which, as I have already shown, was re-opened in consequence of protests from the Bengal Government. In California there are, as we know, a large number of Chinese, and there was a municipal law for the suppression of the vice of opium smoking. That law afterwards became a Statute of the State of California. It enacted that—

"Every person who opens or maintains, to be resorted to by other persons, any place where opium or any of its preparations is sold or given away to be smoked at such place; and any person who at such place sells or gives away any opium or its said preparations to be there smoked or otherwise used; and every person who visits or resorts to any such place for the purpose of smoking opium or its said preparations is guilty of a misdemeanour, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding 500 dollars, or by imprisonment in the county gaol not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

These people have taken the bull by the horns and endeavoured to put an end by law to a vice which was deteriorating and demoralising their population. Having now dealt with Java and California, I come nearer home. The other day I had a call from a gentleman who was lately a member of the Victoria Government at Melbourne. He showed me this letter, addressed to him on leaving Australia:—

"My Chinese friends, who are working with me to secure the removal of the opium curse, desire me to take this opportunity of wishing you 'fair wind and favourable tide' both on your voyage to the land of your fathers and on your return to this, the land of your adoption; and I thank you very cordially for the warm sympathy, wise counsels, and powerful assistance you have rendered the cause of our suffering countrymen ever since the commencement of the movement for the prohibition of the accursed traffic in this and the adjacent colonies. But much as we know you have done, we feel sure that you will be only too glad to do much more to forward the cause of the poor victims, wherever and whenever opportunity offer you; we thought, therefore, that as you are proceeding to the United Kingdom, which still holds the key to the whole situation, we would be failing in our duty if we do not entrust you with the prayers and tears of the thousands of victims, in this colony alone, who are held spell-bound by this fell-destroyer. You yourself have seen its terrible havoc in your midnight visits, and can therefore make far more forceful representations to the Powers that be, than any description of mine."

That letter is signed by a Chinese gentleman, one of the leading Chinese Christian men in Australia. What is the history of the deputation to Mr. Deakin, who was then a Member of the Government in Victoria? These gentlemen who compose the deputation speak in exactly the same way as our missionaries in China speak. The Rev. Mr. Allen speaks similarly, and so does Canon Parker and another English gentleman. Then what does Mr. Deakin, speaking for the Government, say in reply to this deputation? I dare not read, what I should like to read, some extracts from the speeches on this occasion, as I feel I am occupying the time of the House. The Governor says—

"There was but one feeling amongst the Government on the subject. He did not think, however, that the sum of £20,000, or, to be correct, £18,000 a year was a sum to be depreciated, and he did not think that Parliament or the Government would be called upon to throw away that sum unless occasion justified it. In this case the moral weight which attached to the objections to the traffic, which had been properly termed infernal, made the point one about which there could not be the slightest difference of opinion."

Thereupon the Government of Melbourne addressed a letter to the other colonies asking them to co-operate in their representations, in order to put an absolute prohibition upon the sale of opium in those colonies. Sir, I cannot understand how right hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, and hon. Gentlemen here, can come down to this House after all that testimony from China, and all that testimony from other parts of the world which I have read, and say that there can be any justification of this opium trade, except it is used for recognised and legitimate purposes. It would not be for me, for one moment, to depreciate the very distinguished Indian services of my hon. Friend the Member for the Evesham Division (Sir Richard Temple). His name will ever be associated with Government in 1870, states that "Opium eating is not a Burma habit: it is a new vice." The Report of the Burma Baptist Missionary Convention in 1866, states that—

"The Burmese, as a race, were remarkably free from the use of intoxicating drinks and drugs 50 years ago."

The Rev. C. Bennett said—

"When I first arrived in the country in 1830, opium was rarely used, and almost entirely confined to Chinamen. There were, however, a few Burmese who used it, and they were looked upon by their countrymen as outcasts, and worse than thieves."

It is said that we are trying to prevent the use of this drug in the opium houses, that we have ceased to licence a great number of them, but still the number of opium houses in Burma is almost kept up, and the smaller number of houses by selling to others vend almost as much opium as was formerly sold by the larger number. A late traveller in Burma states:—

"It is perfectly true that there is only one opium shop in the Akyab district dealing directly with the Government. But this opium shop distributes the Government opium to many hundreds of other shops. I myself saw yesterday at Akyab 50 of these dens in less than 45 minutes. The number of smokers in each den was from four to eight. The great majority of them were Burmese. These 50 dens lay all around one of the chief Police Stations of the district, and within a gun shot of the Custom House. Mr. Htoonkyawoo told me that his estimate of the number of dens in the Akyab district, the town included, was at least 1,000, all supplied by the one licensed shop which appears in the Government Report. If this rate is correct the 30 shops we have been told so often are the only ones in Burma represent 30,000 others. Certainly I can scarcely imagine any town in China worse than the portion of Akyab that I visited. The shops lay three and four together, and entire streets seemed to consist to a large extent of these opium dens."

I have always wondered how any Member of this House can get over the testimony which has been so often read of Sir C. Aitchison, although in my opinion his testimony is not so strong as that of some of his subordinate officers. He shows in the Report I hold in my hand, but which I will not read, that the land is in danger of going out of cultivation owing to this drug. That the people are emaciated by it, that it saps both physical and mental energies, that it predisposes them to disease, induces indolent and filthy habits, destroys self-respect, is one of the most fertile sources of misery, destitution, and crime, that it fills the gaols with men of relaxed frame predisposed to dysentery and cholera. This Report is more than confirmed by those of the subsidiary officers who furnish information on the same subject. But I may be told that the Burmese people are weaker people constitutionally than the Chinese; but surely difference of constitution cannot account for one people being benefited by the drug, and the other being materially reduced in their moral and physical being. I see that in the Government proposals with regard to the people of Upper Burma, there is a Report signed by Lord Dufferin, C. P. Ilbert, T. C. Hope, A. Colvin, G. Chestrey, and J. B. Peile. They say—

Sir, I cannot understand how right hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, and hon. Gentlemen here, can come down to this House after all that testimony from China, and all that testimony from other parts of the world which I have read, and say that there can be any justification of this opium trade, except it is used for recognised and legitimate purposes. It would not be for me, for one moment, to depreciate the very distinguished Indian services of my hon. Friend the Member for the Evesham Division (Sir Richard Temple). His name will ever be associated with Indian history; and with regard to my hon. Friend behind me (Sir George Campbell), I must make a similar observation. But Sir Cecil Beadon, in his evidence before the Committee which dealt with this subject, says that the Indian Government looks for revenue, and he does not hesitate to say that the consequences of the opium trade do not come before the Indian Government. Indian officials in this House generally take that view. They tell us there are people who consume opium with great advantage to themselves. I do not believe it for a moment. But they tell us so, and they think they have seen it. The medical evidence is entirely on the other side; but, even if it be so, the proportion of those who receive benefit from the use of opium is infinitely small compared with the thousands upon thousands who are demoralised by it. China has made a Treaty with America prohibiting the importation of opium; England has made a Treaty with the Corea prohibiting opium. I am not going into the question of our Treaties or our commerce, as I see my time is limited; but it is a fact that our trade with China has not increased at all during many years past. It is less than it was in 1868. We have a trade with Japan; we have been prohibited by our Treaty to introduce opium into Japan. Our trade with Japan in 1868 was £1,200,000; our trade in 1889 was £4,000,000. I believe we are standing very much in our own light in regard to this traffic. If the £11,000,000 in silver which China pays us for opium were paid to us for goods from Manchester or Leeds the results would be very much more beneficent, and it would be very much better for this country. I shall now endeavour to touch on the Malwa question, and I will tell the House why I have incorporated the Malwa Duty in my resolution. I have done it for this purpose: I find, from the Report on the Moral and Material Progress of India in 1888-89, that the native States engaged in the cultivation and production of opium so arranged and managed it as to safeguard the British Revenue, and in exchange for this service they received compensation in money or in some other form. What has been the course of the Malwa Duty? The Malwa Duty was 650 rupees; it was raised to 700 rupees, again reduced to 650 rupees, and now is 600 rupees per chest. In 1880-81 there was a trade of 46,000 chests; in 1889-90 it got down to 30,000; and it is now down to 28,000 chests. By lowering the duty we get more transit duty on opium, to poison still more people, although we get less money for doing so. A late traveller in Rajpootana says—

“The condition of the people is deplorable. The Rajpoots were called a people fit to succeed the English. The poppy grows on their finest land. Instead of food being grown and stored in good years, the poppy is in possession.”

The last famine in Rajpootana was owing in great measure to this cause. Opium takes up the cotton and food lands. Lately cotton and food are turning out the poppy, and food has gone down 25 per cent in price. What do the Governors of Native States get out of the trade? The selling price in 1888 and 1889 was 1,120 rupees per chest. The Pass Duty was 650 rupees. The cost to the Indian Government over 10 years has been 390 rupees, or, latterly, 410 rupees the chest; but, taking it at 390 rupees, we walk off with about £1,320,000, and hand over to these natives for their opium about £180,000. I do not think we are doing them a very great kindness, so far as the Pass Duty is concerned, in promoting the cultivation. Of course, the native Princes get a higher rate out of the land which is devoted to the cultivation of the poppy than when it is devoted to other crops. But there is a Memorandum, I see, by Dr. Keegan, who says—

“The results of the depression of the opium trade in Malwa are far-reaching. The means of livelihood of a large body of cultivators who find themselves unable, with the low prices obtainable for the produce, to defray the expenses of cultivation and to pay the heavy State opium assessment are seriously affected, while the States whose revenues depend largely on their opium assessments are likely to find them considerably diminished.”

Even with regard to Malwa we do not seem to be doing the people a very great kindness by levying a duty of even 600 rupees. These people are starving on the opium land; they are in a very poor condition, and they are demoralised. Well, now, I come to that more difficult part of my subject, and I own it is the most difficult—the Indian Revenue. The largest revenue that ever was obtained from opium by the Indian Government was in the year 1880-1, when they received from both sources, the transit duty, and the other source of revenue, cultivation, Rx8,451,000, from Bengal cultivation and the Malwa Pass Duty. The largest value during that period of the rupee was 1s. 8d., so that our Indian Revenue was over £7,000,000. But that Revenue has fallen very steadily. In 1888 and 1889 the two revenues together made Rx5,900,000, instead of Rx8,400,000, or about £4,500,000. The Budget Estimate telegraphed the other day put the sum at Rx5,300,000, or £3,989,000; you may call it £4,000,000, and that is the figure with which my Motion practically has to deal. This is a very awkward item in Indian finance. At least £2,000,000 has been drawn out of Stock in the last three years in order to keep up these revenues to about £4,000,000. That is about £500,000 a year that has been drawn out of Stock, which reduces the figures of the factors we have to deal with to about £2,500,000. But the amount in advances for cultivation in India is, I believe, even upwards of £2,000,000. The amount of capital invested in Stock is above £1,000,000. If you deduct the interest on that Stock and advanced for cultivation and the capital value of the works, you further decrease the sum with which we have to deal. I do not believe a wise accountant would put the Indian revenue at the present moment at more than £3,500,000, at the very outside. And that is the figure with which we have to deal, and it is for that amount we are doing so much mischief to mankind. Now, with regard to the Indian Revenue, I am very glad to see a surplus in 1890-91 of about £2,000,000. In 1889-90 there was very nearly the same surplus. It is a large surplus, and I have no doubt there are many uses in India for that surplus. But I think the Indian Revenue from this source is a doomed revenue. A Consular Report from Wanchoo, circulated to-day, states that, though the consumption of opium has increased, the consumption of Indian opium has very much decreased. What do our own people say? In the Report on the Moral and Material Progress of India for 1881-82, they say the poppy is being slowly replaced by the potato and sugar-cane—

"The system of advances is reported to be the chief inducement to the cultivator to grow so precarious and troublesome a crop as the poppy. The efforts of the sub-agent to extend the poppy cultivation in Agra, Muttra, and Aligarh were not attended with success."

Sir Evelyn Baring in 1885 said a diminishing revenue might be expected. This was true, though the fact was not mentioned that it had sometimes been necessary to increase the number of cultivators in order to prevent a diminution of the area cultivated. The Indian Government has had to bear a reduction of the revenue from opium from £7,000,000 to £4,000,000, and I think it is reducible to about £3,500,000. The value of the drug has gone down considerably, and the quantity offered for sale has also gone down considerably. When I come to look at the finance of India there are several things which attract attention. One is the large amount which is constantly being placed annually on the revenue, which any Corporation, or other body, dealing with funds would place to capital and discharge over a series of years. The expense of the Army of India in 1881-82, after the Afghan War was 13,000,000 tens of rupees; in 1884-85 it was 16,000,000 tens of rupees; and in 1888-89 it was 20,000,000 tens of rupees. Therefore, the Indian Army alone has cost us £5,000,000 sterling more than it did after the Afghan War. Those who know anything about the Indian Army have always stated that very great economies could be effected and maintained without detriment, but with advantage to that force. There are points in connection with the Indian Army which, any man knows, ought to be attended to, and every man in India who has borne the name of a distinguished soldier has advocated economies and changes. My hon. Friend and relative, the Member for the City, (Sir R. N. Fowler), has placed on the Paper an addition to my Motion if it comes to be the substantive Question relative to subsidies from this country. I have always advocated that if we ask in this House the Indian Government to make a sacrifice on moral grounds, we ought to do as we did in connection with the slavery question—meet them by some subsidy. My hon. Friend has, however, drawn his Resolution a little too wide. If my Motion comes to be the substantive Motion, I think we should amend his by saying, "This House is of opinion that such annual grants should be made to the Government of India as the then probable amount of deficit and the then circumstances of Indian finance seem to require." I do not think the Indian Government can look, as I am sure they do not look, for a long continuation of this opium revenue; but the more I have looked into the question the more am I convinced that India itself would be a great gainer by doing away with a trade which demoralises its population, and certainly adds very much in many ways to its expenses and its charges. I trust I have proved that this trade in which we are engaged is the curse of China, has been and is, I am afraid, still the curse of Burma. My hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Mark Stewart) will prove it is the curse of India. It is being rooted out because it has been a curse in Australia; the Dutch are anxious to root it out because it is a curse in Java; and it is a curse to the American population in California. I have shown that every thinking man in whose opinion we place confidence—that certainly all the heads of our Christian churches—look upon this question as I look upon it—as a question of Christianity. I have also shown that the revenue for India is an uncertain one, that it is fading away, that the crop occupies good ground which ought to be devoted to more legitimate trade, and I trust I have shown it is a disgrace to Christianity. I am not advocating any breach of faith with those native Princes who have so often been loyal to the English Crown. I do not know what are the Treaties, or what may be the nature of the Agreements. I have not yet made use of the argument that there is a legitimate trade which would compensate us in some degree for the abandonment of the illegitimate trade. Surely we might do a legitimate trade to the extent of many hundreds of thousands of pounds by producing opium for medical use in India, to supply our legiitimate trade at home and abroad! At the present moment medical requirements are supplied almost entirely by Turkey or Persian opium, the Indian opium being manufactured entirely for Chinese consumption. I appeal to Her Majesty's Government and to the House to do away with this horrible traffic, which is demoralising and destructive to mankind. I appeal on the ground of those laws which ought to regulate the dealings of mankind; and I appeal on still higher grounds. I appeal on a ground which is not often urged in this House, but a ground on which I believe I shall have the sympathy of a large number of Members in this House—the Christian ground. We call ourselves a Christian country, and I trust we shall long remain one. Many of my hon. Friends on the opposite side of the House maintain a State Church because they hold what I consider a beautiful ideal—that as a nation we acknowledge a Supreme Being and worship Him. In this House we have prayers read every day, and we pray that God's Kingdom will come upon earth. If we go on with this opium trade, we are not spreading God's Kingdom; we are spreading the kingdom of the devil. The evidence is strong in favour of the Motion which I have ventured to bring forward, and I pray that this House, in its wisdom, may see right to put an end to this traffic, which I have endeavoured to describe in language which I believe to be true.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House is of opinion that the system by which the Indian Opium Revenue is raised is morally indefensible, and would urge upon the Indian Government that they should cease to grant licences for the cultivation of the poppy and sale of opium in British India, except to supply the legitimate demand for medical purposes, and they should at the same time take measures to arrest the transit of Malwa opium through British territory,"—(Sir Joseph Pease.)

—instead thereof.

(10.8.) MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright): After the very exhaustive speech of my hon. Friend I need not trouble the House at greater length than I can possibly avoid. In 1875 I brought forward a Motion for the gradual diminution of this trade, and had that Resolution been carried we should have been saved a great many heart-burnings and great difficulty in this question. To-night we approach a Resolution of a much more drastic character, and one which may possibly not commend itself to every Member in this House. I have submitted the Resolution which appears in my name on the Paper because I believe it to be a thoroughly practical one, and one which would have commended itself to the majority in the House. But having the honour to second the Motion, I wish to say a few words in its support. The point to which special attention is directed is this: That while the Government of India assert in this House that the opium revenue is diminishing, and that they are doing what they can to put down the opium traffic, we find a very much larger consumption of opium is taking place. If I take the instance of Lucknow I find that in the year 1883-84 there were only 12 shops licensed for opium smoking; in 1885-86 they were reduced to six, and in 1887-88 to three; but, on the other hand, the consumption in those shops very considerably increased, namely, from 36,000 toles in 1883-84 to 41,000 toles in 1885-86, and to 64,000 toles in 1887-88. This very large increase in the consumption of opium has nothing to do with China; and that statement must fill us with alarm and consternation. The only remedy for such a state of things is the suppression of the withdrawal of the manufactured goods. Opium smoking is considered a disgrace. It is said the only thing that saves the nation from utter extirpation at once is the virtue of their women, and if a woman smokes it is considered such an unrighteous and unholy thing that even opium smokers are dead against that view. I wish to direct attention to the case of Akyab, the capital of Arracan, in Lower Burma. They go about the country and establish centres, following the three great lines of railway. It was one of the strictest rules under the late King Theobald that no person should be allowed to smoke or chew opium, and that rule was rigidly enforced. Now we find that the consumption of opium in the district ruled by him had decreased largely, while in Burma it was rapidly on the increase. In Lower Burma the smoking of opium has increased since last year, and there is a very large increase in the amount consumed by the population over which this country bears rule. Now we are told by Government documents that opium is only sold to the Chinese, but that is not the case at all. I have seen numbers of Burmese go openly into the shops and buy opium. I have many cases on record where the consumption of opium is encouraged among persons who have not known its delights and pleasures before. These are at first given opium of much milder character and not so strong as other kinds, and after becoming accustomed and habituated to smoking this then they are given the opium of British India. There can be no doubt of the great facilities which are given now for the sale of opium among the native populations of India. Till recently there was little opium, comparatively speaking, used in India. There was a little used in the Punjab. But now it is calculated that something like 122,000 cases are consumed annually by the native population. That shows the enormous increase that is going on in the manufacture of opium. To curtail the facilities at present existing for its manufacture would not be so hard on the people as some persons might be disposed to think. There is an enormous quantity of the best land under the cultivation of the poppy, and a great deal of labour is required. Now, that labour could be utilised in growing food and cotton. Many parts of India, we know, are extremely cold, and the people are in a bad way when they cannot obtain warm clothes. It would conduce to the health of the people to put down the cultivation of the poppy in favour of the cultivation of cotton. We have an enormous amount of testimony as to the condition of the people owing to the opium trade, and we cannot question the value of these authorities. These men know the habits of the people, and can get at the popular mind and the popular wishes in a far better manner than ever before. Their unanimous opinion is that so long as the opium trade continues great evils will exist, and they are most anxious to do away with the whole thing. They say that it is a very grave state of affairs that we who set up to be the most civilised nation in the world should set such a bad example to these people, and that we are fast losing our character in all parts of the East. It is absolutely impossible to remedy this state of affairs as long as this opium trade exists. We should not make the natives bad by bringing in opium amongst them, but should encourage them to higher aspirations founded on better principles, and should introduce trade not mixed up with opium, and bring the people to truer lights. Some people say, "Well, after all, we have the consumption of alcohol at home to consider and get rid of before we go to India about the opium." ["Hear, hear!"] But the two things are quite different. The quantity of opium which would poison the whole population of London is 20 cases, whereas 20 cases of alcohol would only perhaps cause a few people to be locked up. Then, opium is despised among the people who employ it most. Again, the Government is not so mixed up with the sale of alcohol as it is with opium. If the Government were so much connected with the manufacture of distilled spirits in this country as they are with the manufacture of opium we should hear a great deal about it. But they do encourage the trade in opium. There are officials to examine the opium and pick out the good stuff. The bad lots are sold through India. The Chinese have a strange prejudice against us, and when I see that I say that something must be wrong. This is owing to the opium trade, and it is our duty to remove that prejudice. If we remove that prejudice they will enter more easily into commercial relations with this country. If we put a stop to the opium traffic we should have fewer people in our gaols and fewer people in our Lunatic Asylums. I think I might just mention another intoxicant—ganja—the manufacture of which has also increased, but I do not propose to go into that. Another point is this: It is often said the carriers in India are better for the use of opium; but the fact is, that those who have never had a dose of opium are better bearers than those men who are addicted to its use, and who without it would simply fall down and be unable to proceed another yard. Then with regard to fever, it is said by those experienced with the fever and malaria districts that those who do not eat or smoke opium are much safer than those who do. Just one word before I sit down upon our settlements and colonies, Singapore, Hong Kong, and Shanghai. The Local Government derive a large revenue from the sale and manufacture of this drug in these places; but in Rajpootana, where no opium is allowed to be sold, the state of things is much healthier. In regard to these settlements, a very remarkable movement took place on the 17th July in last year. A great number of the merchants met together to forward Petitions to the House of Commons of the British Parliament praying for the prohibition of the growth, manufacture, and sale of opium. That Petition was signed by 1,000 persons in a few hours, and amongst them were many opium smokers. I would also like to say a word about the opium farms of Singapore, because we are told the Government are doing all they can to discountenance the further sale of opium. These opium farms are tenanted by Chinese, and, as they are very poor tenants, the Government have lowered the terms to enable them to carry on their farming operations, which does not look like discountenancing the sale of opium. From Hong Kong the people have petitioned the House of Commons to pass a stern law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of opium there. Another Petition was against the use of the Chinese contract system. One Chinaman takes a contract, in consequence of which we are told there is only one contract; but this man may give 500 sub-contracts or licences, and he does so. In many cases contracts have been given in order to set up this trade until it is now almost impossible to stop it. I beg to apologise for having detained the House so long on a subject somewhat old, but I am firmly persuaded that the growing feeling in this country is such that it will force the hand of the Government, and cause them to ponder before they allow this manufacture to go on. I am strongly satisfied the feeling is a ripening one, and that at the next election it will be made a test question in many a constituency. I do not say this for the purpose of catching votes to-night, but because I am representing what I believe to be the growing feeling and the demands of the country.

*(10.38.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I am very unwilling to give a silent vote on this occasion, because, in the first place, on my own side I have a strong conviction, and, next, because I feel placed in a position of some delicacy in this matter. Before I go further I wish, in justice to my constituents, to absolve a certain influential section of them of any complicity in the action I am taking, because—and I say it with deep regret—I am going against the wishes of a certain influential and respectable section of my constituency. I have presented to this House a large number of Petitions in favour of the Motion before the House, and I have had many letters from highly respectable clergymen in my constituency urging me to vote for this Resolution. It is only a strong sense of duty that compels me on this occasion to say a few words in opposition to the wishes of my best friends and supporters. But I think it is the duty of anyone who thinks he can say a word in defence of the position we take up in this matter to get up, regardless of the consequences to himself, and to say that word, as I hope I shall, in a straightforward manner. If all the statements made to-night could be proved, I should have no hesitation in saying I would follow my hon. Friend who sits below me into the Division Lobby; but these statements are founded on misconceptions; and, therefore, I shall feel it a duty to vote the other way. We have not had trotted out to-night the statement that we force opium upon the Chinese. I suppose that old contention is now given up. [Cries of "No, no!"] Well, I am sorry I have started that hare, because I am afraid I shall have to give it a little run; but, as I have pointed out before, and as the officials in charge of the Government of India have pointed out also, it is impossible for anyone now to say we have forced opium on the Chinese. [A laugh.] That laughter may be a convenient method of getting rid of an inconvenient question; but we can show upon eminent authority, adopted by Lord Ripon, that the opium war was a war of tariffs, and that the Chinese people had the opportunity if they liked of excluding opium from the 300 Articles; but they declined to give up the revenue, which they knew to be an important one, but one which, by giving 15 months notice, they can now put an end to. But we must look at this matter from a practical point of view, and see what the effect of giving up this revenue would have upon India. I prefer to take my views and form my conclusions upon the opinions and evidence given by the Governor Generals, and they tell us, and Lord Ripon, who is above all things a man of sober judgment, tells us in so many words that India would be bankrupt if we remove the opium revenue from it. There is nothing more taxable in India, and, therefore, the only way of getting rid of this opium revenue would be to tax the people of this country 2d. on the Income Tax ["Hear, hear!"] I am stating this as the only alternative. If England desires to do that they may, but I agree with the words of the late Mr. Fawcett, who said it would be in the highest degree absurd to spend money in stopping this traffic when we have at our very doors round the corner a traffic in alcohol, from which we derive an immense revenue, and which causes far more widespread misery than opium ever did or could do. There are only two alternatives in dealing with this matter. The one is to prohibit opium growing in India, and that would be impossible, for we know that there are many large estates in India where the growth of opium is obliged to be permitted; and to prohibit the growth of opium, and thus make India bankrupt, would not be any benefit to China, because it is a fact well-known that two-thirds of the opium used in China is grown upon Chinese territory. We also know from the highest Chinese authorities that the issue of edicts against the growth of opium in China must be taken in a Pickwickian sense; they are issued for the delectation of the world, but not intended to be acted on, or, at all events, they have never been acted upon. If acted upon, I should like to know of any authentic case of a Chinaman being beheaded or put to death for breaking the law. The second alternative is to allow free trade in opium, to allow it to be grown freely and unreservedly throughout the whole country, and that would mean the demoralisation of the whole of India, as the people would at once largely grow it for their own domestic consumption. We have heard a good deal about opium absorbing fine land that might otherwise be used to good purposes. The fact is, that this land is also used for other purposes, as a crop of rice is invariably taken off the land before the opium crop is gathered; therefore the land does grow other things as well as opium. I think that those who have argued this question have not sufficiently considered it. What is the opium grown in India according to population? Habitual consumers of opium might use ten-parts of an ounce a day, but there is not enough opium grown in the country to demoralise so vast a population. What is the case with China? Sir Robert Hart told us that only 1 per cent. of the population of China smoke opium; and even if India imports ten times as much as she grows, the total supply would only account for 10 per cent. of the population. I leave the political aspects of the case, because those I am not so qualified to discuss, but I think I am entitled to say a word about the medical aspects of opium, because my labours in medicine have been devoted to the consideration of drugs and their properties, and I have taken the opportunity of getting the best assistance I could, and consulting the best authorities as to the effects of opium. One difficulty about the consideration of this question is, that I think many persons who talk about the use of Indian opium fancy they are getting the same thing as the Turkish drug from Smyrna. We know very well that the Indian drug is of such weak effect that it is never used in medicine in this country, there is no market for it. If you restrict the growth of the opium in India you would get no revenue at all, for the drug is too weak to be of any benefit in medicine, and when opium is used for smoking it is used as an extract. It is mixed with a number of other things which bear the same relation to opium that a glass of whisky toddy would bear to the spirit which was previously put into the glass. I do not know if any hon. Member has ever seen a person smoking opium. The quantity he uses is extremely small—a piece no larger than the tip of the finger is put into the pipe; the smoker takes one or two whiffs, enough to give him a pleasurable feeling and send him into a comfortable sleep. Very often the smoker, having for a time forgotten his troubles, rouses up again very little the worse for his indulgence. Whisky and opium are very much alike in their double action. Small doses are stimulative and restorative, but large doses are narcotic. It is in small doses for its stimulating effect that opium is taken, and there is a great difference between eating opium and smoking it—just the difference there is between chewing and smoking tobacco. If you chew tobacco you get a greater amount of the narcotic injurious principle into the system than you do if you smoke it, and it is the same with opium. Medical authorities have held that morphia, which is the active principle of opium, is not volatilised by heat at all, so that the smoke when carried into the lungs does not carry with it any of the active principle. I am sure the hon. Member for the Ilkeston Division (Sir W. Foster)—who seems to have been deserted by his medical colleagues, and who, therefore, has not the benefit of their advice in this matter—will confirm me in what I say about the medical aspects of the case. He cannot help doing it.

The political aspect of the case is a totally different thing. The physical vigour of people who eat opium has been disparaged. I know nothing about the Chinese, but I have travelled in Rajpootana, and I am bound to say a finer, more manly, vigorous, and splendid set of people I never met. We are also told of the terrible evils of opium eating in Burma, but a more charming people I never saw in my life than the Burmese. I go further, and am prepared to say that opium in small doses as a tonic or restorative is of considerable value in preventing ague. My hon. Friend who proposed this Motion said he could not believe that any persons could take opium with advantage. Let me mention a circumstance which came under my own observation. I was dining with a poor friend of mine, a man who was in consumption. He got through the early part of the dinner very well, but began to flag about the middle. He went out, and when he returned he said to me, "Do you know what I went away for? I went away to give myself a subcutaneous injection of morphia." When he came back he was cheerful, and was stimulated in a way I am sure no small dose of alcohol or a tonic could have stimulated him. I have not the least hesitation in saying that a moderate use of this stimulant preserved that poor man's life certainly for a year or two. I was very much surprised to hear from the hon. Baronet who introduced the Motion that opium was a worse evil than alcohol. I certainly admit with the hon. Baronet that the opium smoker, lying in a state of quiet, dreamy satisfaction, is quite useless, but he is not absolutely mischievous. He does not get up and beat his wife or kick her to death with his heavy boots. There is no crime that I am aware of specially connected with the use of opium. I should like to say most strongly that opium does not cause any of those destructions of tissue which alcohol does, and therefore, however much a man may suffer from the great evil of the excessive use of opium, there is still hope for him if he pulls up at last in his mischievous course. The same cannot be said of the alcohol drinker. If he amends he finds himself in a much worse physical condition than he was before he began to drink excessively. His liver and kidneys are crumpled and shrivelled, his heart is wrong, the tissue of his body has physically degenerated, and he dies a victim of the secondary results of that degeneration. I do not wish to detain the House any longer. I have shown the House that even the worst and most hopeless opium-eater may return to health. Some time ago I heard of the case of an old woman living in a low district who died at the age of 90, and who had been in the habit of taking some 200 or 300 ounces of opium per diem—[laughter]—of course I mean grains. Yet she carried on a laborious life, and died in the full odour of sanctity at the age of 90 years. And now I conclude. I have tried to prove that, as regards the Indian trade, the Chinese are practically in the position of local option—they can prohibit the introduction of the drug; that the evil effects of opium have been enormously exaggerated, and, thirdly, that the abandonment of the revenue derived from this source would make India bankrupt. Some part of the case, of course, depends on official evidence, and there are some people who think that official statements must necessarily be tainted. I have read statements to that effect; but I do not believe that an English gentleman drops all his veracity at his office door, and we are, in my opinion, bound to accept these statements from high-minded eminent officers who rule with honour and distinction various foreign lands under our sway. I think, too, that the Mover and Seconder of this Resolution may take some comfort from the belief that in 30 or 40 years matters will come round to the way they would wish, and the Chinese will grow all their own opium and want none from India, and thus there will come a natural end to a condition of things we deplore, but which, I think, is not so bad as has been represented.

*(11.2.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): I believe the House will expect from Her Majesty's Government some statement in answer to the strong appeals addressed to the Government by hon. Members, although I very much regret that the task has fallen to me instead of to my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary for India (Sir J. Gorst) to make that reply. Still, I think I shall be able to satisfy the House that the Government of India is not bent upon demoralising the people of India and China by carrying on the opium trade, that all possible efforts are made to control and curtail this traffic with a view to restrain the consumption of the drug among their own subjects in India, and towards a gradual reduction of the export to China. The hon. Baronet the Member for the Barnard Castle Division does not now for the first or second time raise this question, and no one can doubt the entire earnestness and sincerity with which he has taken up this question. His sole wish is to remove what he thinks is a blot upon our national character, and to stop what he considers is a source of great mischief to all the people concerned. I entirely recognise his honourable object and his disinterested efforts to accomplish it; and if I demur at all to his statements of fact and point out the impracticability of the changes he proposes to introduce, I can assure him that in doing so I in no way depreciate his motives or doubt the nobility of the object he has at heart. It is quite true, as he has said, that there is among the public a growing interest in this question. I know that the public mind is more stirred in relation to this matter than I ever remember it to have been in former years; but I also think that, to a large extent, an artificial interest has been created, and the public mind has been influenced by many impassioned appeals that are not quite consistent with the real facts of the case. I judge this from many statements I have read and from a great many letters which have appeared in the public Press. Into these I will not enter at any length, but the House will remember that there is one allegation constantly made that we force our Indian opium on the Chinese. Now, that is not the fact, and the statement has been disproved over and over again. In former Debates it has been shown that in negotiating the Treaty of Tien-Tsin Lord Elgin expressly disclaimed to his secretary, who conducted the negotiations, any intention of requiring the Chinese to insert the article of Indian opium. It was entirely because the Chinese Ministers considered that they could not dispense with it that opium was an article included in the tariff. ["No, no!"] If that is doubted I can prove my statement from the Despatch from the Government of India, presented to Parliament in 1882. In this Despatch to the Secretary of State there is included a statement from Mr. Lay, the Chinese Secretary to Lord Elgin's Mission. He says—

"All the negotiations at Tien-Tsin passed through me. Not one word upon either side was ever said about opium from first to last. The revision of the tariff and the adjustment of all questions affecting our trade were designedly left for after deliberation and arrangement, and it was agreed that for that purpose the Chinese High Commissioner should meet Lord Elgin at Shanghai in the following winter. In the meantime," Mr. Lay continues, "the preparation of the tariff devolved upon me at the desire of the Chinese no less than Lord Elgin. When I came to 'opium' I inquired what course they proposed to take in respect to it. The answer was, 'We have resolved to put it into the tariff as yang yeh' (foreign medicine). I urged a moderate duty in view of the cost of collection, which was agreed to. This represents with strict accuracy the amount of 'extortion' resorted to."

From that time to this it has rested on that footing. The Chinese at any time may terminate the Treaty on giving 12 months' notice, and to protect themselves they may increase the duty to any extent they please, or they may exclude it altogether. This, I think I may say: that if the Chinese Government thought proper to raise the duty to a prohibitive extent, or shut out the article altogether, this country would not expend £1 in powder and shot or lose the life of a soldier in an attempt to force the opinion upon the Chinese. I deny that our wars with China were on account of opium; our quarrels with the Chinese were on account of trade generally. Opium was only one item, and war was carried on in order to open China to trade generally, not for the trade in opium. The hon. Baronet condemns the practice of the Indian Government in respect to opium entirely, and in this he differs from the line taken on former occasions, by which he regarded the system provided in Western India in respect to the levying of duty on opium as comparatively unobjectionable. I am not concerned to weigh the difference 'in degrees of morality of the two systems. The cultivation is limited in Bengal to certain areas, the poppy is grown under licence, the produce is taken at fixed rate, paid for handsomely and sold at public auction. In Western India the poppy is grown in independent States, and by Treaty opium is sent through the Custom House, with a heavy tax upon it. What we have to consider is this: Whichever way we deal with this business it is in the same spirit, on the same principle that the Indian Government deals with opium and spirits as the Government deals with the Spirit Duty in this country. There are three ways of dealing with the trade in intoxicants and narcotics—things which may be harmless or even beneficial when taken in small quantities, but extremely injurious to human health and life if taken in excess. You can either forbid the trade altogether, you can tolerate it and not interfere with it, or you can regulate it. The course taken alike in this country and in India is to regulate the trade, to place upon these things the highest duty possible for them to bear without offering too great a temptation to smuggling. There is practically no difference between the system pursued in this country and in India, nor in principle any difference in the method pursued in dealing with opium in Bengal and in Bombay. I wish to point out, further, for the matter might be mistaken from what has been said in speeches by the hon. Baronet and my hon. Friend behind me, that in some States, such as the Great Mahratta States, by Treaty sufficient opium is grown for home consumption and none for export. My hon. Friend is mistaken when he talks of the amount grown in Rajpootana. In a great part the poppy is not grown at all, and in other States under Treaty they suppress the poppy on condition of being supplied with Malwa opium free of duty for their own consumption. But there were one or two things said by the hon. Baronet in his speech to which I must refer out of respect to him, for the serious nature of his speech requires that I should give attention to it. "Suppose," said the hon. Baronet, "the Government of this country had the whisky trade in its hands:" that would be the Gothenburg system, which some people advocate. I should not like the State either here or in India to undertake the sale and distribution of an article of the kind. It would have some considerations to recommend it, but there would be, I think, greater objections—for one thing, it would tend to demoralise the Public Service. The hon. Baronet has referred to an opinion expressed by Sir Thomas Wade; and I must admit that, in relation to matters connected with Chinese trade, this is an authority of the highest importance. If Sir Thomas Wade unreservedly condemned our position towards China that opinion is deserving of every consideration and respect. But let me remind the hon. Baronet of a passage in these Papers laid before Parliament in 1882, quoted from a Despatch from Sir Thomas Wade to the Secretary of State in 1881. Sir Thomas Wade gives an account of a conversation he held with the Chinese Ministers. He says—

"I went to the Yamen to speak of various matters. Four Ministers received me. Adverting to opium, I observed that the authorities in some places were taxing opium, native and foreign; in others were trying to increase the sale and consumption of both. Without at all denying the right of the Chinese Government to do as it chose, I should wish to know what course the Government approved? They said the question was embarrassing. The Chinese Government would be glad to stop opium smoking altogether, but the habit was too confirmed to be stopped by official intervention. No idea of abolishing the trade at present was in the mind of the Government. Alluding to the desire of well-disposed people at home to see England withdraw from the trade, I asked if it would be of any use to diminish yearly the export from India. The Indian Government might be thus enabled to provide otherwise for loss of income. They said so long as the habit exists, opium will be procured either from India or elsewhere. Any serious attempt to check the evil must originate with the people themselves. The measure I suggest would affect Chinese Revenue, but would not reach the root of the mischief."

Now, it has been said by the hon. Baronet to-night, as it has been said before, that we introduced opium into China. No greater mistake was ever made. We did not introduce it.

*SIR J. PEASE: The right hon. Gentleman will allow me to say that I never said so in my life.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I beg pardon; the hon. Baronet said, I think, that we had set the Chinese to grow opium.

*SIR J. PEASE: Yes.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Very well. Now, as bearing upon that, I may be allowed to say that Sir Thomas Wade told me to-day there is good reason to suppose that opium has been grown in China from time immemorial. In 1840, when the first Treaty was made, opium was grown 1,000 miles from the sea-board in the most remote parts of China, and equal to that grown in India. Clearly, then, we did not introduce the drug into China, and that statement has been made, though not by the hon. Baronet. It was an article of trade in the days of Queen Elizabeth, from what are now known as the Straits Settlements. The use of opium, like the use of spirits, has been the habit of people in parts of India from time immemorial. In the very early history of our occupation our officers seriously contemplated the cutting down of palm trees to prevent the distillation of ardent spirits. No one could respect more than

Sir J. Fergusson

I do the expression of opinion by Christian and Benevolent Societies on this subject. They no doubt feel strongly that we should not, by our policy, inflict injury on the people of India or China. But while there is the strong demand—the settled habit of people—for this drug, it is impossible to prevent its use without an exercise of force amounting to downright tyranny. As has been said by the hon. Member opposite (Dr. Farquharson) the moderate use of the drug is very common, and I am reminded of my own experience in India. Among the Rajpoots it is the universal practice to offer a drink of a solution of opium as a mark of hospitality. It is used as a sort of stirrup cup, a bowl being specially kept for the purpose of dissolving the opium in water. No one can say that it has had a demoralising and degrading effect upon the Rajpoots; there is no finer race of men in India. A warlike, manly, energetic race they are, and yet they are in the habit of taking this as a drink in the morning just as a man in England may smoke his pipe. It is quite true that one of the articles of impeachment against Warren Hastings was the sending of opium into China, but that is by no means any proof that Warren Hastings was among the first to send opium from India to China. It may be that the work of the missionaries is prejudiced by Europeans taking part in the opium trade, but if there was not a single chest of opium sent from India to China there would be a great falling off of Indian revenue, but there would be little diminution in the quantity used in China, because year by year the native grown opium is increasing, displacing the Indian opium, which under a high import duty is an expensive luxury. There is evidence that the Chinese grown opium will displace the Indian imports the low excise duty put upon it, by the Chinese Government gives it a ready sale and promises at no distant period to displace the Indian opium. The fact is, there is in China, as elsewhere, several phases of opinion. There are those who disapprove of its use altogether, but there is also a large class interested in the cultivation, and think it ought to be promoted rather than discouraged. Burma has been mentioned to-night, and there is some confusion between the regulations in British or Lower Burma and the recently annexed province of Upper Burma. In Lower Burma the sale of opium is strictly regulated. There are only 20 licensed shops; and that the regulations are enforced is proved by the fact that last year 300 persons were prosecuted in Akyab alone for the illicit sale of opium. The shops are not kept by Bengalese, but by Chinese, for there is a large Chinese population, and the sale could not be prohibited without causing great excitement. In Upper Burma, on the other hand, the sale and use of opium was prohibited by former Kings through the influence of the priests; but, as a matter of fact, the drug was commonly sold and used. According to the Reports of officers, with which at this late hour I will not trouble the House, the Government have set about checking this illicit sale, but allowing a limited number of shops for the natives of China and India, who are accustomed to the use of the drug; but neither opium or spirits are to be sold to native Burmese. And yet it is made a reproach against the Government of India. You cannot govern a country upon abstract principles. You must deal with the country as it is. People have a certain habit, which you may discourage to some extent, and to some extent you may restrain it by making indulgence in the habit expensive. Finally, I come to the position the Government take on this question. It has been often before the House, and whatever Party has been in office the Government have recognised the evils that do attend on an excessive use of opium. The difficulties in regard to India have been often urged. The hon. Member opposite said just now that India would be bankrupt if an end were put to the opium revenue. That is an extravagant statement. The gross receipts from opium estimated for the present year, were about Rs.8,300,000, and the net revenue Rs.5,300,000. There is not only to be considered the revenue which India derives and which she will have to make up, but there is also the profit of the cultivator, as well as of the native States who grow, or who receive it from us and make a profit upon it, and the interests of all concerned cannot be disregarded in a proposal to sweep away the trade. You may withdraw a source of revenue, you may gradually wean the people to other industries, but you cannot with a high hand take away the means by which they live, and which they have been pursuing with perfect obedience to law for years past. In comparison with our own Revenue the amount which India derives from the opium trade may not seem a very large sum; but I would ask the House to remember that it is a fifth part of the gross Revenue of India received from taxation, and that surely is no small amount. In the next place, I would ask the House how they could propose to replace such an item in the receipts of the Government of India. It is well known it is very difficult to find a new item of taxation in India without seriously hurting the prosperity and comfort of the people. We have in recent years made many efforts for the defence of India; we are frequently called upon to do more in the way of work for developing the means of communication. The other day we were asked to reduce the Salt Tax. How can you hope to reduce the Salt Tax, which is so profitable, if you are constantly depriving the Government of more than £5,000,000? It is manifest that the postponement of the reduction of this tax on one of the necessities of life must be for an indefinite time. The hon. Baronet spoke of the sum as £3,500,000 sterling; but the rupee goes as far in India as ever, notwithstanding the difference in exchange. You have to provide for the item in the Indian currency, and not in the British. How are you going to deal with the native States, to whom you have granted this revenue, because they will not be content to go without the profits they derived from the trade? It is evident it would disturb your relations with them, and that the amount that would have to be made up would not be confined to the loss of revenues in India, or even to the compensation of those who obtained a livelihood from the trade. These are very serious considerations. I freely admit that the Government of India have never denied that it would be very desirable that this source of revenue should be altered. They have taken means to reduce it. They have diminished the number of licences, and they diminished the area on which the poppy was grown. One million acres less are now under poppy in Bengal than ten years ago. I read to the House yesterday some statistics in regard to opium in the last ten years, which show that from 1881 to the present time the diminution in the total consumption in British India has been from 5,606 chests to 4,500 chests, a diminution of about 20 per cent., which I think shows that the measures of the Government have not been without effect. The change cannot be made suddenly; but it is being already made by degrees. The revenue of India, I am glad to say, has increased in the last five years by £7,000,000. I hope the work of development going on will cause it to increase still more. So that little by little this revenue which is objectionable in many ways, because it is the result of indulgence, no doubt will gradually be diminished. Before I sit down I will notice what was said by the hon. Member for Kirkcudbright as to the system in the Eastern provinces, particularly in Singapore and Hong Kong, where opium licences are farmed out, which probably furnishes too great an inducement and encouragement for the sale of the drug. The Secretary of State for the Colonies has, I know, expressed his dislike to the farming system, and he will call upon Colonial Governments to consider the practicability of substituting another system, and by fixing the price of the licences as highly as possible, thereby reduce the number. I think I have shown the House that the Government do desire to limit, and restrict, and regulate this traffic. It is impossible to abolish it straight away without great hardship to the Indian people unless, indeed, this House shall make good the loss. I remember, not many years ago, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian expressed an opinion to that effect. Not only would you take away from India this profitable revenue derived from a common source, but you impose upon India the necessity of making up that revenue by taxing still more highly those people which some hon. Gentlemen opposite say are now overtaxed. Therefore, I think I may say this Motion should not be pressed as a Vote of Censure on the Government of India, seeing that their policy was tending in the direction which hon. Members desire to go, though it is impossible at one stroke to accomplish the object they have at heart.

(11.35.) MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I think the House will agree with me that the speech to which we have just listened is a very fair one coming from a Government official, representing on this occasion the Government of India. I have to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the tone of his speech, for the courtesy with which he has treated our views, and for certain important concessions he has made. For instance, he made a concession that never has been publicly made in Parliament before, and which will be fruitful of very important consequences. He has told us, speaking on behalf of the Government, that we will never again fire a shot in China in order to insist upon their receiving opium. I wish to fix the Government to this most important concession, and I hope it will be made known throughout China and throughout all Asia tomorrow, that the British Government has practically repented of the policy pursued towards China for the last 100 years. I am bound now to ask the House to permit me, for a few moments, to criticise some of the statements of my right hon. Friend. I am sorry that we who are moving in this matter have to join issue absolutely with him, as to some statements which he puts forth officially on this occasion. The main statement which he made, which is always made officially in these opium Debates, is that this country has never forced opium upon China. I think that is a very startling statement to make in face of all the evidence that we have upon the subject. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the opinions of Sir Thomas Wade, the British Ambassador at Peking whom we have heard justly described as a man of great eminence, and whose opinion is entitled to the greatest weight. I am willing to leave the decision of this question entirely to the reported opinions of Sir Thomas Wade, and I hope the House will give me their attention for two or three minutes while I lay before them the opinions of our late highly respected Ambassador in China. We were told we used no compulsion under the Treaty of Tientsin. I think Sir Thomas was in China when that Treaty was agreed to. Here is what he wrote in 1868, in a Despatch to the British Government—

"We are generally prone to forget that the footing we have in China has been obtained by force, and by force alone, and that unwarlike and unenergetic as we hold the Chinese, to be, it is in reality to the fear of force alone that we are indebted for the safety we enjoy at certain points accessible to our force. Yet nothing that has been gained, it must be remembered, was received from the free will of the Chinese; now the concessions made to us from time to time have been from first to last extorted against the conscience of the nation in defiance, that is to say of the moral convictions of its educated men, not merely of the office-holders, whom we call Mandarins, and who are numerically but a small proportion of the educated class, but of the millions who are saturated with a knowledge of the history and philosophy of their country. To these, as a rule, the very extension of our trade must appear politically, or which is in China, the same thing, morally, wrong, and the story of foreign intercourse during the last 30 years can have no effect but to confirm them in their opinion."

Does the Under Secretary agree with that opinion, that we have extorted every thing from China by force, that our action in China has always been contrary to the moral convictions of the country?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No doubt the introduction of Free Trade was unacceptable to the Chinese. What I said was that in no sense was opium forced upon them.

*MR. S. SMITH: Very well, I will try again. Here is what Sir Thomas Wade stated in 1869. He reported to the Government that he had been complaining to the Chinese Government of their hostility to the trade, and here is the reply which he passed on to the British Government—

"The Chinese Minister said how irreparable and continuous was the injury which they saw inflicted upon the whole Empire by the foreign importation of opium. If England would consent to interdict this case, either to grow it in India or to allow their ships to bring it to China, there might be some hope of more friendly feelings. They believed the extension of this pernicious habit was mainly due to the avarice with which foreigners supplied the poison for their own profit, perfectly regardless of the irreparable injury inflicted, and naturally they felt hostile to all concerned in such a traffic."

That was the reason which the Chinese Government gave, and rightly gave, for their hostility. It is too late in the day now to be told that this country did not force opium upon China. The judgment of history has been passed upon it, and no historian of repute now would deny that our first war was entirely an opium war brought on by smuggling opium into China for 50 years, by defying the Chinese edicts constantly issued against it; and by forcing this opium upon them by traders, we at last brought on that deplorable war. The second war was at bottom and substantially another opium war, brought on by continuing this smuggling trade in defiance of all the edicts of the Chinese Government. I say we gained entrance into China for opium purely by force, contrary to the convictions of the people. Until we obtained entrance for it, opium was prohibited in China, the Chinese Government used its whole power to suppress the growth of opium at home, but at last it found it could not resist our pressure to legalise it, and it was vain to attempt to suppress it at home. Now I will pass to one or two other statements which the right hon. Gentleman has made to us regarding India. He tells us that the policy of the Government of India has been to regulate and to control the traffic in opium, and that if they had endeavoured to do more than that it would be considered an intolerable hardship by the people. Now, I deny that. I say the best proof of what the Indian people think of it is to leave them to decide it by local option. Leave to any town in India to decide by the voice of the people whether they wish opium shops open or not, and I do not believe you will find a single place in India that will not, by a practically unanimous vote, decide to close the opium shops. I do not believe there is one State in India that will not agree to the closing of these shops if put to the popular vote. Most Asiatic States that are free and independent have prohibited opium. The Burmese Government made it a capital offence to sell opium or to smoke it; but as soon as we got possession of Burma, what did we do? We spread the taste by the free distribution of opium cakes among the young people. We gradually developed this habit, that was almost unknown before, in an abominable manner; and over large tracts of that country we have brought misery and ruin in our steps. I consider our dealing with Burma in this whole question of opium disgraceful in the last degree. We have published false statistics on the subject, we have deluded the people of this country by putting forth the statement that we have only licensed 34 opium shops in Burma, whereas, the fact is, that these opium shops are distributing centres to a vast number of small dens. One gentleman in the single town of Akyab counted 50 opium dens in three quarters of an hour. Yet our Government declares there is only one licensed shop there. It is believed there are a thousand shops. And so all over Burma. I say we are thoroughly humbugged and deceived by official statistics put forward regarding opium in India and China. Now, we have been told there is a great decrease in the consumption in India. I am sorry to say I do not believe it. All the information accessible to me points in the opposite direction, and I must give the House some figures taken from the last Excise Reports of the Government of India. I ask the House whether they agree with the statement that the consumption of opium is declining in India? In the Presidency of Bombay the number of opium shops licensed was 652, and here are the Revenue Returns. For the five years ending 1882, the revenue was 51,000 rupees; for the five years ending 1887, 97,000 rupees. In 1888, 118,000 rupees; in 1889, 120,000 rupees; for 1890, 121,000 rupees; and the estimate for 1891 is 129,000 rupees, showing in the Bombay Presidency alone an increase of just 150 per cent. in ten years. I commend that fact to the attention of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. Well, take Bengal. Here are the figures for 1887 and 1888, the latest years we have got. They were 4,137,000 in 1887, and 4,399,000 in 1888, an increase of 262,000 rupees. The increase for five years was 842,000 rupees. That does not look like a decrease. Here are the last figures I shall trouble the House with: They are for Lower Burma. In 1888, 17 lakhs of rupees; in 1889 they were 18 lakhs of rupees. That is an increase of 8½ per cent. In Arakan the revenue from opium in 1886 was 71,000 rupees; in 1887, 119,000 rupees; in 1888, 176,000; in 1889, 188,000; and last year 158,000. I am very much afraid that we are being deceived or misled by the Government statistics. It was my duty some years ago to analyse the Abkari statistics with regard to the liquor traffic, and I came to the conclusion that they were very untrustworthy, and I am very much afraid it is the same with the opium traffic. The fact is, that the demand in India for revenue is so constant and pressing that it leads to evasions; it leads to official colouring whenever desirable rather than allow the real facts to transpire. It is virtually impossible to get thoroughly straightforward Returns in a question of this kind. I think everyone who has had experience of Indian statistics will justify what I am saying. I freely admit that India is a very poor country, and that it is quite impossible for us to throw extra taxation upon India to the extent of £4,000,000 sterling. What we have to face is this: India will lose £4,000,000 sterling in our money by the abolition of the opium traffic. It is clear to me that if this country is to insist, as it ought to do, on the abolition of this traffic, this country must come to its assistance. I am quite sure that if the case were put straight and plain before the people of this country, if it was made clear that a great national sin had to be expiated, and that the cost was to be £4,000,000, there would be no difficulty in finding the money. The amount is a trifle in comparison with the amount of the wealth of this country. Our annual income is about £1,250,000,000 a year. Mr. Giffen puts the capital-value at £10,000,000,000 sterling. I therefore ask, would there be any difficulty in getting £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 a year? It is absurd to say that there would be any difficulty. If the conscience of this country were roused it would be looked upon as a fleabite, and it would be far easier for us to do this work now than it was to pay £20,000,000 for the abolition of the Slave Trade in 1830. England was then very poor, but she is very rich now. Her income is three or four times as large, and her taxation is very much lighter. There would be no difficulty whatever, out of the surpluses we have year after year in the Budget, to find the amount required to tide India over her difficulties in the few years for which it would be requisite. Of this I feel perfectly certain, that any sacrifice this country would make would ennoble her and raise her in the esteem of every nation on the earth. The advantages that would come back to us would repay us ten-fold for all the little sacrifice we would make. We would have an immense development of the trade with China, as an hon. Friend observes. Our trade with China has been starved, and that by this wretched policy. It has remained absolutely stationary for many years. I believe that Lancashire alone has paid in the loss of trade more than the whole amount that would be required to extinguish the opium traffic. However we look at this matter—whether we look at it from the point of view of political economy, from the point of view of Christianity, from the point of view of public ethics—I believe our bounden duty is to take measures for the early extinction of the trade. I believe the country will soon demand it. I do not think the Government know how strong the feeling is in the country, and they may yet discover that in a surprising manner. At the next General Election any candidate who comes before an audience and says we should make a little sacrifice to put an end to the iniquity will carry his audience with him. I do not believe a single constituency will return a Member who would avowedly support the present system, and no candidate will make a speech such as that made to-night by the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire without receiving manifest tokens of disapprobation. The only point I can compliment the hon. Member upon is his courage. A more extraordinary speech was never listened to in this House; and I venture to say that no man will at the next General Election face an audience with such a speech and be returned, holding such views. I hope the House will do itself honour to-night. It has a great chance. I hope we shall have a Division to-night that shall do honour to this House, and that shall raise this country in the estimation of foreign countries, and save us from that national judgment which will certainly come upon us some day if we persist in this national sin.

*(12.0.) SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): At this late hour, before we divide, owing to my official experience of all parts of this great question, I may perhaps crave permission of the House to summarise, in a very few moments, the practical morality of this matter. Sir, with all respect to the hon. Baronet the Mover of this Resolution, and the striking, perhaps stirring, array of testimony which he produced against opium in China, the House will recollect that the hon. Baronet belongs to a very honourable party, the Temperance Party, and we know that precisely the same testimony, only stronger and larger, could be adduced by any temperance speaker regarding the use of alcoholic spirits in England. Now, Sir, the hon. Baronet says that the opium system of India and China is morally indefensible. I say it is defensible. If it were morally indefensible I would not undertake to defend it. If it be morally justifiable, then, and then only, would I undertake its defence. I make no ad misericordiam appeal. If the thing be wrong, then I do not claim the money; I would let it go, be the consequences what they may, be the embarrassment to the Government of India, be the consequent taxation to the people of India, what they may. But, Sir, I undertake to show that upon moral grounds, upon arguments of practical morality, the system is just as defensible as the Excise system of England, or of any civilised country in Europe. May I ask the House for a moment to consider the case of China? Of the opium supplied to the people of China three-fourths are produced in that country. That is of inferior quality and is increasing, and is subject to only one kind of taxation, namely, the local one. That taxation goes to the Chinese Government. One-fourth of the opium comes from India. That is of a superior kind, is fast decreasing, is subject to double taxation—first, that by the Government of China, an import duty; and, secondly, the export duty levied by the Government of India. So that, on the whole, the Indian opium in China is to the Chinese grown opium what the champagne of France is to the rest of the wines of that country. It decreases, because the Chinese grown article increases in quantity and quality, driving the Indian article more and more out of the market. Then China is perfectly free. I will not go into those questions of ancient history, which have, to the undue occupation of the time of this House, been adduced by the hon. Member who has just sat down. But how is the case at this moment? There has been a Convention lasting for a few years only, according to which Indian opium was admitted to China upon the condition that the Chinese Government were to levy only a limited amount of taxation. The term of that Convention has expired, and the Chinese Government might put prohibitory duties upon, or might stop, the Indian opium importation altogether. Indian opium lies at their mercy. Therefore, China is entirely a free agent. Now, the House will see that if China is poisoned by opium, she poisons herself. But then, firstly, comes the question whether this opium is really a poison. The House has just heard the important medical testimony given by the hon. Member for Aberdeen. But there is still more important evidence, namely, that of my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, perhaps the first living authority medically on this subject. I only hope that time will permit of his giving us his opinion during this Debate. To the best of my knowledge and judgment opium is not deleterious in reasonable moderation, and is, under all circumstances, far less deleterious than alcoholic drink. Either taken to excess is harmful, but the former less than the latter—that is, the narcotic drug less than the alcoholic spirit. It is not the case that opium leads to crime. Of course, excessive use of it will directly lead to various social mischiefs which may amount to crime; but leading to crime in the same sense as when spirits are taken to excess is not a direct consequence of the indulgence in opium. Spirits, indeed, lead to violence; but opium induces quiescence, and that is the reverse of leading to crime. The hon. Baronet spoke of opium being labelled in England as a poison. Why, certainly; that is the concentrated distillation, amounting to a tincture. That is poison. But that is a wholly different thing to the substance sold in the Eastern bazaars under the name of opium. That opium is perfectly harmless if taken in moderation, and it is taken by many classes in Western India without any mischief whatever, or without anybody being acquainted with the fact that it is taken at all. We have heard evidence to-night that it is taken by the most stalwart and enduring races of Western India. And in Eastern India the inhabitants of Assam and Orissa, being consumers of opium and not of spirits, as in other parts of India, are about the most quiet of all sections of the population. It is not really the fact that opium is a poison in the true sense of the word. Like spirits, it may be taken in excess, but, unlike spirits, when taken in excess, it does not conduce to dangerous conduct. Then, secondly, the question arises, are the Chinese the victims of the poison if it really existed? To what extent do the people of China consume opium? Only to the most limited. Why, Sir, it has been shown upon calculations by the very highest authority in China (in a Blue Book which I have in my hand), that not more than one man out of 150 obtains access to opium at all. Now, the hon. Baronet spoke of the thousands and myriads of people who are being poisoned. What becomes of that allegation in the face of these calculations. The people of China are not being drugged, nor are they intemperate. On the contrary, they are, as a nation, temperate. Are the people of China in a degraded state? Quite the contrary. Their numbers are increasing, their trade is expanding, their industry is thriving. So much are they over-populating the vast and magnificent area with which Providence has endowed them that they are obliged to emigrate to foreign places. They people Lower Burma, the Malay Peninsula, Java, Sumatra, and Borneo; and if it had not been for the action of our white countrymen they would have obtained a large share in the Australian Continent. If it were not for the Americans they would hold the Eastern Coast of the Pacific. These are not the sort of people who are being poisoned and demoralised. I charge the hon. Baronet and those who think with him with unintentional, nevertheless monstrous, exaggeration in respect to opium in China. Then I ask the House to consider what is really our position in India. What do we do with this opium produced in India? We put a very heavy tax, indeed, upon it—three or four times ad valorem the cost of production. I say that we have a right to do so, just as the Chancellor of the Exchequer has a right to tax whisky in Scotland and Ireland. If it be righteous to draw taxes from a gin-palace, it is equally righteous to do the same from an opium den. There is no wrong morally in taxing a spirit or in taxing a drug. Either is harmless when used in moderation, or may even be beneficial. Either it is dangerous only when used to excess, though the drug is less dangerous than the spirit. But the possibility of its being used to excess has never been treated as an argument against the morality of taxation either in England or in any civilised country of Europe. You say that we not only act as taxers of it, but that we trade in it. But with regard to the opium trade of Calcutta and Bombay, there are Jews, Armenians, Greeks, and merchants of other nationalities, men of wealth, energy, and enterprise, conducting this business who would be very much astonished to hear that their steamers, wharves, and various apparatus of trade are part of a Government concern. It is said, Why raise revenue from an unholy product? Does not the House perceive that the same thing might be said of spirits, from which we annually derive a vast revenue? Why, this argument as regards the taxation of opium runs on all fours from top to bottom pari passu, and is in every respect similar to the argument with regard to the taxation of alcoholic liquors in every civilised country of Europe. Upon this point I listened with great interest to the confession of Coleridge which the hon. Baronet read. Does he not see that if Coleridge had taken spirits instead of opium, and had suffered from delirium tremens, instead of the narcotic effects of opium, his confession would have been ten times graver than that which has been read? It was, indeed, a lucky thing he took to opium and not to spirits. The hon. Baronet, my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. M. Stewart), and the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith), have attempted to set up for China and for India a standard which they cannot and dare not set up in England. I claim for India and China the same measure which is meted out in England, neither more nor less. I appeal to those hon. Members to take the beam out of our own national eye before looking to the mote in the eye of our fellow-creatures in India and China. Before I conclude, just a few words regarding our own system in India itself. The House, doubtless, remembers that this is twofold—that for Malwa, native States, that for Bengal our own territory. With regard to Malwa, we levy a heavy export duty, as the drug passes through our territory en route to China. But in Bengal there is a different system. No man can cultivate the poppy without a licence. He must take the produce to the Excise officers. It must be manufactured on the spot under their eye. It must be by them sent to Calcutta, and there made over to the trade for export only. No man can engage in the production of this drug without a licence. Everything has to be done on the spot, where it can be under the inspection of the Government officers. And why is this? It is because we wish to make sure that the traffic in this article does not spread amongst our own people, and to see that it goes to Calcutta, from which place it is exported to China. [Ironical cheers.] Yes, but the people have spirits, and that is thought quite sufficient for them without opium; and therefore it is that we make sure that the opium goes out of India. It is for these good purposes that this system of severe Excise, and of licensing cultivation and of manufacture under Government inspection, is adopted in Bengal. It may be liable to misunderstanding; but once the facts are realised, then the moral advantage of the system is patent. Nothing would be easier if you wished it than to adopt in Bengal the same system which prevails in Malwa and Western India; so that the drug might be manufactured privately, as spirits now are, and subjected to an Excise system, with a view to exportation from Calcutta for China. But then the people of Bengal would illicitly get hold of the drug, which they cannot do now. Thus certain evils which are now absent from our Indian population would spring up. We are anxious that the people there should not consume this drug, in addition to the spirits they already have; and it is because of this anxiety for the moral welfare of our Indian people that the system I have described to the House is carried out. A great deal of misapprehension exists in the minds of those who denounce this system, and misrepresentation has been put forth, although, no doubt, unintentionally. Therefore, it is necessary that this point should be cleared up. Let me ask the House to consider what would be the consequence of attempting to abolish altogether the traffic in this drug? We should stop the transit of the Malwa Native States opium through British territory for exportation to China. But the production inside those Native States, being profitable, would continue. The result would be that all along the whole course of our frontier there would be a vast increase in the illicit traffic in opium and in the consumption of that article by our people. That would be one of the first results of our carrying the Motion of the hon. Baronet to-night. Next, if you were to abolish the Bengal system and stop the poppy culture in our own territories, fresh legislation would be required. You cannot prohibit a profitable cultivation, lawfully carried on for generations, without a new law. But I do not think you would get the Legislature of India to agree to the passing of such a law, unless you are prepared to send out a request that the Members are to vote to order. Opium is a thing which can be grown in every man's back garden, and if, owing to prohibition, this cultivation cannot be conducted openly and honestly, would not the people cultivate illicitly? Then would not the prohibition lead to fresh evil, involving executive difficulties and the setting up of an inquisitorial system? Besides, when you have prohibited and stopped its cultivation in Bengal, and stopped its regular transit from Malwa through British territory, what will you have done? You will have destroyed £5,500,000 of British revenue, and by enabling the people of China to obtain opium untaxed, and therefore cheaper, you will have stimulated the consumption of the drug instead of checking it by taxation. In this way you will have created the very opposite effect to that which is intended. Such would be the result of the ill-advised proposal now before the House. I am thankful to the House for the kind attention with which it has listened to me to-night, and I will not attempt to detain it much longer; but I have offered a mere summary of what might have been said on this complex question; because every one of the propositions I have put before the House would require at least a quarter of an hour to properly vindicate it. I should, however, wish to add a few words with regard to what has been said about Burma. It is quite absurd to speak about opium as being prohibited practically in Burma before we took over the country. There may have been prohibitory edicts, but these were not attended to. Why, Sir, consumption of opium has existed in Burma for a long period. It went on in that country merrily, and it is only since the extent of this consumption has been brought to our notice after the annexation that the system had been brought under strict Excise supervision. Again, the Burmese are not being demoralised. Not 3 per cent. obtain either drugs or spirits. They are a temperate people. With regard to the Excise on spirits in India, I do not propose to enter into any statistical discussion with my hon. Friend behind me (Mr Mark Stewart). I may say, however, that in this respect India may be regarded as a model country. The consumption of alcohol among the Indian people is so small that it does not apply to more than 7 per cent. of the population in Southern India; while in other parts of that Empire it is much less. I think I am within the mark when I say that not more than 4 per cent. of the whole of that large population of 260,000,000 ever consume alcoholic or narcotic substances. As to opium, it is taxed 10 times ad valorem, and not one person in 500 or more ever touches it. This, I think, is a result of which we may well be proud; and, considering the magnificence of such administrative facts, I can bear with equanimity all the detailed criticism which, with the best possible intentions, has been poured upon India by my hon. Friend (Mr. M. Stewart). I would remind the House, in conclusion, that we are asked to sacrifice £5,500,000 of our revenue by adopting the Motion of the hon. Baronet, Revenue that is now being spent on frontier defence, on the saving of life from famine, on the development of physical resources, on countless things pertaining to the welfare of the people. And for what? Practically for no moral advantage, for the vindication of no moral principle whatever. We should be only putting that big sum into the pockets of the opium consumers of China, without any commensurate result, either moral or physical. Indeed, the real result would be that for them the drug generally would be cheapened by so much remission of taxation. If there were a gap caused by suppression of Indian opium China would fill it up. Being cheapened, the consumption would be stimulated. What moral good, then, would the hon. Baronet have attained? Absolutely none. The very reverse, indeed: he would be augmenting the very evils which he vainly hopes to cure. I trust the House will reject a Motion, prompted by lofty and philanthropic motives no doubt, but sustained by misrepresentation, sincere and unconsciously, because it springs from a misapprehension of the facts.

(12.24.) MR. McDONALD CAMERON (Wick, &c.): I cannot but thank the hon. Baronet behind me for the manner in which he has brought this Resolution before the House, although I very much regret that the data on which we have to consider this matter are not so complete as they might have been. I may say that I had put down an Amendment, which I submitted to you, Sir, for your consideration, but which you felt it necessary to rule was out of Order. That Amendment had for its object the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the whole system of the opium traffic, in order that the House might have authentic data on which to found something like sound legislation. A good deal of sentiment—in fact, a great deal too much sentiment—has entered into some of the legislation passed by this House. We have had a recent example in the case of the Contagious Diseases Acts. We now know very well that they have not achieved the results anticipated from them by those who were parties to that legislation, and I am afraid that if this Motion be carried the same result may possibly follow. I have recently come from the East, where I have entered into this question of the opium traffic; and, as far as I have been able to acquaint myself of the facts, I can substantiate all that has fallen from the hon. Member who has just spoken. There is one point that I should like to bring before the House. Whenever this House, out of mistaken notions of goodness or of conferring benefit on the people of India or of our Crown Colonies, has attempted to interfere without a thorough knowledge of the conditions under which the people live, it has generally made a mistake. Take the question of the labour laws in the Straits Settlements. The labour employed in the Straits Settlements has been almost entirely procured from China. It is the Chinese who perform almost the whole of the labour there is, and it is a fact that in the labour agreements which are made in that part of the world the labourers will not engage to do the work required of them, on the plantations or elsewhere, unless they are certain that they can procure opium; just in the same way as among our large centres of population men will not engage to do work unless they can get tobacco and other things that they require. If you were to abolish this traffic, I feel sure the result would be that at the best you would only bring about a modification of the evil. It is a mistake to think that you can change the character of an eel simply by passing an Act of Parliament. There is too much of this sort of feeling entering into all the desire to pass this kind of legislation. There is a Commission at this moment sitting in the Straits Settlements on the labour question. They do not know how to meet the difficulty there. It has been said by the hon. Baronet who has brought forward this Motion that the Dutch are endeavouring to get rid of this traffic in Java. I do not know where the hon. Baronet has obtained his information, but I do not think it is entirely accurate. There may be a few officials or other persons in Java who have the same views on this subject as the hon. Baronet, and who, therefore, desire to abolish this traffic. Many people in this country, no doubt, wish to see a check put upon the opium traffic; but let me point out that the tobacco plantations at Java and Sumatra are entirely worked by Chinese, who would not labour there unless they were sure of a supply of opium. Is it likely, then, the Dutch Government will put a stop to this profitable industry simply to give effect to philanthropic views? I confess I do not like the opium traffic myself. I think that something should be done to regulate it. In deference to public opinion in this country an effort should be made to bring it more under control. But I do object to legislation being undertaken without a sufficient knowledge of the subject. If a Royal Commission investigated it, then hon. Members would have before them details which would enable them to arrive at a just and right conclusion; they would have before them data of a practical character. I shall vote for this Motion, not because I expect it will be carried, but because I am unable to bring forward that of which I have given notice. I should very much prefer that the Government could see their way to adopt my proposal, and have a Royal Commission to inquire into the traffic, which, it must be remembered, is a legal traffic. At any rate, some effort should be made to meet in this matter the wishes of a large section of the people of this country.

*(12.33.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I have listened with very great interest to the Debate which has been going on for the last 3½ hours, and with great interest also to the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. I was a little surprised at the conclusion at which he arrived. He spoke with considerable force against the Motion of the hon. Baronet opposite, but wound up with an intimation of his intention to vote for the Motion on the ground that he could not move an Amendment of his own for the appointment of a Royal Commission. Now, I can assure the hon. Member that there is every disposition on the part of the Government to take means to satisfy the people of the country and public opinion on this question by making any inquiry which it is possible to institute. If the hon.

Gentleman desires that every information shall be obtained the Government are perfectly ready to communicate with the Government of India with a view to an inquiry being conducted in the manner suggested by the hon. Member, or in any other form by which information can be satisfactorily obtained for the people of this country. This is a very grave question indeed. The hon. Baronet opposite introduced it in a speech of great moderation, but I cannot help recalling to the recollection of the House some of the statements which he made upon this question. He said, "Let us be moral and right without any regard to pecuniary considerations." That is a sentiment which does the hon. Baronet great credit, and it is one in which we are all prepared to join with limitations. I would venture to suggest, Sir, that we should have no regard whatever for pecuniary considerations in matters where we ourselves alone are concerned should those considerations interfere with a discharge of a moral duty; but, at the same time, I hold it to be both moral and right that we should have regard to pecuniary considerations when we arrive at a resolution which affects other persons. I occasionally take refuge when I have to consider questions of administration in that storehouse of moral axioms which is constituted by Hansard; and occasionally I find it possible to borrow axioms from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. Now, that right hon. Gentleman, speaking on this question only a few years ago, said—

"There is a kind of morality which, in my opinion, is the lowest of all, and it is the morality of a Government which makes promises without knowing that it has the means of fulfilling them."

Now, the hon. Baronet asks this House and this Government practically to make a promise without knowing that it has the means of fulfilling it. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that if the House desired to effect a reform it should be prepared at once to assure the Government of India that it would provide it with that revenue of which it would be deprived if this traffic were suppressed. The hon. Baronet, dealing with the same point, said there could be no doubt that the money would be forthcoming, and that the revenue would be found by this country, or, at any rate, there might be a postponement of the charge for expenditure actually incurred, and its payment extended over a period of years. It appears to me that a recommendation to postpone the payment of debt by the Government of India is not a kind of morality which we ought to enforce upon that Government. Is the hon. Baronet prepared to move an Address to the Crown setting forth that the Imperial Government is prepared to make good to the Government of India such a deficit as may arise from the suppression of the opium traffic? I know that my hon. Friend the Member for the City of London does propose to give effect to that principle, and desires that the House should agree to a financial Resolution of that kind; but I would suggest to the hon. Baronet that such an Address to the Crown ought to be a Resolution preliminary to one condemning the traffic in opium.

*SIR J. PEASE: When I concluded my speech I stated that if the language was carefully guarded that I was prepared to assure the people of India of an annual grant from the Imperial Parliament for the purpose of meeting any deficit which might be occasioned by the suppression of the traffic.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Then I would suggest to the hon. Baronet that he should make that Resolution antecedent to the one condemning the traffic in opium.

*SIR J. PEASE: I am quite prepared to add it to my Resolution.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There is a good deal to be said in favour of such a Resolution; and if the hon. Baronet desires to withdraw the Resolution now before the House, and add a clause to that effect, then we shall be in a position to consider the whole question. What I wish to point out to the hon. Baronet, who I believe is thoroughly in earnest in what he is advocating, is that we are asked to agree to an abstract Resolution without any indication on his part; that if that abstract Resolution is carried, and if the consequences thereof is a loss to the Revenues of India, a grant will be made from the Exchequer of Great Britain to make up that deficit. No doubt the hon. Baronet would be prepared to advocate such a grant, but I think the House will agree with me that that would hardly be a satisfactory mode of discharging our duty to the inhabitants of India. We should deprive them of certain revenues, and at the same time there would be by no means a certainty that this House or the country would be prepared to make good the revenues thus taken from them. The course which this Government has taken, and which all Governments have taken, during the last few years—for the present Government take no credit for greater care and consideration for the morality of the people of India than has been shown by preceding Governments—has been to diminish the area of cultivation in India to an extent, in the last five years, at any rate of 20 per cent. The production and sale of opium has been decreased considerably in each year, and that must be taken as an indication of the policy of the Government. But we are not prepared, and we are not able, to accept a Resolution which would terminate the production of opium in India, and at once deprive the Revenue of India of a large sum. If we were to attempt to do that illicit sale and production would be the result, and the consequence would be far more serious than those arising under the present system. Our policy has greatly diminished the cultivation and consumption of the drug, and that policy which has been carried on with marked success during the last five years would be persevered in, but we cannot accept the Resolution couched in the language of the hon. Baronet unless this House is prepared to precede it by a positive engagement on the part of this country to make good to the Revenues of India the enormous sum of which it would suddenly be deprived by a desire—a very proper and humane desire—on the part of the people of this country to protect the people of India from the consequences of this traffic. I think the House will agree that the course which I am suggesting is a very proper one, and would meet all practical purposes. I say again that this House must, in the first instance, pledge itself to make good to the Revenues of India any loss of which it might be deprived by the suppression of the opium trade, and until that is done the Government cannot assent to the course suggested by the hon. Baronet.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, proposed.

(12.56.) Amendment proposed,

To add, at the end of the Question, the words "And this House, feeling the pressure of taxation on the people of India, will take steps to reimburse the deficiency so caused to the Indian Government."—(Sir Robert Fowler.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

(12.59.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I should like to hear the views of the Government. It is surprising to me that a gentleman of the great experience of the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London should have delivered himself in such a brief space on so important a question. I have known him to make long speeches on matters of far less importance. I can hardly think he limited his speech solely by reference to the state of the clock. Now, Sir, it seems to me very unfortunate indeed if by reason of the limited period—

It being One of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at One o'clock till Monday next.

Monday, 13th April, 1891.

QUESTIONS.

THE IRISH MAILS.

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT (Antrim, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state the number of letters, exclusive of the American and Canadian mails, received in Ireland from England and Scotland during any one month, say March, 1891; and of such letters, how many were addressed to persons in Belfast and the district served by that city, and in the rest of Ireland?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): According to the latest information possessed by my Department, the letters, exclusive of those for the United States and Canada, received in Ireland from England and Scotland numbered in one week 703,810. Of these 150,811 were addressed to persons in Belfast and the district served from that city, and 552,999 were for the rest of Ireland.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther) whether he is aware that the Governing Body of St. Paul's School have decided to pay £15,250 (or at the rate of £3,300 per acre) for land in West Kensington, Fulham, on the advice of Mr. Daniel Watney, Surveyor to the Mercers' Company, and on the independent corroborative opinion of Messrs. C. & W. Oakley, 10, Waterloo Place; and whether he will state who are the vendors of this land, for which Messrs. Fox & Bousfield are employed to arrange the purchase?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The Governors of St. Paul's School, acting, it is understood, on the advice of Mr. Daniel Watney, the Surveyor to the Mercers' Company, have applied to the Charity Commissioners for their sanction to a purchase of land in West Kensington on the terms mentioned; but no opinion has been obtained by the Governors from Messrs. C. & W. Oakley, who have, however, received instructions from the Governors to report directly to the Charity Commissioners upon the value of the land. The Commissioners have not yet received that Report. The vendors are Mr. John Leonard Tomlin, of No. 8, Old Burlington Street, solicitor, and Mr. Arthur John Campbell Gwatkin, of Dover Street, Piccadilly. The latter sells as mortgagee.

ARMY PENSIONS.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is a fact that all who joined the Army under 18 years of age, and have been discharged to pension, as non-commissioned officers, under the Royal Warrant of July, 1881, and subsequent Royal Warrants, have lost pension by continuing to serve beyond 21 years; whether such loss is in accordance with those Royal Warrants; and if, on inquiry, he should find that they have so lost pension, and that such loss is not in accordance with the Royal Warrants, will he cause full and immediate redress to be made them?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): It is not the fact that any soldier has lost pension as a consequence of serving more than 21 years; nor would such loss be in accordance with Royal Warrant. If the hon. Member can state any case in which a non-commissioned officer has so lost or is supposed to have so lost pension, I will take steps to have it inquired into.

THE COMMON WOOD AT HOLT, DENBIGH.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith what is the cause of the delay in the completion by the Charity Commissioners of the proposed scheme for the management of the Common Wood at Holt, in the County of Denbigh; and when such scheme will be finally settled?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: The scheme for the management of the corporate property (including the Common Wood) of the dissolved Corporation of Holt, in the County of Denbigh, was sealed on April 3. The reason for the delay in the establishment of the scheme has arisen from the fact that at a late stage of the proceedings a question was raised by the Office of Woods bearing upon certain rights of the Crown, affecting the corporate property to be included in the scheme.

DELIVERY OF TELEGRAMS.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that considerable dissatisfaction exists among persons living in country places, at a distance from any telegraph office, at the present high charges for the delivery of telegrams; whether he is aware that, having regard to the rates of wages and of horse hire in country districts, telegrams could, without loss to the Post Office, be delivered on foot at 3d. per mile, and by mounted messenger at 8d. per mile; and whether the subject has been, or will be, considered with a view of making some reduction in the existing charges at an early date?

*MR. RAIKES: The general question of the charges for the delivery of telegrams has been more than once considered, but I am quite prepared to have further inquiry made in view of the circumstances now existing, and I shall be glad to let the hon. Member know the result in due course. He will readily understand that the inquiry will occupy some time. I should, however, say that I have considerable doubts as to the practicability of establishing a general rural delivery of telegrams at the rates suggested in the question.

THE LOSS OF THE ROXBURGH CASTLE.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to a statement made before the Collector of Customs at Newport by James Whitelaw, able seaman, Dundee, one of the two survivors of the crew of 24 of the steamer Roxburgh Castle, which was recently sunk in a collision, to the effect that the crew made for the lifeboat,

Mr. J. W. Lowther

"But could not move her from the chocks, and as a last extremity got into her and waited for her to float," with the result that the boat capsized and all but two were drowned; whether the boats on board the Roxburgh Castle were secured in the manner prescribed by the Board of Trade Regulations, under "The Merchant Shipping Life Saving Appliances Act, 1888," that

"All boats required by the rules to be placed under davits are to be kept fit and ready for use, and when they are swung inboard and resting on chocks, the chocks are to be so constructed that the boat can be at once swung outboard without requiring to be lifted by the tackles, i.e. it should not be necessary to do more than take the weight off the boat";

whether he will explain what is meant by the boat's weight being taken without hauling on the tackles; and whether it is the case that, owing to the ambiguity of this Regulation, the Board of Trade officers can do nothing to secure improvement in the method of lowering boats?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): My attention has been called to the statement referred to, which is to the effect stated in the question, but it is also clear from Whitelaw's deposition that the difficulty in getting the boat into the water did not arise from any deficiency in the means provided for that purpose, but from the boat being fouled by the wreckage caused by the collision. The Board of Trade have received no Report as to the manner in which the boats on board the Roxburgh Castle were secured; but I have no reason to doubt that it was in accordance with the Regulations. The statements in the question do not quite accurately represent the Regulations. There is no ambiguity in the Rule specially referred to, and the Board of Trade officers have no difficulty in securing improvements in the method of lowering boats, if in any case they think them necessary. An official inquiry has been ordered into the loss of the Roxburgh Castle.

PUBLIC ANALYSTS.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board why, in the cases of Dr. Adams, who was nominated Public Analyst for Bolton, and Mr. Charles Henry Southwell, pharmaceutical chemist, of Boston, nominated by the County Council as Public Analyst for the Holland Division of Lincolnshire, he at first refused to confirm the nominations, and afterwards confirmed them both?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): When the appointments of Dr. Adams and Mr. Southwell were reported to the Local Government Board by the Councils by whom they were appointed, the Board did not decline to confirm the appointments, but they considered that the information that had been furnished as to the qualification of those gentlemen was insufficient. When further information had been supplied the appointments were confirmed by the Board.

COLLIERY ACCIDENT AT APEDALE.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received any Report of the colliery accident on the 3rd April at Apedale, near Newcastle-under-Lyme, when ten lives were lost; whether the use of gunpowder was the cause of the explosion that occurred; and whether he will take steps to so amend the Coal Mines Regulation Act of 1887 as to prohibit absolutely the use of gunpowder in any coal mines, and to make the words of Sub-section (g) (2) of Rule 12, Section 49, the universal rule—

"Unless the explosive employed in firing the shot is so used with water or other contrivance as to prevent it from inflaming gas, or is of such a nature that it cannot inflame gas"?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have received a Report from the Inspector of the district, who informs me that there is every reason to believe that the cause of the explosion at Apedale, near Newcastle-under-Lyme, was a blown out shot of gelatine dynamite, and not of gunpowder. The circumstances of this explosion will be investigated, not only before the Coroner, but also by the Royal Commissioners on Explosions from Coal Dust in Mines, and I am informed that Professor Dixon has already visited the scene of the explosion.

EVIDENCE OF TEETOTALERS.

MR. M'LAGAN (Linlithgow): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to what occurred in a Small Debt Court, at Airdrie, on Friday, the 27th of March, when Sheriff Mair, the presiding Judge, is reported to have said, on a witness declaring himself to be a teetotaler, that he did not believe his evidence, because a teetotal witness always took an extreme view in cases where people who took drink were concerned; whether he has seen the letter of Sheriff Mair in defence of himself, in which he said—

"What I did say was that their evidence was not so reliable in a question as to drunkenness as that of persons not teetotalers, who did not have such extreme and even perverted views as to whether a man was drunk or sober"; and whether he is the same Sheriff Mair who, in the same Court in 1888, said to teetotal witnesses, giving evidence as to whether a man was drunk or not, "Go away, I do not believe you;" and, if so, how he proposes to deal with the matter?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): If the learned Sheriff had expressed a disbelief in the veracity of total abstinents as a class it is obvious that this would have been a wholly unwarrantable reflection on a most respectable and increasing section of the community. I am happy to find, however, that no such reflection was intended on either of the occasions referred to. In each case the question was whether a certain individual was or was not drunk; and in the Sheriff's view the abstaining witnesses being presumably less conversant with and more critical of the habits of non-abstainers, he rejected their evidence in favour of the evidence of other credible witnesses with whom they were in conflict. It is quite probable that in the cases in question this was a correct appreciation of the conflicting testimonies; and it is plain that the feeling which seems to have been caused by the learned Sheriff's observations would not have arisen if his view had been expressed in less absolute and pungent terms. I am happy to learn that the Sheriff has always held that in general there are no better witnesses than teetotalers; and I cannot doubt that he will see the expediency of letting this be manifest in any future judicial criticisms he may find it necessary to make on similar occasions.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): May I ask whether the Sheriffs of Scotland are capable of being judged in this House in regard to their conduct on the Bench except by an address to the Crown?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I do not understand the question to have been asked with the view of obtaining a judicial decision, but simply to call attention to statements which have become public in the ordinary way.

THE TRANSATLANTIC CATTLE TRADE.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he will lay upon the Table, as a Parliamentary Paper, the Report of and evidence given before the Commission appointed by the Canadian Government respecting the shipment of cattle; and when he expects the Departmental Committee now investigating the Transatlantic Cattle Trade to conclude its labours and Report?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The Departmental Committee upon the Transatlantic Cattle Trade are now considering their Report, and I hope that their labours will be completed and that their Report will be presented very shortly. It is proposed to print with the Appendix the Report of the Canadian inquiry into the Export Cattle Trade of the Dominion. The evidence is somewhat voluminous, and I doubt if it will be necessary or desirable to print it in addition to that given before the Departmental Committee, but I will consider that point.

CUSTOMS CLERKS.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the representations of the so-called redundant clerks in the Customs that they have suffered undue loss through the narrowing of the chances of promotion in recent years, and through the non-fulfilment of one of the stipulations in Treasury Letters dated 20th March and 12th May, 1880, have been favourably considered; and, if so, whether he can state why the scheme for amelioration has not yet been promulgated?

Mr. J. P. B. Robertson

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The decision of the Treasury will very probably be communicated shortly.

THE NEW FRENCH TARIFF.

SIR EDWARD BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is proposed in the new French Tariff to impose a duty upon fish of 10 francs per 100 kilogrammes instead of five as heretofore; whether, in view of the facts that the French covenanted in the Fisheries Convention of 1867 to admit British fish free of duty, and that Parliament, in pursuance of our reciprocal obligation, legislated in 1868 and admitted French caught fish free, the imposition of such duties in France is a violation of the Convention; and whether Her Majesty's Government have endeavoured to procure the fulfilment of the Convention by the French Government?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): It is proposed to increase the duty upon foreign fish imported into France. Article 31 of the Fisheries Convention of 1867 between Great Britain and France provides that—

“Fishing boats of either of the two countries shall be admitted to sell their fish in such ports of either country as may be designated for the purpose, on condition that they conform to the regulations mutually agreed upon.”

Full effect was given to the Convention by Great Britain by the Fisheries Act of 1868, and French fishermen sell their fish in British ports free of duty, but in France the Convention has never been put into force. The imposition of duties upon fish forwarded from England as goods is not a violation of the Treaty, but the chief subject of complaint is the failure to admit our fishermen to sell fish on any terms whatever in the ports of France, and generally the failure to give effect to the Treaty. Her Majesty's Government have repeatedly endeavoured to procure the fulfilment of the Convention in this and other particulars, but without success.

PARCEL POST TO SPAIN AND THE CANARY ISLANDS.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will endeavour to make arrangements with the Government of Spain for the institution of a Parcel Post between this country and the principal ports of the Canary Islands?

*MR. RAIKES: Correspondence has already taken place with the Spanish Government relative to the institution of a Parcel Post with the Canary Islands, but without success. The subject will not be lost sight of so far as my Department is concerned.

CROWN LANDS IN SURREY AND MIDDLESEX.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he will grant the House a Return of all the Crown Lands in the Counties of Surrey and Middlesex from which the public is excluded, giving in each case the acreage of these lands, and their distance from Charing Cross?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. PLUNKET, Dublin University): So far as any lands in the charge of the Office of Works are concerned the hon. Baronet will find all the information I can give him on the subject of his question included in Return No. 54, made to this House in the year 1888, under the heading "Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens." The distance from Charing Cross of the various lands is not specified in the Return, but the hon. Baronet will no doubt be able to make an approximate estimate on the point himself.

EXPLOSIONS IN SCOTCH IRONWORKS.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether any decision has yet been come to as to the institution of a special public inquiry into all or any of those fatal explosions in ironworks in the Glasgow district to which his attention was called by questions before Easter?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The information in the possession of the Secretary for Scotland tends to show that there was no connection between the three explosions referred to, except that they all occurred at ironworks in Scotland. The propriety of ordering a public inquiry is, therefore, a question for separate consideration in each case. (1) At Blochairn the explosion was a purely mechanical one, caused by heating a closed tube containing water. Steps have been taken to prevent such an occurrence in the future, and the Secretary for Scotland sees no advantage to be gained by further inquiry. (2) At Messrs. Dixons' Works, the explosion occurred in a section of the works which is registered under the Alkali Act. A Report has been received from the Chief Inspector of Alkali Works to the effect that the explosion took place in the pipes or vessels used for separating ammonia from furnace gases, but was the result of accidental ignition, and not of any chemical process connected with such separation of the ammonia. It is not satisfactorily explained how the ignition was caused, but the point is not one, in the opinion of the Secretary for Scotland, which a public inquiry would be likely to further elucidate. (3) The explosion at Gartsherrie Ironworks has, in common with the other two explosions, been the subject of inquiry through the Procurator Fiscal, but the decision of Crown counsel has not yet been announced, and the Secretary for Scotland will await that decision before pronouncing upon the expediency of holding a public inquiry.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the subject upon the Votes.

SPECIAL ENLISTMENT.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is a fact, as stated in the Times of 6th April, that a boy had enlisted and is serving in the Grenadier Guards at the age of 14½, and whether this case is an example of the "special enlistment" sanctioned by the War Office?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There is no trace of any enlistment in the Grenadier Guards at the age of 14½ years, except in the cases of boys avowedly enlisted as such.

CLERICAL ESTABLISHMENT OF PRISONS.

MR. LAWSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any storekeeper or clerk serving in Her Majesty's prisons was called upon by him, or the Committee of Inquiry appointed by him, to give evidence or to be examined upon the question of the pay and status of the clerical establishment in connection with those prisons?

MR. MATTHEWS: I referred the question of the pay and status of the prison clerks to a Committee of Accounts, which had originally fixed the establishment, pay, and duties of these officials, and not to the Committee of Inquiry appointed with reference to prison warders. The Committee of Accounts, consisting of a Director of Prisons, an Inspector of Prisons, and a Treasury officer, who had himself been in the Prison Service, had such familiarity with the subject that they did not think it necessary to call any clerk or storekeeper as witnesses.

POST OFFICES IN LICENSED HOUSES IN SCOTLAND.

MR. J. WILSON (Lanark, Govan): I beg to ask the Postmaster General when the Return asked for, of the number of Post Offices in Scotland that are in licensed premises, will be laid upon the Table of the House?

*MR. RAIKES: The Return to which the hon. Member refers has been forwarded to the Secretary for Scotland to-day, and will no doubt be laid upon the Table without delay.

POLLOKSHIELDS POST OFFICE.

MR. J. WILSON (Lanark, Govan): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the postmaster at Pollokshields has resigned his appointment; and whether, considering the hostile public feeling to the late appointment being in licensed premises, he will avoid this in filling up the vacancy?

*MR. RAIKES: I am aware that the Receiver at Pollokshields has resigned his appointment. As I informed the hon. Member in reply to his question on the 29th January last, I have made it a practice for some years past not to appoint licensed grocers in Scotland to such situations, except in cases where the exigencies of the Service render a departure from that practice necessary; and I shall be glad if I find myself able to meet the wishes of the locality in the present instance. The selection of a person to fill this office will, as the hon. Member is probably aware, be made by the Lords of the Treasury.

VOLUNTEER TRAVELLING EXPENSES.

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether complaints have reached him that the allowance now granted in aid of the expenses of travelling for attendance at inspection and battalion drills of Volunteer Regiments whose companies are widely apart is quite inadequate to defray the actual cost of travelling to united drills for the purpose of efficiency before inspection; and whether, under the circumstances, he is prepared to recommend the payment of a larger allowance to Volunteer Regiments so situated; and as it is understood that country regiments are encouraged and expected to join brigade camps, and by doing so are debarred from receiving allowances for travelling to inspection and battalion drills, will he consider the case of those regiments which are willing to join experimentally a brigade camp, but before it takes place will have incurred the expenses for the year of travelling inspection and battalion drills?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: A change in the system of travelling allowance to Volunteers for attendance at united drills has been made, which is to the advantage of corps widely distributed, though those whose companies are only just outside the five mile radius may possibly receive less. It is not contemplated that country regiments which receive camp allowance for attending brigade camps should also earn the allowance for attending united drills, as all the instruction obtainable at the latter would be included in that given at the brigade camp. Provision is, however, made in certain cases for men who are unable to accompany their corps into brigade camp.

SHEERNESS DOCKYARD.

MR. HERBERT KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I had intended to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether there are men at Sheerness Dockyard on the books as smiths, who are really doing fitters' work, and, if so, whether they should be classed as fitters; and whether arrangements can be entered into for the forgings of engines which are fitted at Sheerness being made in that Dockyard, instead of, as at present, in private yards? At the request of the noble Lord, I beg to postpone the question until Thursday.

RAIDS BY LEWIS COTTARS.

DR. CAMERON: I have put a question on the Paper—to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the fact that at the trial of 12 Lewis cottars, under the Trespass Act, for raids upon Orinsay and Stimrenay, the prosecuting Procurator Fiscal was Mr. John Ross, the private agent of Lady Matheson, proprietrix, and Mr. J. Martin, tenant, of the localities in respect of which the trespass was charged; and whether, considering the repeated declarations of Scottish Law Officers in this House as to the undesirability of Public Prosecutors, where it can be avoided, being allowed to engage in private practice, he will direct regular Procurator Fiscal Mr. William Ross to act personally in any other cases arising out of the recent raids? At the request of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to postpone the question until to-morrow.

WRECK OF THE ARISTIDES.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been directed to the wreck of the ship Aristides at Rattray Head on the night of the 5th April, in which seven out of eight men on board were drowned; whether this calamity was in great measure caused by the want of a light on Rattray Head; and whether he will now take steps to have a lighthouse erected there at the earliest moment?

*MR. M. HICKS BEACH: The information at present in the possession of the Board of Trade on the subject of the wreck of the Aristides on the morning of the 6th instant, so far as it goes, appears to show that this wreck was not caused by the want of a light on Rattray Head. The Board of Trade have asked the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses to supply detailed estimates and plans of the lighthouse, the establishment of which, as I stated on the 23rd of last month in reply to a question of the hon. Member, has been sanctioned. In the event of these estimates being satisfactory, the work will probably be commenced by the Northern Lighthouse Board during the present financial year.

CROFTER EMIGRATION.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the sum voted by Parliament for crofter emigration has been exceeded; and whether he is aware if it is a fact that the company with which the Government arranged their scheme have recently sent out instructions to proceed against certain crofter settlers sent out previously to recover arrears of interest and loans?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: No, Sir; the sum voted by Parliament for crofter emigration has not been exceeded. The Secretary for Scotland informs me that the proceedings referred to in the second part of the question were not taken against any of the crofters sent out under the Government scheme; he understands that proceedings have been taken against some other settlers emigrated through the agency of the Canadian North-West Land Company; but of this, of course, he has no official information.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements are made to provide the Metropolitan Police with refreshments when on night duty; and whether it could be arranged to send round from the divisional headquarters supplies of hot tea, coffee, or cocoa?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that the practice is that night-duty men have a tin bottle containing tea or coffee, and heated with a small lamp which forms part of the apparatus. This arrangement was recommended by a Board of Superintendents in 1887 as the best practicable under all the circumstances. It would not be practicable to supply refreshments from head-quarters. The hon. Member may feel certain that the comforts and welfare of the men are carefully attended to by their superior officers.

INFLAMMABLE LIQUIDS BILL.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Inflammable Liquids Bill during the present Session?

MR. MATTHEWS: I informed the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire on March 24th that the Government did not intend to proceed with this Bill this Session, but that I proposed to refer the subject to a Select Committee, whose Report would precede legislation.

THE YEOMANRY CAVALRY.

MR. LAWSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can make any such statement as he promised last year as to the position of the Yeomanry Cavalry in case of mobilisation?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir; I am sorry to say that I can make no such statement at present. The position of the Yeomanry in such a case is so closely connected with that of the Regular Cavalry that it has not yet been found possible to lay down a definite scheme.

THE SCOTCH ROADS AND BRIDGES ACT.

MR. ROBERT REID (Dumfries, &c.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether any power is given to the burgh Local Authorities in the Roads and Bridges Act to borrow money for the making and reforming of footpaths within burghs; and whether the Commissioners of Police have power under the Rutherford Act, 13 & 14 Vic., c. 33, to borrow money for those purposes and to assess for the same?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The first part of the question must, I think, be answered in the negative. On the other hand, comparing the 210th and the 340th sections of the Act, 13 & 14 Vic., c. 33, the power in question seems to exist under that Statute.

THE CYPRUS MAILS.

MR. THORBURN (Peebles and Selkirk): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the mail which left London on 13th February last was not delivered in Cyprus until 18th March; whether it was sent from Beyrout to Smyrna, and from Smyrna to Cyprus; whether the same route has been pursued with the mail which left London on 27th February; and whether, looking to the great inconvenience such delay occasions to residents in Cyprus, it is possible to make arrangements for a weekly mail from Egypt to Cyprus?

MR. RAIKES: Complaints have already reached me on this subject, and from inquiries made it would seem that the miscarriage of this mail was due to some mistake connected with the French service, to which it was transferred at Alexandria. I have always considered it extremely desirable to establish a British mail service to Cyprus; but the prospective expense has hitherto deterred Her Majesty's Government from adopting this course.

ANGLO-AUSTRIAN PRINTING AND PUBLISHING UNION.

MR. PITT-LEWIS (Devon, Barnstaple): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether the attention of the Public Prosecutor has been directed to the Report of the Committee of Shareholders, appointed on the 2nd March, 1891, to investigate the affairs of the Anglo-Austrian Printing and Publishing Union (Limited), from which it appears that this company asked the public for a capital of £750,000, but that, only about £99,280 having been applied for, the Directors nevertheless proceeded to allotment on this latter amount; that, although only £99,280 had been applied for, a cheque for £75,000 was immediately afterwards paid to one Mr. Horatio Bottomley for businesses agreed by him to be conveyed to the company, before he had disclosed any title to the same, and that he never, in fact, became entitled to convey to the company at all many of these; that the company never actually carried on any business at all, but yet paid to the same Mr. Bottomley further sums amounting to about £13,500 for (as he alleged) "working expenses;" that £1,116 was paid to the Directors as fees; that a dividend of 15 per cent. on the ordinary shares, and 8 per cent. on the preference shares, was declared at a Board meeting held on the 25th September, 1890; whether, from the Public Prosecutor having made any inquiry into the accuracy of the above statements, or for any other reason, he can say if they are correct; and, if so, whether, having regard to the fact that the company, having never transacted any business, could not possibly have earned a dividend, but must have paid such dividends as it declared out of capital, it is proposed to take any, and, if so, what, proceedings against anyone connected with the promotion of the company; whether he is aware that a very similar state of affairs exists in the case of the Hansard Publishing Union (Limited), and whether any, and what, steps are contemplated against the promoters or Directors of that Union; and whether a voluntary or other liquidator has been appointed to wind up either of the companies referred to above; what is the name of such liquidator; and is he an independent person?

*MR. COBB: Before the hon. and learned Gentleman answers the question, may I ask him whether the attention of the Public Prosecutor has been called to the connection of the late Lord Mayor and his brother with this company; and, further, if his attention has been called to the recent proceedings in the matter of the Direct Meat Supply Company before Mr. Justice Stirling?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I know nothing of the late Lord Mayor; but if the hon. Member will put a question down I will endeavour to answer it. In reply to the question on the Paper, I have to state that the attention of the Public Prosecutor has not been called to the cases referred to, nor is he able to say whether or not the statements of the hon. Member are correct in any particular. He is not at present prepared to take any proceedings in the matter. I would remind the hon. Member that under the Companies Acts, and particularly the Act of last Session, there are ample powers provided for the thorough investigation of matters such as those which he describes, and that it is not the duty of the Public Prosecutor to undertake such inquiries. The duties of the Public Prosecutor are regulated by statute and the rules made thereunder. I would refer the hon. Member to the Return presented to Parliament this year, which was in the hands of hon. Members on March 12.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask whether Mr. Horatio Bottomley, like Mr. Harry Marks, is a Conservative candidate for Parliamentary honours?

[No answer was returned.]

THE CROFTER DISTRICTS IN THE WEST OF SCOTLAND.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is now in a position to make any statement as to the intentions of the Government with regard to public works in the crofter districts of the West of Scotland?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The following statement shows what has already been done with regard to the recommendations of the Commission:—I. Steamer Communication.—Arrangements have been made for the following new or improved services from May 1 next:—(a) A larger and more powerful vessel will be placed on the Strome Ferry and Stornoway route, which is expected to perform the voyage regularly in six hours. (b) A daily service from Oban to Castle Bay and Lochmaddy, calling at certain ports in Skye and elsewhere. (c) A daily service round the Island of Mull, calling at Coll and Tiree four days a week. (d) A service from Portree to Dunvegan and Lochmaddy three times a week, calling at intermediate places and returning on alternate days. These services will involve an expenditure of nearly £7,000 a year in addition to the existing payments for the conveyance of mails. Negotiations are also in progress with a view to obtaining an improvement of the service between Shetland and the mainland. II. Piers and Harbours.—(a) A grant of £16,500 to the Harbour Trustees at Ness, in the Island of Lewis, has been sanctioned for the completion of the existing works and the construction of a new breakwater which will afford additional protection to the entrance of the harbour. (b) A grant of £2,000 has been sanctioned for the construction of a pier at Carloway, in the same island, provided that an efficient Local Authority can be constituted which will undertake to construct and maintain the work. (c) A grant of £8,000 towards the cost of erecting a pier and breakwater at Gott Bay, in the Island of Tiree. The total cost is estimated at £11,500, and the grant is to be made subject to the condition that some Local Authority or other responsible party will construct and maintain the works and provide the remainder of the cost.

(d) Subject to similar conditions, grants have also been sanctioned for the following purposes:—£3,500 for a pier and breakwater at Talmin Bay, on the coast of Sutherland, estimated to cost £5,000; £4,000 for a steamboat pier at Uig, in Skye, estimated to cost £5,500; £3,000 for a boat harbour at Skerry, on the coast of Sutherland; £3,000 for a boat harbour at Portskerra, in the same neighbourhood; £3,000 for the improvement and extension of the existing works at Scrabster. With regard to the smaller piers and boatslips referred to in the Report of the Commission, the Government are prepared to provide the requisite funds within the limit and on the terms recommended by the Commission; and legislation is being prepared to empower the several County Councils or other Local Authorities to undertake the necessary liabilities. The Government have also under consideration the question of a grant to afford relief to the Trustees of Lerwick Harbour, in Shetland, and for the construction of piers in Orkney.

III. Lighthouses and Beacons.—Grants amounting in all to £4,500 have been sanctioned for the erection of lighthouses and beacons, provided that arrangements can be made locally for their maintenance when erected.

IV. Telegraphic Extension.—The Postmaster General has been authorised to erect telegraph lines from Stornoway to Carloway, in the Island of Lewis; from Durness to Scourie, and from Lochinver to Drumbeg, on the mainland; from Dunvegan to Glendale and Waternish, and from Isle Ornsay to Ardsay, in Skye; to Westray, in Orkney; and to Whalsay and Bressay, in Shetland. The cost of the erection of these extensions will be about £6,600, and the work will be proceeded with at once.

V. Roads and Railways.—A grant of £15,000 has been sanctioned for the improvement of the existing road between Stornoway and Carloway, so as to enable fish and other traffic to pass over it with greater despatch. When this improvement is completed the road will have no gradient steeper than 1 in 30. Negotiations for the construction, maintenance, and working of one or other of the railways mentioned in the first Report have been for some time in progress, but are not yet complete; but I anticipate I shall be in a position to inform the House of the decision of the Government on Thursday.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): May I ask from what source these large sums are to come, and whether, as money seems to be plentiful, the right hon. Gentleman will consider the propriety of giving a little grant to the fishermen in Cornwall, who have suffered considerably during the winter?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Member will see that I have not stated to the House any proposals for assisting fishermen beyond providing piers and harbours.

MR. CONYBEARE: We have been asking for the provision of harbours of refuge for the safety and profit of fishermen on the coast and the crews of vessels coming up Channel for a great many years. The right hon. Member for Birmingham knows that some years ago a deputation waited upon him upon this subject.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Will there be an Estimate laid upon the Table of this House in the course of the year?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The Supplementary Estimates relating to the matter will be submitted to Parliament this Session.

MR. A. SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): Will Sutherland be in the same condition in regard to grants as other parts of Scotland? I understand that two localities in the Highlands have obtained grants on the condition that the money advanced shall be in the proportion of two-thirds of the guarantee, whereas other localities are only to have grants in the proportion of one-third of the guarantee.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot enter into a discussion in regard to other places than those which I have already mentioned, but it is quite within the power of the hon. Gentleman to raise any discussion he may desire. As regards Sutherland, I have no doubt that any assistance actually required will be forthcoming.

DR. CLARK: Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to bring in any Supplementary Estimates this Session? There can be very little doubt that the money has been hitherto voted foolishly and thrown away.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: As I have said, an Estimate will be presented to Parliament in the course of the present year.

THE IRISH FISHERY COMMISSIONERS.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the prosecution of Mr. Charles Webb, mill-owner, of Randalstown, was directed by the Inspectors of Fisheries or by the local Board of Conservators; and, if by the latter, under what authority; whether he is aware that Edward Moles, the principal witness for the prosecution, swore that—"He was not particularly acquainted with the habits and customs of salmon, or the working of turbine wheels;"

whether he is aware that Mr. Webb applied to the Inspectors of Fisheries for an exemption under the provisions of the Fisheries Acts, and was informed that the matter would be considered; whether any reply has yet been made to Mr. Webb; whether his attention has been directed to the evidence as to the prejudicial effect the lattices required to be put up would have upon the working of these mills; and whether the recent prosecutions of millowners in County Antrim were undertaken with the cognisance and approval of the Inspectors of Fisheries?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries report that the prosecution mentioned by my hon. Friend was undertaken by the Coleraine Board of Conservators under the authority of the statute. The Inspectors are not aware of the general evidence given in the case. Mr. Moles is not under the control of their department. Mr. Webb did apply last month to the Inspectors for exemption, saying that he would furnish grounds for demanding it, but up to the present he has not done so. The Inspectors have no control over the initiation of prosecutions of this kind; but they deem it right to observe that they consider no exemptions from the necessity to erect gratings should be given where no injury to the water power of mills would occur if the gratings were kept clear of weeds and debris.

MR. MACARTNEY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there has been a meeting of the millowners of the County Antrim; that every mill is worked by water power, and that they defend the action of Mr. Webb?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I am not aware.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Messrs. Hill, Woollen Manufacturers, and Messrs. Shackleton, Flour Millers, of Lucan, County of Dublin, have been served with notices by the Fishery Commissioners to erect fine wire screens in the fall of their water power; whether he is aware that the wages of several hundred hands depend upon such firms working full power; and whether he will call the attention of the Fishery Commissioners to the general injury which the carrying out of this order would inflict on the above and other industries in Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries report that the mills referred to are worked by turbines; that the 30th section of the Act 26 & 27 Vic., c. 114, requires that during the descent of the salmon, or young of salmon, to the sea, a grating or other efficient means to prevent such salmon or young of salmon passing to the machine shall be provided; and they point out that the requirement being limited to such descent, it is only for a short time in the spring of each year. The Inspectors further report that wire lattices have been erected in many places, which do not injure the water power when properly looked after.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Act under which these wire screens are required to be erected was passed many years ago, and that it has not been complied with or enforced?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I was not aware that the Act has never been enforced.

LAND PURCHASE IN IRELAND.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any statistics have been collected of the number and acreage of holdings in each county in Ireland which have been let to be used wholly or mainly for pasture, or which have been so used for the last 20 years, and of holdings in each county in Ireland on which the tenant does not actually reside; whether such statistics will be presented to the House before Clause 6 of the Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill is reached in Committee; and whether, before Clause 6 is reached, statistics and other information will be presented to the House showing the number of applications under the Land Law (Ireland) Acts which have been refused by the Land Commission on the ground that the tenancies were excepted by s. 58, ss. 3 and 4, of "The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881?"

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There are no particulars in my possession of sufficient authority to warrant my laying them on the Table of the House in the shape of a Return. There has been a collection of figures dealing with Ireland as a whole, but I doubt whether they can be relied upon for each county. If the hon. Gentleman will put down a question for a later date, I will endeavour to give an answer as to the whole of Ireland. With regard to the last paragraph of the question, I am informed by the Land Commissioners that it will be impossible to give a Return in the form asked for.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Do the figures make any distinction between fields in pasture and for grazing purposes?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; the figures I have got do not draw a distinction. I have no reliable figures on that subject.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will they include the dairy farms of Munster?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Member had better wait until the figures are before him.

In reply to MR. M. HEALY (Cork),

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: No detailed information of the kind desired has ever been attempted to be given. All that has hitherto been done has been to give a general Return.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Land Commission, in ordering the redemption of head rents under Section 16 of "The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887," have adopted any uniform scale of price; and what the average number of years purchase has been in the case of any head rents ordered to be redeemed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Irish Land Commissioners report that under Sub-section 3 of Section 16 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, the redemption price of head rents is fixed as by agreement or by arbitration, and that, therefore, no uniform scale of price exists. The Commissioners are unable to give the average rate at which such redemptions have been made; but they state that the prices appear to have ranged between 18 and 28 years' purchase of the rent.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether tenants purchasing their holdings under the Land Purchase (Ireland) Acts become owners within the meaning of Schedule A of the Income Tax Act; whether any allowance is made under that Schedule for the annual instalment payable by the purchasing tenant; and whether the Government intends to propose any alteration in the law in these respects?

MR. JACKSON: The answer to the first question is, Yes. In regard to the second, it is immaterial whether the purchasing tenant pays the whole price at once or by instalments. No allowance is made. The same practice is adopted throughout the United Kingdom.

MR. CHANCE: Is the effect of purchasing to subject the purchasers to the payment of additional taxation?

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Gentleman had better give notice of that question.

THE ASHBOURNE ACT.

MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will tell the House what amount, up to the most recent practicable date, of the total sum hitherto advanced or agreed to be advanced, for the purchase of Irish holdings under the Ashbourne Act, has been applied to the purchase of holdings of £30 a year rental and under, and what amount to the purchase of holdings over £30; and if he will give the House the same information as to holdings under and over £50 per annum?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Irish Land Commissioners report that it would take a considerable time to classify the cases (numbering over 15,000) in which advances have been made so as to give the particulars indicated in the question. The Commissioners, however, refer to page 10 of their last Annual Report (House of Commons Paper, No. 6,233 of 1890), in which the advances are classified according to amounts, and which might possibly be of assistance to the hon. Member in respect of the object he has in view.

POSTAL SERVICE IN WEST CORK.

MR. MORROGH (Cork, S.E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he has received a resolution, which was passed at the last monthly meeting of the Skibbereen Town Commissioners, setting forth the defective postal day service to Skibbereen and other towns in West Cork; and what attention he is prepared to give the matter?

*MR. RAIKES: The resolution has only reached me to-day. It shall receive careful consideration.

MILITARY CHAPLAINS.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been directed to a resolution, supported by His Grace Lord Plunket, Protestant Archbishop of Dublin, and passed unanimously on Wednesday last by the General Synod of the Church of Ireland, demanding from the Government a general recognition of the claims of the incumbents of parishes in which military barracks are situate to act as chaplains of the troops in their several parishes; and whether, having regard to the fact that the privilege now claimed by the Protestant clergy has been accorded to the Roman Catholic clergy, he will accede to the request of the Synod of the Church of Ireland?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There are only three stations in Ireland at which the local clergy do not officiate to the troops. At those places large bodies of men are concentrated, quite sufficient in themselves to constitute a cure of souls, and it is therefore preferable that a commissioned chaplain under direct military control should look after the spiritual needs of each place.

LAND COMMISSIONERS.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when the Return recently ordered by the House relative to the appointment of Land Commissioners will be furnished to Members?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Return referred to is being this day laid upon the Table.

TELEPHONIC COMMUNICATION BETWEEN DUBLIN AND BELFAST.

MR. THOMAS DICKSON (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he is aware that Dublin and Belfast are not connected by telephone; and if he will take into consideration the urgent necessity which exists for establishing telephonic communication between these two important cities?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that no public demand for a telephone service between Dublin and Belfast has hitherto been communicated to the Post Office; but if the hon. Member has reason to think that there is such a demand and will communicate with me, I shall be glad to give the matter my best consideration.

ILLITERATE VOTERS IN SLIGO.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can ascertain, for the information of the House, what was the number of votes that were polled by illiterate voters in the recent election in North Sligo?

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can inform the House how many voters at the recent election of a Member of Parliament for North Sligo took advantage of the provisions of the law relating to illiterates; whether the number of such voters is larger than at the last contested election in 1885; whether he has any reason to believe that many electors in Ireland declare themselves to be illiterates who are, in point of fact, able to read the ballot paper and to mark it for themselves; if so, whether such action on their part is a contravention of the spirit of the Ballot Act; and whether, in that case, any steps can be taken to prevent hereafter a misuse of the privileges conferred by that Act?

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): Before the right hon. Gentleman replies, I wish to ask a further question of which I have given private notice. I wish to know whether, at the said North Sligo election, it is the fact that owing to the large number of illiterate voters who presented themselves at one time the forms for illiterate voters ran short, and that the polling booth had to be closed for a considerable time; whether some who presented themselves as illiterate voters had no right to do so; and whether frequent discussions did not arise between the agents of the two candidates which removed all the secrecy of the ballot as to certain voters?

MR. SPEAKER: I think the question of the hon. Member ought to have been submitted to me, or put upon the Paper in the ordinary way.

MR. WEBSTER: I beg to give notice that I will put it to-morrow.

MR. KNOX: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the large majority of the votes of illiterates were given in favour of Alderman Dillon, the candidate supported by the Tory Party?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In answer to the questions on the Paper I have to say that according to the documents returned by the Sheriff at the proper office, the number of persons who voted as illiterates at the recent election at Sligo was 1,366 out of a total of 5,754. The corresponding figures for 1885 were 1,070 and 5,988, so that the proportion in 1891 was both absolutely and relatively higher than five years ago. This does not agree with the unofficial statement which appeared in the Press, and I am making further inquiries into the matter. I have no material for coming to a decisive conclusion as to whether fraud was practised by any of the electors or not. According to the Census of 1881, the percentage of illiterates to the whole male population is somewhat larger than the proportion of persons who voted as illiterates is to the total number of persons who polled. These are the facts. Arguments on both sides can be deduced from them, and I cannot offer to the House anything in the nature of a conclusive verdict.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think it will be useful to know whether during the last decade the proportion of illiterates has increased or diminished in the various polling districts of the county.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I presume the information can be obtained if the hon. Member desires to have it, and will put a question down upon the Paper. I have not got the information with me. Seeing the additional educational advantages now provided, the proportion of illiterate voters ought to have diminished.

DUBLIN SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to the case of Mr. Mullen, technical assistant in the Science and Art Department, Dublin, who was promoted (and officially informed of his promotion) by the Lord President of the Council to a new post of assistant, created in the Department of Science and Art in consequence of a Treasury Commission and with the sanction of the Treasury, under the provisions of Clause 7 of Order in Council 4th June 1870, if he can explain why the Civil Service Commission and the Treasury subsequently withdrew their sanction to the application of the said clause on the ground that, as Mr. Mullen was within the limit of age, 30 years, for public competition, he must take part in the competition for the assistantship, Mr. Mullen being over 29 years of age, a Master of Arts of Trinity College, and having filled for seven years his former post to the satisfaction of the Department, and why Mr. Mullen was not apprised of the fact that he must compete for the post to which he had been appointed till the examination had been held; and whether, having regard to the hardship of the case, the Treasury will be able to modify their decision and to lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence relating thereto?

MR. JACKSON: I will make inquiry into the matter. The responsibility rests with the Civil Service Commission.

ATTACK ON A PRISON WARDER.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that a warder named Fitzmaurice, in the Mountjoy Convict Prison, Dublin, was, on the 8th April instant, murderously attacked with a heavy iron bar by a convict of whom he was in charge, and that his life was saved by a prisoner named Daly; and whether Daly's action will be rewarded in any way?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that it is a fact the warder mentioned was attacked, but it does not appear that the prisoner Daly rendered assistance.

CORK COURT HOUSE.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether an Act of Parliament will be necessary to enable the Cork Court House to be rebuilt without delay; and what steps the Government propose to take in the matter?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): The subject is under the consideration of the Government at the present moment.

MR. M. HEALY: When will the right hon. and learned Gentleman be able to give more definite information?

MR. MADDEN: As early as possible. I only received a communication upon the subject yesterday.

RELIEF WORKS IN WEST DONEGAL.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what steps, if any, have been taken to start relief works in Ranafast, Ranomona, and Loughnanoran, in West Donegal; whether he is aware that there is much fever in these districts; and what means of subsistence there are for the 783 inhabitants from this time till June, and for the women and children from June till the return of the wage-earners from the Scotch harvest in August?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR was understood to request that the question should be deferred.

THE LABOUR COMMISSION.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the very widespread public interest taken in the questions referred to the Royal Commission on Labour, the desirability of forming and educating public opinion upon them, and the impossibility of the evidence becoming generally useful unless published de die in diem as the Commission proceeds, he will advise Her Majesty to command that the sittings of the Commission be held with open doors?

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, having regard to the evidence given before the Lords' Committee last year, as to the extent of the evil of sweating in the cabinet making, upholstering, clothing, and boot and shoe trades, and the fact that there are 10 employers of labour on the Commission to seven Representatives of labour, he will advise Her Majesty to consider the advisability of adding additional names representing the industries concerned?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Commission was constituted so as to secure, in the judgment of Her Majesty's Government, a full and complete consideration of all the important questions to be submitted to them. It is not contemplated that every trade and every grievance shall be represented, and it must be obvious to the hon. Member and to the House that if the Commission were largely increased, as it would have to be if the suggestion of the hon. Member were adopted, the probability of a satisfactory result from its deliberations would be considerably diminished. As to the question of the hon. Member for Camborne (Mr. Conybeare), I have to say that whether the Commission will sit with open doors or not depends entirely upon the discretion of the Commissioners themselves. The Government will not interfere, and it has not interfered with the full discretion of the Commissioners in such matters.

THE BUDGET.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can now state on what day the Budget will be taken; and will he state when the Papers relating to the extraordinary expenditure under the Naval Defence Act, and the manner in which that expenditure has been made, will be presented?

MR. GOSCHEN: The Budget statement will be made on Thursday week. With regard to the second question of the right hon. Gentleman, the figures which he desires are already in type; and I hope they will be in his hands in a very few days—certainly in good time for the Budget.

SCOTTISH FORESHORE RIGHTS.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that Messrs. Alexander Wood, James Flett & Sons, Murdo Morrison, and others, fish curers, who hold portions of waste and uncultivated land within 100 yards of high-water mark on the foreshore at Castlebay, Island of Barra, for which they pay a yearly station rent, and on which they have built sea walls, curing stations, and landing stages at great cost, have received from the agent of the landowner notice to quit on 1st May next, no compensation being offered for the disturbance or for the large outlay which they have incurred; whether he is aware that the notices of removal were not served till after these fish curers had all engaged boats and crews for the forthcoming fishing season at bounties of £50 per boat, the result being a large additional loss to them if they have to quit their stations; whether he is aware that the reason for serving the notices is that these persons, while willing to pay the rent of their stations, have refused to collect from the fishermen certain fees charged by the landowner for net drying done by the fishermen upon the foreshore, which fees they have discovered constitute an illegal demand on the fishermen, which, if made, would subject them to heavy penalties; and whether it is in accordance with the law of Scotland that a landowner can expel these persons from their stations at two months' notice under the circumstances stated without any compensation for disturbance and for the loss of all their outlay?

MR. J. P. P. ROBERTSON: I have received a mass of information about this question, both as it originally stood on the Notice Paper and as it stands at present, with the result that almost every single statement or suggestion is said to be more or less inaccurate. I am the more inclined to believe that these denials are well founded, because several of the persons named by the hon. Member disclaim all sanction of or sympathy with those statements. But the whole subject matter of the question is purely one of private right and contract, and it does not fall within my duty to express any opinion on the subject.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES IN FRANCE AND BELGIUM.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if any Reports have been received from Paris and Brussels as to the State contribution and guarantee towards voluntary provision for old age among the people through Friendly Societies (Sociétés de Secours Mutuels); and, in the contrary case, if he will cause inquiry to be made on the subject?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: We have received no Reports, but we have a copy of the Report made by the Select Committee of the French Senate to that body upon the Bill in regard to Friendly Societies, which I shall be happy to show my hon. Friend. Reports will be asked for at Paris and at Brussels as to the law and practice in France and Belgium, if my hon. Friend will move for them.

THE EMBASSY AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

MR. W. LOWTHER (Westmoreland, Appleby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true that Mr. Curwen, honorary attaché to Her Majesty's Embassy at Constantinople, had lately died there of typhoid fever; whether there have of late years been frequent cases of typhoid fever at the Embassy at Constantinople; and whether he contemplates having a Report made upon the sanitary condition of the Embassy?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The lamented death of Mr. Curwen was due to typhus fever, not typhoid. As regards the sanitary condition of the Embassy, the system was reconstructed in 1878, and all discharge-pipes removed to the exterior of the building. In 1883 a thorough and independent examination was made, with the result that the efficiency of the sanitary arrangements was found to be thoroughly satisfactory. Since then further improvements in ventilation have been introduced. Though there is, therefore, no reason to attribute Mr. Curwen's death to any defect in those arrangements, instructions will be given to have the pipes and drains tested.

LORD STALBRIDGE AND THE COMMITTEE OF SELECTION.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the right hon. Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford a question of which I have given him private notice. It relates to a published correspondence which has been read by many hon. Members with surprise and great dissatisfaction. It was published in the Times of Friday last, and the correspondence has passed between Lord Stalbridge, Chairman of the London and North-Western Railway Company, and the right hon. Baronet. A Joint Committee of both Houses was constituted for the purpose of considering the question of railway rates, and five Members of the House were nominated by the Committee of Selection. I have no complaint to make of the right hon. Baronet's action or of that of the Committee of Selection. The right hon. Baronet commands the respect of all Parties in the House. Judging from the facts, I should say that both the right hon. Baronet and the Committee of Selection have in this matter rightly vindicated the liberties of Members of the House of Commons. But an attempt has been made to influence the Committee of Selection, and I wish to ask the right hon. Baronet whether it is admissible, or in accordance with usage, for a Member of the House of Peers to interfere in the internal economy of the House of Commons in regard to the functions of the Committee of Selection. I should like to know also whether it is admissible, or in accordance with usage, that a gentleman in the position of Lord Stalbridge, a promoter of a Bill to be considered by a Committee, should endeavour to influence the Chairman of the Committee of Selection. In his letters Lord Stalbridge objects to three hon. Members who were nominated to serve on the Committee of the right hon. Baronet—Mr. Colman, Mr. Hunter, and

Mr. T. Dickson, who were nominated to serve in place of Mr. Colman, who voluntarily withdrew. But from a passage in one of the letters the public would infer that Mr. Colman had been discharged from attendance in consequence of the letter of Lord Stalbridge. I wish to ask whether it is not the case that Mr. Colman first learned that he had to serve on the Committee late on the night of Tuesday, March 17; that on the next day Mr. Colman communicated with the right hon. Baronet in the House and with the Committee Clerk, informing them that he was a Petitioner against one of the Bills, and therefore it was impossible for him to serve; and that the matter having been considered by the Committee of Selection, Mr. Colman was discharged? Lord Stalbridge objected to Mr. Hunter as a Member of the Committee on the ground that he had taken the side of the traders in a book which he had published. It is absurd to suppose that the action of any man, either as an author, practitioner at the Bar, or Member of this House, should debar him from serving on a Committee; and I ask the right hon. Baronet to state that it is not true that Mr. Hunter has given advice to any of the Petitioners against the Bill. No statement has been made by the Committee of Selection with reference to Mr. Dickson, but Lord Stalbridge said the hon. Member was practically in the same position as Mr. Colman. I ask the right hon. Baronet to say that there is no truth in the suggestion. I ask whether the Committee of Selection has not determined to maintain Mr. Dickson in his position, and whether there is anything to prevent the hon. Member from discharging his duties in a disinterested and impartial spirit?

*SIR J. MOWBRAY (Oxford University): There are so many questions involved in the statement made that it is somewhat difficult, not having a paper to refer to, and having only had private notice that a question not specified would be put to me, to follow them. But I will endeavour to answer the questions as fully as I can. It seems to me that the first two questions involve considerations of Constitutional Law. As to the suggested action of Lord Stalbridge, I should say that it would be most unconstitutional if anything of the kind occurred, but I apprehend that Lord Stalbridge acted, not as Member of the other House, but as Chairman of the London and North Western Railway Company. I do not think, therefore, that the question can be magnified into one of a Breach of Privilege between the two Houses. I am glad that the hon. Member has afforded me an opportunity of stating in the House the circumstances that guided the Committee of Selection in the constitution of this Committee. On the 17th of March a Committee, consisting of five Members, was formed. One of the Members was the right hon. Member for the Epping Division of Essex. The following morning a letter was received from the right hon. Gentleman saying that he would be unable to serve on the Committee owing to the state of his health. Another of the Members, the hon. Member for Norwich sent a letter stating that he was appearing as a Petitioner against one of the Bills, and he was therefore discharged from the Committee. The action the Committee of Selection thus took was quite independent of Lord Stalbridge's letter. The hon. Member for Norwich spoke to me in the House next day after receiving notice of his nomination. I told the hon. Member then that a mistake had been made, and that the Committee of Selection had not known the hon. Member's position. The moment it was known, however, the hon. Member was discharged, and this took place before the receipt of Lord Stalbridge's letter. The hon. Member for Norwich was replaced by the hon. Member for the St. Stephen's Green Division of Dublin, who has sat for 17 years in this House, and is well known and much respected. The only possible objection in his case is that on some occasion he gave evidence before the Railway Commission that railway rates in Ireland ought to be assimilated to railway rates in England. We thus filled up those two places the hon. Member for Norwich being replaced by the hon. Member for the St. Stephen's Green Division of Dublin. The Committee of Selection thought it rather a strong measure that the Chairman of the London and North-Western Company should address a remonstrance to us in respect to our action in this House. We have discharged our duties to the best of our ability; at the same time, if there were substantial reasons for questioning what we have done, we could not object to our attention being called to the facts. The Committee of Selection knew, before they adopted the name of Mr. Hunter, that he had been connected with the Board of Trade and with railway matters; but, personally, I took special means to inform myself that Mr. Hunter's connection with the Board of Trade had ceased. The hon. Member had practised as Counsel before the Railway Commission, and it does not appear that that fact should necessarily constitute a disqualification to serve on the Railway Rates Committee. The hon. Member has also published a book on railways which is, I am told, an ordinary text-book, and not containing any special views. Mr. Hunter has not sent me a copy of that book; but the Committee of Selection have had sent to them a good many books and pamphlets which it has been impossible for them to read. Indeed, it would be a very serious thing if it were regarded as a duty of the Committee of Selection that they should read every book sent to them. Hon. Members of this House, who have been desirous of being placed on certain Committees, have frequently sent books for me to read to show that before coming to this House they had distinguished themselves in connection with this or that subject. But I have never read any of them. The Committee did not purpose to send any answer to Lord Stalbridge, but, meeting Lord Stalbridge, his Lordship asked me what we had done, and I told him that we had discharged Mr. Colman, but that we saw no reason to interfere with the nomination of Mr. Hunter. Lord Stalbridge intimated that I should hear of it again, and I expected that a question would be addressed to me in this House. An hour afterwards I was surprised to receive a telegram from Lord Stalbridge—it was addressed to me from the House of Commons, not from the House of Lords—and said "Please send me a letter in reply to mine irrespective of conversation, Stalbridge." I sent his Lordship a guarded letter, which explained nothing more than he knew already, stating that I had no objection to repeating what I had said in the Lobby as one friend speaking to another, but not as Chairman of the Committee. I told the noble Lord what was notorious—that the Committee had discharged Mr. Colman and had retained Mr. Hunter. I only wish to add that the Committee have acted throughout with absolute unanimity. For 18 years I have had the honour of presiding over the Committee, and during that time we have not had a single division, but have been one and all responsible for the selections we have made. Our duties have been growing every year; we have acted with perfect unanimity, and I trust we have discharged our duties to the satisfaction of the House.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I wish, Sir, by way of explanation, to add a few words in reference to a paragraph in Lord Stalbridge's letter which has not been referred to. I regret that before sending his communication to the Committee of Selection, Lord Stalbridge did not communicate with me, because he makes statements in that letter as to which he could personally have had no knowledge whatever, and it would have been desirable on his part to have ascertained beforehand whether those statements were correct or not. Had he done this he never would have sent that letter to the Committee, because in it he stated that I had committed myself to certain definite views in the matter of railway charges; that statement is absolutely incorrect. I had expressed no opinion on these charges whatever, for the simple reason that I had not any opinion on the subject, and I have no opinion on the subject, for the equally good reason, that up to the present time I do not know what those charges are. I have not had time to study the charges nor do I know what are the points in dispute between the Railway Companies and the Board of Trade. Therefore that statement of Lord Stalbridge is founded on absolutely incorrect data.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): The position of the Committee of Selection is one of very great importance, and the Committee is entitled to know whether it has the support of the House. The leader of the House in his own person is competent to give expression to the general feeling of the House upon that subject, and I should think it presumptuous if I were to undertake that duty. A question has been raised in the House impugning the conduct of the Committee of Selection, and the Chairman has given the House a detailed and lucid statement which appears to have met with the decided approbation of the House. I think, on the whole, it would be desirable, if the right hon. Gentleman does not think it superfluous, that he should give expression to the sentiment of the House, as his doing so would strengthen the hands of the Committee in the discharge of their duties.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have no hesitation in responding at once to the invitation of the right hon. Gentleman, although any observations on my part may be considered to be superfluous. Really, Sir, I feel, after the statement of my right hon. Friend behind me that any remarks on my part would be superfluous in order to express, as far as I am concerned, and I think I may speak for the House too, the complete confidence which we all possess in the discretion and perfect fairness with which the Committee of Selection discharge their duties. It has fallen to me more than once to express this confidence on the part of the House. I should have risen at once when my right hon. Friend behind me sat down if it had appeared to me that the slightest doubt existed in the mind of any hon. Member as to the course the Committee pursued being one which would receive the unanimous support of the House. I hope my right hon. Friend behind me will feel that there is no lack of cordiality in the expression of the complete confidence which, I believe, is felt by every Member of the House.

THE INDIAN OPIUM TRAFFIC.

MR. M'DONALD CAMERON (Wick, &c.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a question, of which I have given him private notice, namely, whether, in view of the result of the vote of last Friday night on the opium traffic in India, and the strong feeling which that vote manifested against the traffic, both in this House and the country, he is prepared to give effect to my proposal for the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the whole subject and thereby furnish to this House authentic data, which will guide its legislative action.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I may say that, from my point of view, that proceeding is incomplete at the present moment. The hon. Baronet the Member for the Barnard Castle Division, who moved the Motion on which the vote was taken, expressed his willingness to accept the proposed addition to his Resolution, but on that proposed addendum the Debate stood adjourned. That addendum was moved by my right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Sir R. Fowler). But, unfortunately, no decision of the House was come to upon it. I hardly know whether it is practicable now to take a decision upon the whole question in the form in which it now stands, and in reference to the addendum moved by the hon. Baronet; but certainly the Government are of opinion that the sense of the House has not been expressed upon the whole question, and until that sense has been expressed, I do not think the Government could take any proceeding in the way of making any communication to the Indian Government upon the subject. No doubt the Government of India will take their own course upon the matter; but, as far as we are concerned, we feel that the question is not in that complete state in which we are called upon to take any proceedings.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON (Lancashire, Rossendale): Perhaps, Sir, with your permission, I might be allowed to put a question to you, namely, whether it is in your power to state to the House what is the exact position of the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for the Barnard Castle Division of Durham, and the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London. I see that the Motion still remains on the Paper as attached to the 16th Order of the day on the Motion for the Order for Supply in Committee. I presume, however, that even if that Order can be reached to-night the Adjourned Debate, which was not concluded on Friday night, could not be continued; and I presume that you would leave the Chair without any Question put. I desire now to ask whether the Motion to which I have referred would remain for an indefinite time attached to the Order for going into Supply; and, if not, in what form it will remain on the Order Book, and in what manner it is possible, if the House desires to do so, to resume the discussion on the Motion and the Amendment of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite?

*MR. SPEAKER: In reply to the noble Lord I will state the exact position in which the matter stands. Upon the question that I now leave the Chair, which was submitted to the House last Friday, the hon. Baronet the Member for the Barnard Castle Division moved an Amendment. On a Division all the words of the Motion that I now leave the Chair were negatived, except the first word, "that;" the words of the Motion of the hon. Baronet were added, and his Motion then became the Substantive Question. To that Motion an Amendment was moved by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the City, and by the lapse of time the Debate on the addition to the Motion became an Adjourned Debate. It will therefore be observed that the House passed no definite decision either on the first Amendment as a Substantive Question, or upon the Amendment which was moved as an addition to the Substantive Question, in consequence of the lapse of time. On coming to the Order I shall have again to propose the Question—the Substantive Resolution and the Amendment that has been moved to it—and, if the Amendment be carried, I shall have to put the whole Resolution with the addendum attached to it; and then the House will express its opinion upon the Substantive Motion amended by the addendum, or, if the addition of the words be negatived, on the Motion alone. If Supply is taken on Monday or on Thursday I am obliged to leave the Chair without Question put, and therefore I should not be able to propose the Question on the Resolution of the hon. Baronet the Member for Barnard Castle. If I am asked what I should do on Friday next I must reply that I should then have to put, not the Question of the hon. Member for Barnard Castle, but the Question that I do now leave the Chair, upon which the Amendments on the Paper specially put down for Friday would take precedence of any other Amendment. Therefore, I know not what would become of the Amendment to the Motion of the hon. Member for Barnard Castle on Friday next. But it would, of course, be open to the Government to offer facilities for treating the subject as a Motion and by giving that Motion a place among the Orders of the Day on a Government night. That lies altogether in the discretion of the Government. I do not think any other question arises which I am called upon to answer.

SIR J. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): I would ask my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury whether he proposes to make that Motion that this Resolution be an Order of the Day? With the leave of the House I should like just to say that my right hon. Friend opposite has hardly correctly represented my view with regard to the Motion in the Amendment moved by my hon. Relative and Friend the Member for the City of London. I said I was quite prepared to accept the principle employed in his Amendment, but I was not prepared to accept his exact words, and I also read to the House the words I was prepared to accept as an addition to my now substantive Resolution.

MR. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham): Before the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury replies I should like to ask him whether the Government intend to take the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City seriously? I should like to ask them if they propose to place this unjust and intolerable burden on the English taxpayer?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The question now assumes an entirely new character, and I am not prepared to state to the House whether or not the Government are prepared to adopt the Motion of the hon. Baronet as an Order of the Day, or put it on the Paper with that object. I may state generally our view, that this Resolution is a matter which requires further consideration before it is accepted by the House. We shall on a later day state whether or not we can offer facilities to the hon. Baronet by making progress with his Resolution.

PUBLIC ENTERPRISES IN SERVIA.

MR. P. STANHOPE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that applications are being made for capital in the London Money Market for public enterprises in Servia, founded on concessions from the Servian Government; whether it is not the fact that cases have been brought officially under the notice of the Foreign Office showing grave irregularities in the administration of justice, and total disregard of the rights of foreigners in Servia; and whether, having regard to the insecurity of property thus manifested, and the apparent unwillingness of the Servian Government to give reasonable satisfaction and protection to the just claims of foreigners, he will, in the public interest, communicate Papers on the subject to the House?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS: (SIR J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): I am aware that certain enterprises in Servia, founded on concessions from that Government, are being submitted to the public here. I do not know of any case affecting British subjects, except one in which my hon. Friend is interested, in which it can be said that—

“Grave irregularities in the administration of justice have occurred, and a total disregard of the rights of foreigners in Servia.”

Several cases have been reported in which monopolies have been conceded and cancelled during their currency, on the alleged ground that the concessionaires had failed to comply with the conditions of their contracts and had made inaccurate returns. In these cases, on the representation of Foreign Ministers, payment was made for the plant of the companies and pecuniary compensation. In the case in which the hon. Member and others are interested, and which concerns the refund of moneys advanced by them many years ago without any desire for gain, but to save the credit of the Bank of Servia, and incidentally of the Servian State—for years these gentlemen have been subjected to postponement, but in 1890 the Servian Government undertook to take the debt upon themselves. Up to this time, I regret to say that, in spite of the constant representations of Her Majesty's Minister at Belgrade, no settlement had been obtained. According to a Despatch just received, the Servian Ministry states that the matter will be immediately considered by the Cabinet, and I earnestly hope that, in view of its importance to Servian credit, it may be settled without further delay.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Sir JOHN MOWBRAY reported from the Committee of Selection: That they had added Mr. Coghill to the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure.

Sir JOHN MOWBRAY further reported from the Committee: That they had discharged Sir James Corry from the Standing Committee on Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufacture; and had appointed in substitution, Mr. Macartney.

Report to lie upon the Table.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

REGISTRATION OF CERTAIN WRITS (SCOTLAND) BILL [LORDS].—(No. 272.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(5.10.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): This is a purely Departmental measure relating to the General Register of Sasines in Edinburgh; but it is somewhat urgent, as it ought, if the House approves, to come into operation on the 15th May. The matter stands thus: In Scotland titles in land are registered according to counties. Now, the Boundary Commissioners are at present altering the boundaries of counties, and their orders affect registration in this way—that any new titles to land which are changed from one county to another would have to be registered in the Register of the county to which those lands have been transferred instead of in the Register of the county to which they formerly belonged. It is found that the public and the conveyancers have not become sufficiently acquainted with the Orders already made by the Commissioners, and some are yet to be made. By the 15th May, 1892, matters will be mature; the changes of boundaries as affecting all counties in Scotland will take place simultaneously, and agents will be in a position to make conveyancing descriptions easy and accurate. As certainty and security in matters of titles are matters of vital moment, we think it best to postpone the date of this change accordingly, saving at the same time the validity of all writs already registered. Two minor departmental matters are also made definite, although they were scarcely in doubt—the fusion of the Registers of Orkney and Shetland, and the maintenance of the coincidence of teind titles with land titles so far as regards the county division of the Register. After this explanation I hope the House will allow the Bill to pass its Second Reading.

*(5.12.) MR. J. B. BALFOUR (Clackmannan, &c.): I do not rise for the purpose of opposing or throwing any obstacle in the way of the progress of this Bill. I entirely approve of the object to be attained by it, but I wish to ask a question as to a matter germane to the Bill in regard to which a good deal of anxiety is felt, particularly among the legal profession in the West of Scotland, as to the effect of the Local Government Act of 1889 upon the existing legislation in regard to the boundaries of certain localities, and in particular upon the boundaries of the Barony and Regality of Glasgow for purposes of registration?

(5.13.) THE LORD ADVOCATE: I am glad the right hon. Gentleman takes the view he has expressed as to the Bill itself. As regards the point he has raised, I have considered the question, and there is really no ground for doubt on the subject. The special Act of 1871 declares that the barony and royalty of Glasgow shall be deemed to include certain parishes, and not to include any part of another parish, which is named. By the Local Government Act of 1889, any change made by order of the Boundary Commissioners in the boundaries of a parish, alters those boundaries for all purposes. It is thus clear to demonstration under these two Statutes that writs will be registered in the royalty of Glasgow, or not in the royalty of Glasgow according to the legal contents of the parishes at the date of the registration, and therefore, after a change by the Boundary Commissioners, according to that change.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow at Two of the clock.

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

*(5.14.) MR. SMITH-BARRY (Hunts, S.): I rise to propose the Amendment that stands in my name. It is one that can be very easily understood, and I do not think I need occupy the time of the House at any length. It is proposed to purchase land from the owners and to pay them in paper. The result is, that they will have to convert it into cash in the first instance so as to be able to pay off in cash their mortgages, their family charges, and any other charges there may be on the land. As far as I can understand the Bill, they will also have to pay in cash the Government charges on the land, such as the tithe rent-charge, the drainage charges, and so forth. The unfortunate proprietors may have to sell out their Land Stock at a loss for these purposes. I suppose the Chancellor of the Exchequer hopes that the Stock will stand at par. It may or it may not, but there is a probability that, at any rate, it will very largely fluctuate. During 1890 Consols fluctuated between 92-93 and a fraction, and 98 and a fraction, while Indian Three per Cents. during the same period fluctuated between 94½ and 101½. We may expect that the Land Stock will also fluctuate very considerably; and if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) comes into power again, the probability is that the Stock will go down very rapidly, as all Irish securities did when he was last in Office. We know that during that right hon. Gentleman's last administration the Bank of Ireland Stock went down from about 330 to 269. The landlords have suffered pretty considerably up to this. A great number of them purchased their estates under State guarantees, buying under the Landed Estates in open Court, under the authority of a Judge sitting on the Bench, and upon the understanding that the rents amounted to so much and were punctually paid. They found afterwards another set of officials coming in and reducing the rents very considerably. And this is not all, for the right of re-occupying the lands has been taken away from them. This may be right or wrong, but, at any rate, it is not just to the Irish landlords, and I hope the Government will at this last moment, when the Irish landlords are going to sell out, see that they are paid in a currency which is not depreciated. The effect of paying in Stock which may considerably fluctuate will undoubtedly be that the landlord will be compelled to sell to the tenant at a higher price than he would otherwise be prepared to take. I hope that, under these circumstances, the Government may see their way to accept my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 10, to leave out "nominal amount," and insert "value."—(Mr. Smith-Barry.)

(5.21.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I do not wish to follow the hon. Member into the irrelevant portion of his speech; but, if he is to be taken as the spokesman of the Irish landlords, those landlords have proved themselves to be a most ungrateful body. It might surely have been expected that they would have been grateful to the present Government, and not have taken up a critical attitude in reference to the Bill. Does the hon. Member forget that this is the Bill of a Government, that by its previous measures has made land in Ireland a saleable article? The hon. Member spoke as if it were in the power of the Irish landlord any day to take his land into the market and get a price for it. The landlords are told by the Bill that they will be paid for their land in a Stock which, as far as I can judge, is a better Stock than that held by the public creditors of the country—by the men or the representatives of the men who lent their money to this country in a time of need. These public creditors lent their money to the State at 3 per cent., but very recently the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave them short notice that they must accept 2½, and that after 12 years more they must either accept the re-payment of their principal or be content with 2½ per cent. Is it not extreme audacity that in the face of such a state of public finance a representative of Irish landlords should rise and express discontent with $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. Stock? It must be remembered that the Irish landlords can obtain legal and financial advice, and that any landlord selling his estate will be perfectly well able to appreciate the fact that he is to be paid in Stock. He will, of course, make his arrangements accordingly. If the hon. Member's Amendment were accepted, the only effect would be to enable frauds to be committed on the tenants. The tenants are illiterate men, who have not the benefit of legal or financial advice. Suppose the case of a man selling his farm for £500. This is what will happen: The landlord would get Stock to the cash value of £500. If the Land Stock stood at 96, the landlord would, of course, get £520 worth of Stock instead of £500, and the tenant would find himself liable for the larger figure. In the same way, the tenant would have to pay 4 per cent. interest on the £520 instead of on the £500. Certainly, if the Government desire this Bill to work efficiently, they will reject the Amendment.

(5.26.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I think my hon. Friend is under some misapprehension with regard to our proposal. We have endeavoured to propose a just measure as between the landlords on the one side, and the tenants on the other; and it must be borne in mind that this is a case in which the State is mainly concerned. We consider that we have made a very fair offer of the credit of the State, and I am sorry to tell my hon. Friend that we certainly do not see our way to accept his Amendment. One of the main reasons why we cannot do so is that we cannot pledge ourselves to grant funds for the purposes of this Bill without knowing what those funds will cost us. These operations will extend over a very considerable period of years, and no Chancellor of the Exchequer would be likely to assent to unlimited demands being made upon him for amounts which he could not foresee when he had no means of knowing how he would be able to raise money to meet them. I wish, also, to point out to my hon. Friend that the Bill is not compulsory. It would not be right that the Government should be forced to raise money, perhaps at 3 or $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., when they receive only $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. on the annuities. We have endeavoured to create Stock which might fairly stand at par. The hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Sexton) has pointed out that, while the interest on the Land Stock will be $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., the interest on Consols 12 years hence will be only $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I do not pretend that if the interest were exactly the same, the Stock would stand on precisely the same footing as Consols, because the large bulk of Consols generally places them in a somewhat better position than would otherwise be the case. We have thought that $2\frac{3}{4}$ was as far as we could reasonably go without loss, and I trust I have made it clear to the Committee what are the strong financial reasons why we cannot meet the view of my hon. Friend.

(5.30.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): Of all proposals ever made in Committee this is, I think, about the coolest. Here is "Oliver," in the shape of an Irish landlord, asking for more. The Irish landlords ask this—the very people for whom this Stock is created, which is eventually to be more valuable than Consols, which is to be guaranteed by the English taxpayer, and over a term of 30 years at $2\frac{3}{4}$. I can scarcely find a Parliamentary term to characterise the demand. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says in a mild manner, "We have given you a Stock guaranteed for 30 years at $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent.," but what, I ask, would be the value of that in the market to-morrow? The right hon. Gentleman knows it will be worth a good deal more than his Consols. He knows that perfectly well, and anyone familiar with the Money Market is aware that Consols stand a good deal below par, very much to the disappointment of the gentlemen who, on the advice of their bankers, for 1s. 6d. were induced to believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer when they were told that they would be worth £100 or more. People who took the right hon. Gentleman's Stock when they might have had £100 can now only get £96 or £97. What is the reason of this to a considerable extent? People who are acquainted with these matters tell me it is the knowledge that these $2\frac{3}{4}$ are at a future period to fall to $2\frac{1}{2}$, and people do not like Stock which is to fall in its interest value in the future. This has had the effect of making Consols a good deal less popular with investors than in former times. Now, what does the Chancellor of the Exchequer give to Irish landlords? He gives them a guarantee of 2½ for 30 years. I do not pretend to put a value on this Irish Land Stock, but no doubt the brokers in the City will tell you how much more this Stock will be worth than Consols. Yet, with this Stock offered for their land, the typical Irish landlord comes here and moves an Amendment asking for more. It is very well that at this early stage of the proceedings we should understand both the spirit in which the Bill has been originally framed by the financial advisers of the Government and the spirit in which the Irish landlords desire to expand it.

*(5.35.) COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I do not wish to prolong this discussion further, but I would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider between this and the time when we reach Clause 7 the parallel question of less wide extent which I propose to raise by the Amendment of which I have given notice. I think he will see the reasonableness of this, which does not involve an expenditure of public money.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I do not wish to detain the Committee on an Amendment which finds no favour, but I would observe that if during the progress of this Bill the hon. Member intends to bring forward many Amendments like this it would be better for the Government to give him his peerage at once. To adopt such a proposal would render the Act quite unworkable. The effect would be that no tenant would know what he had to pay when he contracted to buy a farm, and the Land Commissioners would not know how much of the advance could be made without fear of the farm not providing enough security. The whole Act would be rendered unworkable.

(5.36.) MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Under the proposal of the hon. Member for South Hunts the landlord would know the advantages of his position, but the position of the tenant is an exceedingly difficult one, because he has to pay his annuity of £4 for 49 years, and for this he receives £100 as a loan, but still he has to pay into the Sinking Fund a sufficient sum to amount at the end of 49 years to £100 cash and 4 per cent. in the meantime. In exchange the Treasury floats off on him Stock worth 98½ now, and which may be worth less hereafter. Having got his £100 cash for something worth £98 10s. in the open market, there is nothing to prevent the National Debt Commissioners going into the Sinking Fund and buying up the Stock. So that really the Treasury, by issuing this Stock for £100, sweats the tenant to the extent of 30s. or 40s. That is to be dealt with by a subsequent Amendment; but this view of the case has been passed over by the hon. Member for South Hunts.

(5.37.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): One remark of the Chancellor of the Exchequer I take notice of, that it is the duty of the Government in this business to hold the scales evenly between the landlord and tenant. But while he thus poses before the House, the fact is these arrangements have been arrived at between the landlords and the Government, not a single Representative of the Irish Party being consulted, or even asked a question as to his view of the point. All through the winter the Irish Landlords' Committee have been holding meetings, and they have succeeded in effecting enormous changes to the prejudice of the tenant, getting the Government to cut down their Bill of last year, and bring forward this plan, and then the Chancellor of the Exchequer gets up and, in his balmyest manner, assures the Landlord Party that a Conservative Government must hold the scales evenly between them and us, between those whom he has had ear-wiggling for the last six months, and the tenants who now have the first opportunity of saying a word on this point. In this state of facts, it is a very mild suggestion for the right hon. Gentleman to make. What is more, I do not believe we have got to the end of this business yet. We have had experience of the action of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I believe that, bad as this Amendment is, it will yet be swallowed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head; but you jump before you come to the stile. There is still the House of Lords to reckon with. We shall see the result when the Marquess of Waterford and others assemble their forces to attack the Government.

We have seen their influence on a Liberal Ministry, and à fortiori they have greater chance with a Tory Government. The Bill, as it stands, contains a distinct grievance to the people of this country. You issue this Stock at $2\frac{1}{2}$, and though I do not like to pose as a financial prophet, and do not know much about these matters, I think the effect of this coming on the market will be to depress Consols another point, for it stands to reason a man will prefer Stock at $2\frac{1}{2}$ for 30 years to Stock at $2\frac{1}{2}$ reducible to $2\frac{1}{2}$ in 15 years. The Government by assenting to this proposal to create this Stock are making a further inroad on the pockets of confiding people who consented to lease their money out two or three years ago at the suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. And now the Irish landlords are attempting further pressure. I might mark our sense of what this Amendment means by moving that the question be now put, but that perhaps would be too strong a course to take. I think the hon. Member for South Hunts and his friends would be well advised to take what they can get and make the least possible noise about it.

(5.44.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I am afraid we cannot accept the Chancellor of the Exchequer as that guardian of the public purse he claims to be, because I think if he fulfilled that position we should not have this Bill at all. Allusion has been made to the astounding greed of the Irish landlords, but nothing they could ask for would surprise me, though I am considerably surprised by the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman said that this Stock was issued at $2\frac{1}{2}$ for a lengthy term of years, because it would not be so valuable as ordinary Consols, owing to it being in small quantities, I presume. Well, I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer why we are to be done out of this $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The object is to get this money, and surely the primary duty of a Chancellor of the Exchequer is to issue his paper in such a way that it will produce the greatest amount. If he were issuing ordinary Consols we should be gainers not losers; if the view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is correct that $2\frac{1}{2}$ Consols are to be at par with the condition that in 30 years—

Mr. T. M. Healy,

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is anticipating a later question.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Yes, Mr. Courtney, but I was only answering the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I thought he was out of order when he was advancing his argument. The hon. Member for South Hunts was good enough to tell us that this was an Irish security, and he said if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian were to come into office, Irish securities would fall because they did fall when last the Liberal Party came into power. Now, the only reason why this is called an Irish security is that certain Irish guarantees are attached to it; the fact is, this thing is tainted with these guarantees, and it would be infinitely better if those guarantees did not exist. I urge this upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and perhaps he will put an end to these guarantees. The right hon. Gentleman made another mistake. He said that landlords ought to have their money in cash because if Consols fell they would be losers. The reason why Consols fall is because of the general condition of the country; when the country is not supposed to be so prosperous they fall, but then all securities fall, and if you get 92 in bad times, that represents what 100 is in good times—92 would be an equivalent for securities that in bad times would pay 100. I only point this out to show that the landlords in their reckless greed do not take the trouble to look into the question, but just call out, "More, more," no matter what comes, and I believe if they were offered 200 for 100 they would clamour for 300, and there is no hope of satisfying them.

(5.48.) MR. CHANCE: Is it not true that under the Ashbourne Act the tenant will have to repay to the Sinking Fund £100 for each £100 nominal Stock, and if this is not worth £100, will not the difference be a profit to the Treasury?

MR. GOSCHEN: There will be no such profit, the £100 goes into the Sinking Fund for the repayment at the end of 49 years.

MR. CHANCE: But cannot the National Debt come in before that time and buy in the open market?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, just the same as they can buy up Consols.

MR. CHANCE: And thus make a profit?

*(5.47.) MR. SMITH-BARRY: With the general feeling of the Committee against the Amendment, and with the Government opposed to it, I wish to withdraw my Amendment. ["No, no!"]

MR. T. M. HEALY: I think we cannot allow the Amendment to be withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it your pleasure the Motion be withdrawn? [Cries of "No!"]

Question put, and agreed to.

THE CHAIRMAN: The next Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Elgin is applicable to the 6th clause.

(5.50.) MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I presume, Sir, you were speaking of the first of my two Amendments, and I will propose the second of these. Before moving it I desire to call attention very briefly to the conduct of the Chief Secretary in this Committee with regard to two Amendments which have already been considered, and to put myself in order I will conclude with a Motion. You are aware, Sir, that up to Friday only two Amendments had engaged the attention of the Committee, and one of these was that of my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee; and on moving that my hon. Friend charged the Government with concealment and pursuing a tortuous policy, and the Chief Secretary replied. Then, when I ventured to press him for an answer in reference to the Guarantee Fund, he would not give a word of explanation. I do not complain much of that. But then, on the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, the right hon. Gentleman very complacently said that he had already fully answered in detail all the representations which my hon. Friend had submitted. He also stated that he had last year produced certain figures to prove the solvency of his Guarantee Fund, and that the contingent portion, therefore, would not be touched; and he fearlessly stated that these figures had not been and could not be controverted. I followed him, and just as he was leaving the place I ventured to call his attention to the fact that he had omitted to answer an all-important part of my hon. Friend's speech, that part where my hon.

Friend showed by distinct figures that instead of the Guarantee Fund being solvent there would be an enormous deficit at the end of 40 years. The Chief Secretary came back to his place and interrupted me—an interruption to which I do not in the least degree object, but I mention it because after the interruption he left his place again. He said it was true he had omitted to reply to that most important point—the deficit in the Guarantee Fund at the end of 40 years; but still he made no reply except that it would be more convenient to speak upon it at a later stage. I then proceeded to traverse the allegation he had made that his figures had not been contested. I went over these figures in detail, and if I may say so, I tore those figures to tatters. I do not know if I should be in order in going over these figures, but if I may I will do so.

MR. GOSCHEN: I rise to order. Is it in order for an hon. Member to go over the whole discussion of the other day. Is it possible for an hon. Member to go over his argument again on the ground that he has not been answered?

THE CHAIRMAN: Undoubtedly the hon. Member cannot re-state his argument and get it discussed again. If he complains that his argument has been unanswered he may make a statement to that effect, but he must confine himself to that. Attempts have been made to arrest the progress of a Bill on the ground of neglect to answer an argument, but have never been favourably regarded by the House.

MR. KEAY: I felt I was in danger of transgressing, and was saying as much when the right hon. Gentleman rose to order. I simply confine myself to a statement of the error the right hon. Gentleman has made when he credits himself for having a fund of £1,300,000 when he will only have £229,000. I showed the importance of this, and invited the Chief Secretary to give the Committee an explanation. And what happened? The Debate proceeded, and just when I was again about to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he adhered to his figures or whether he recognised the mistake he had made in them, he stood up, and I thought was about to make an explanation; but he moved the Closure, and the result was that on Friday evening the Committee divided destitute of any information from the Government, and at this moment the Committee is destitute of information from the Government as to whether the Guarantee Fund, which the right hon. Gentleman says will amount to £1,600,000 will not amount only to £229,000. On this ground, I think, I am justified in calling the attention of the Committee to the conduct of the Chief Secretary, and I trust he will give the Committee that explanation which may be fairly expected from him. To put myself in order, I now move that you, Sir, do report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Keay.)

(5.59.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is in order; but certainly I do not think he leaves me an opportunity of being in order in replying to him. So far as I can make out the singularly inopportune statement with which he has interrupted the progress of the Committee, he refers to a reply he gave on Friday, as, I think, an inappropriate and absurd reply, not to my speech in answer to that of the hon. Member for Northampton, but in answer to a speech I delivered on a motion for the Second Reading of the Bill in the Spring of last year.

MR. KEAY: The right hon. Gentleman is slightly mistaken. The whole foundation of my argument, which otherwise would not have been in order, was that words fell from him in his reply to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, on Friday, when he alluded to the figures he had given to prove the solvency of the fund, adhered to them, and said they had not been controverted.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It appears that I am correct—the complaint the hon. Gentleman makes is of a speech I delivered a year ago, and he now attacks me for not defending that speech which was not before the Committee on Friday, and figures, which by a long and elaborate process I put before the House on the Second Reading. My reference on Friday was not specially to these figures to which I adhere, but to the general argument by which I defended the security of the fund. I do not know that I am in order in going so far as this in explanation, for I believe I am right in the supposition that on a Motion to report Progress we must confine ourselves to that Motion.

(6.0.) MR. KEAY: My only object was to try and secure some assurance from the Government that they would studiously endeavour to guide the deliberations of this Committee on a very difficult subject in a more satisfactory manner. If we are to understand the right hon. Gentleman is giving us that assurance, I have not the least desire in the world to obstruct the proceedings. I therefore ask leave to withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.2.) MR. KEAY: I now wish to move the second Amendment which stands in my name. Originally that was in a different form, a form which I understood you (the Chairman) to intimate was not admissible. Its object was to secure that after the tenant had paid all the instalments of principal and interest, he should still be subject for a given number of years to an annual charge; you were good enough to inform me that that overstepped the point of order in regard to this Bill, and in consequence, I have so altered it as to secure that an irreducible minimum shall, for the benefit of the community, be paid to the Treasury for a period of 60 years in respect of every holding purchased by means of advances made under this Act. The annuity is to be at the rate of £4 for every £100 so advanced, and so in proportion for every less sum, the residue of which after payment of the principal and interest on the advance shall be applied in relief of Imperial and local taxation in Ireland. I need hardly say that the object of this Amendment is to obtain for the State and for the community some form of quid pro quo for the immense advantages which are conferred by the use of British credit. The form of the Amendment follows as closely as possible the provisions of the Ashbourne Act of 1885, in which a similar alteration was made in the terms of repayment of advances under the Irish Land Act, 1881. So much for the form of it. And now with regard to the substance of it. I may remark at the outset it is universally understood in the Committee that the State gains nothing out of this transaction for the first 49 years, for the tables which regulate the amount of the annuities have been so framed as to produce a net interest of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for the discharge of the public obligation to the bondholders, and 1 per cent. accumulating for 49 years, which goes to the payment of principal. I do not think it necessary to speak about the remaining $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.—the county percentage—for it is a very trifling matter. Now, why have I fixed the time at 60 years? I have done so on this principle: The Sale of Land Bill, 1886, was framed, although in a different manner, with the same object as is aimed at by this Amendment. It was framed so that while the tenant had to pay the capitalised gross rental, the landlord only received the capital sum on the net rental. Thus about one-fifth part of the purchase money was retained for the benefit of the community as a quid pro quo for the vast saving effected by the use of British credit. I have been told that an enactment of this kind would give rise to political considerations; but I find that in all matters in which landlord and tenant are concerned “political considerations” do arise, and that the term is simply a substitute for “pecuniary considerations.” Another objection which has been advanced is that the Ashbourne Acts, which are in full force, have given the tenant an absolute property in his holding after 49 years, and it would be unjust to spread the charge over 60 years in the case of tenants under this Bill. I cannot see that there is very much weight in that objection, because the drafting of this Bill is a confession that the tenants under the Ashbourne Act got too good terms, and that Act now having, for all practical purposes, ceased to operate by reason of the exhaustion of funds, it is impossible to say that the tenant is wronged by making purchasers under this Act pay for 60 years instead of 49 years. I should like to draw the attention of the Committee for a moment to the enormous boon which is given by the use of British credit. Let me put it into figures, so that hon. Members may have clearly before them the nature of the gift they are making, apparently to the tenant, and assuredly to the landlord. I consider it is a fair way to estimate the pecuniary value of British credit if we take first the rate of interest at which landlord and tenant could themselves borrow in order to carry out this operation. I assert it is very moderate indeed to say that they could not borrow at less than 5 per cent. Therefore if we take a loan of £30,000,000 at 5 per cent. for 49 years and contrast it with a loan raised at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., we see at once the difference due to the use of British credit. It is enormous; it represents a saving of £213,000,000 sterling on a transaction of £30,000,000. I admit that these figures represent a gross transaction, whereas this may be said to be a net transaction, because the whole of the money is not outstanding for 49 years. I accept the position that the instalments are payable back every year. Even then this use of British credit represents a direct and actual pecuniary saving to these persons on a £30,000,000 transaction of £67,000,000 sterling. That is the boon you are conferring on them, and to how many persons will this sum of £67,000,000 go. Calculated on the same ratio as that on which £10,000,000 was distributed under the Ashbourne Acts, you will find that the whole of this £67,000,000 will in 49 years have gone into the hands of only about 70,000 tenants. I say it is not fair that this enormous boon should be conferred on so small a number of tenants, and I think it would have been wiser when we were dealing with Irish land in this Bill to have secured the fee simple of the land for the State. But as we cannot do that I am proposing a very small irreducible minimum of advantage which might be obtained for the community. I hope my Irish friends will support this. I know they do not like to minimise the burden on the British taxpayer, but I ask them to support it because it is not an attempt on my part to take away from Ireland any part of the boon of which I am speaking; it is simply an endeavour to distribute the boon more fairly than it will be under this Bill as it stands, for the 70,000 persons I have referred to only represent

1 in 66 of the Irish population. Lastly, I do not propose that the additional payments shall be devoted to British purposes. I ask that they shall be applied to the relief of Imperial and local taxation in Ireland: I think, Mr. Courtney, you—a great authority on economic questions—have expressed yourself in favour of the principle for which I am contending, for I find that in one of your speeches you declared for the solidity of the principle, and, after describing how it would act, added, that the locality in which the purchased estate was situated would receive a lay revenue after the debt had been paid off. Again, this principle was adopted by the Committee of this House which sat on the question of small holdings. The Chairman of that Committee was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and in the Report I find it stated that as the Local Authority would borrow from the State at less than 4 per cent., it would have a margin after paying the interest to the Loan Commissioners which would constitute a Sinking Fund, so that in about 50 years the loan would be repaid, and the community, represented by the Local Authority, would then have an income from the land due to the use of its superior credit, in the shape of a perpetual quit-rent free of all charges and expenses. Now on this Small Holdings Committee there were nine supporters of the Government and six Members of the Opposition, and, therefore, I think that that doctrine having been laid down so recently by such a high authority, I may consider this Amendment of mine to be somewhat of the nature of a Government Amendment. I ask the Government to accept it, inasmuch as it gives to the tenants much easier terms than the Select Committee itself recommended with regard to small holdings in this country.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 11, after "advance," insert, "With respect to advances to be made under this Act, or to be made under the Land Purchase Acts, the provisions of Section 4 of 'The Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885,' shall be amended as follows: 'There shall be paid to the Treasury, for 60 years, in respect of every holding purchased by means of an advance made under this Act, an annuity of £4 for every £100 of such advance, and so in proportion for every less sum, the residue of which, after payment of the principal and interest of the advance, shall be applied in relief of Imperial and local taxation in Ireland."—(Mr. Keay.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(6.20.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is quite mistaken if he supposes that it is my desire or intention to dispute his figures. I understand his view to be that by lending the Irish farmers £30,000,000 I give them £67,000,000 without depriving the taxpayers of that sum. If there is any accuracy in those figures, the Bill is a very much better one than even I myself had supposed, and I should be very sorry to take away that boon.

MR. KEAY: I say the Government are giving that boon to the landlords, whereas it ought to go to the people generally. The Government profess that they are giving it to the tenants.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: But there is one argument which is conclusive against the hon. Gentleman's proposal. Unless the Irish tenant is very different from all other men, he will very strongly object, after the debt has been paid off, to continue to pay 4 per cent. on the original amount for another 11 years. I assume, from what he said, the hon. Member will have the support of the Irish Members.

MR. KNOX: That statement was made without any authority from us.

MR. KEAY: I said I hoped to have their support.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: "Hope springs eternal in the human breast." The hon. Member is very sanguine if he thinks that those who represent the Irish farmers will support such a proposal as this. The Amendment is not one which the Government can ask the Committee to accept.

(6.23.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): There is considerable force in the objection of the right hon. Gentleman. But I must say that the Amendment points to what in my judgment is one of the most serious blots in this Bill. I have never been among those who have repudiated all resort to British credit, but since 1886 I have always made it a condition that some advantage should accrue to the community at large in Ireland, and should not be exclusively reserved for the privileged class of tenants and purchasers.

I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman has thrown away the opportunity of asserting this very wise principle in regard to the employment of British credit, and has also neglected the opportunity of reconciling to some extent the community in Ireland to the risk and liability which the Bill imposes upon the ratepayers in Ireland, and which constitute one of the gravest objections to the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman claims that he confers a great boon on Ireland, but that is a mistaken description. Undoubtedly the right hon. Gentleman confers a great boon on a certain class of tenants. To the ordinary Irish citizen he gives no boon, but merely imposes a serious liability. The right hon. Gentleman argues that the risk is limited to the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund. I think we shall find as we get further on in discussing the Bill that that is not the limit. Granting, for the sake of argument, the policy of the Bill, it would have been just to accompany the risk and liability with arrangements that would have conferred an advantage on the whole community of Ireland. This plan would not only have been just, but it would also have been in an enormous degree politic, because if any movement for repudiation should arise, the Local Authorities, to whom an interest had been given, would stand as a bulwark and barrier against the spread of such a movement. It was a fatal flaw in the Bill that the opportunity has been lost of enlisting in favour of the maintenance of the bargains made by the purchasers with the State the interests of the bulk of the people of Ireland. That is not a peculiar view of the matter. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has strongly insisted on the necessity, as well as the expediency, of this. It may, indeed, be said that the general community is interested, because the ratepayers will be out of pocket if the annuities are not paid. But that is just the sort of interest which people would be likely to resent, because it is an unjust penalty imposed upon them for the default of persons in whose transactions they have no interest of their own. I think the Government lost a valuable opportunity of strengthening their own policy and of asserting the wholesome principle that British credit is never to be used for these or other operations unless the advantage to be derived from its use is to be distributed over the whole body of those who incur the risk. Although I cannot support the Amendment I am not sorry that the question has been raised, and the protest entered. The Bill of 1886 did not carry the principle I am advocating, as far as I should now like it to be carried, but it did put the principle into effect for a period of 49 years. I think now that a riper consideration would induce me, if any proposal of that kind were made either in relation to Ireland or any other part of the United Kingdom, to resist any resort to State credit unless accompanied by some benefit to the portion of the community which bore the risk.

(6.31.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think probably the Committee will agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it would be desirable to associate the Local Authorities in Ireland specifically with the advantages of this Bill. It must be noticed that to the not insignificant or contemptible extent of 5s. per cent. that has been done. If more were done in that direction, it must be at the expense of the tenant, to whom the advantage given is not so extraordinarily favourable that it can be greatly diminished. The right hon. Gentleman seems to be running together the different and not quite consistent principles that the Local Authorities should share in the benefits conferred by the Bill, and that British credit should not be given without some benefit to those who take the risk—that is, the British taxpayers in general.

MR. J. MORLEY: My position was that under our Bill of 1886 it was an Irish authority that would have got the whole of the benefit of the increase in the security.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; I see the advantage of associating the Local Authority with the action of the tenants in giving security, but I do not see the equity of giving more to Ireland, as a whole, than the Bill now gives. If you are to travel outside the principles we have laid down in the Bill you should give the benefit to the British people at large. I cannot for one moment admit that the benefits of that Bill are confined to the Irish occupiers who purchase under it. It is because I believe the Bill is a benefit to Ireland as a whole, and applies an effective and efficient remedy to some of the most grievous evils under which Ireland has groaned for years past, that I defend the use of British credit at all. I do not think the criticisms the right hon. Gentleman has passed on the Bill are well deserved.

(6.35.) MR. J. MORLEY: I do not wish to prolong this part of the discussion, but I think the right hon. Gentleman is misusing words when he says he would not be a party to the Bill unless he thought it would confer a benefit on Ireland as a whole. The Bill will confer all the pecuniary benefits on a casual privileged class. The right hon. Gentleman says this is a matter of Imperial concern. If it is, why is there not Imperial risk? If it is a matter of Imperial concern, the whole risk of the operation ought not to fall on localities in Ireland, but upon the Kingdom as a whole.

(6.37.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Leamington, N.E.): I think this Amendment has raised one of the most important points in the Bill, although I agree with my right hon. Friend (Mr. J. Morley) that it has not, perhaps, done so in the most appropriate form. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has said that if this money is to be given for the more general purposes of Ireland it must be taken from somebody who would otherwise be benefited, that that somebody would be the tenant, and that the tenant would not be prepared to part with any advantage he gets under the Bill. That may be true, but we Representatives of the taxpayers of Great Britain are not bound to throw ourselves exclusively into the point of view of the tenants, and I think perhaps we are able to take a more impartial view of it even than the right hon. Gentleman himself, because he may have reasons for conciliating the tenant and striking a bargain unduly favourable to the tenant. The right hon. Gentleman said the other day that there were many cases in which the annual payment from the tenant would be reduced 40 to 60 per cent., and he would be transformed at the same time from a tenant into a proprietor. These cases might be cases in which a fair rent had recently been judicially fixed. Probably my hon. Friends below the Gangway will not agree with me on this point, but I say that there can be no legitimate motive for making a present to the tenant of from 40 to 60 per cent. of his rent if that rent has recently been fixed by a judicial tribunal. If the county can afford to give these terms, the benefit ought not to be given as a present to the tenant, but ought to be given to the Local Authority in the district for public purposes, and I hope this point, if it is not properly raised now, will be raised on some future occasion during the passage of the Bill through the House.

*(6.40.) MR. KNOX: I agree, to a large extent, with what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle—that is to say, I agree there is a great deal to be said in favour of giving some greater advantage than the Government propose to give to the Irish Local Authorities as a result of these transactions. The Local Authorities, and especially those classes in the different counties who are not directly connected with the land, will run very great risk in order to make a certain number of the tenants of Ireland peasant proprietors, and, therefore, I think it is only fair that ultimately some profit should come to those classes for the involuntary sacrifice they are now making on behalf of the tenants of Ireland. But I cannot support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Elgin and Nairn. The hon. Gentleman proposes that the tenants shall get no relief whatever immediately after the expiration of the 49 years, but shall go on for a short time paying the same as they have hitherto paid by way of the repayment, both of principal and interest. I venture to think that if anything ought to be put on the holding after the expiration of the 49 years, it ought to be put on permanently. The tenants will, after the 49 years, get a permanent advantage. If their position, as compared with that of other tenants, is so favoured whatever is put on ought to be put on for ever. Then I object to the proposal of the hon. Member for Elgin and Nairn, because it will have a most injurious effect upon the working of local government in Ireland. The proposal is that a casual addition should from time to time be made to the income of each Local Authority. Land purchase cannot go on equally over the whole country. The large estates may be dealt with in one year in one county. When the 49 years come round a very large additional income will fall to the Local Authority for 10 years. [An hon. MEMBER: In relief of Imperial taxation.] If the proposal is that it shall not go to the Local Authority, who have borne all the risk, my objection to the proposal is very considerably increased. But if, as I assume, a large additional income will fall to the Local Authority for 10 years, there will be as bad a system of local finance as it is possible to imagine. The consequence will be we shall have grants in the nature of grants in aid which will vary very largely from year to year. The proposal will not commend itself to Irish Members on the ground that it gives relief from Imperial taxation 50 years hence. I and my hon. Friends hope that at all events in its present form the Imperial taxation levied on Ireland 50 years hence may be of such a nature that it is not worth while considering now. Speaking generally, I say that I object to the proposal, because by it the Imperial Parliament is asked to determine a question which ought to be left for an Irish Parliament 50 years hence when the question will actually arise. Fifty years hence this specially favoured class will begin to exist, and then it will be time enough for whatever Parliament is charged with the duty to deal with the matter. I trust it will be an Irish Parliament, and I confess I heard with some astonishment the statement of the hon. Member for Lanarkshire (Mr. Donald Crawford) that he, as a Scotch Liberal and not specially connected with the Irish tenants, is better able to judge impartially of this matter than an Irish Authority will be. What is the effect of the hon. Member's proposal? It is, as the Chief Secretary put it, that we take from one class of Irishmen in order to give to another. I conceive the Authority which is to determine whether we should take from one class of Irishmen and give to another should be an Irish Authority, and it will be time enough for an Irish Authority to deal with the subject in the 20th century.

*(6.48.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Although I cannot agree with the hon. Member for Elgin and Nairn in the exaggerated figures he has given of the measure of the benefit which will accrue to the tenants of Ireland, I agree that the benefit will be very great. There cannot be a doubt that if Irish credit alone had been employed, the transactions could not be carried out at less than 5 per cent., or, including provision for the Sinking Fund, 6 per cent. as compared with 4 per cent. as at present. I am with my hon. Friend in saying that some of this enormous benefit ought to go to the general taxpayers or ratepayers of Ireland. I cannot agree with the Chief Secretary for Ireland that the whole of this benefit will accrue to the tenants of Ireland. On the contrary; a considerable portion of it will accrue to the landlords. The tenants will get the benefit of paying considerably less than their former rent, and they will be enabled thereby to give a greater number of years' purchase than they otherwise would be. The landlords get the benefit of this, and if I were to hazard an opinion I would say that the landlords get three or four years additional purchase than they would if the transactions had been carried out at a higher rate of interest. I believe the Government would have done wisely if they had associated with the Bill the proposal to give a larger benefit to the ratepayers of Ireland generally. If the example of the Bill of 1886 had been followed, a very considerable boon would have been given to the general ratepayers of Ireland, and a great deal done to enlist their influence in the direction of the ultimate repayment of the enormous advances contemplated by this Bill.

(6.52.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): It must be obvious to the Committee that the discussion in which we have been engaged is too large for the Amendment under which it has arisen. The Amendment strikes at the main principle of the Bill. The principle is that by the aid of British credit, the land of Ireland shall be handed over absolutely for nothing to the tenants who are now the occupiers. So far as principle is concerned, I am entirely with my hon. Friend. Indeed, I go further than he does. I was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle admit that part, at least, of the benefit of these transactions ought to be secured for the public. I do not know it matters much whether it is the Local Authority or the people of Ireland or Great Britain; but the public interest of some sort should be reserved as part of the price at which we engage in these transactions. I enter my strenuous protest against the principle of handing over the money of Great Britain to one class of the people of Ireland. It seems to me that everything that was said by the Chief Secretary on this subject was marked by fallacy of the most elementary kind. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the tenant paying off his loan. Paying off his loan, forsooth! The right hon. Gentleman said—"How will the tenant be satisfied if, after he has paid off his loan, you tax him for 20 years more." How does he repay it? He does it in the most Hibernian fashion—by paying 20 per cent. less than he did before. Then, again, the Chief Secretary says, "If you are going to secure this benefit for the public it can only be at somebody's expense: it can only be by taking it away from the tenant." I assert that that is not so. I cannot admit that the hon. Member for Elgin and Nairn has chosen the best mode or time for submitting this question to the House. I do not know what his Amendment means. He says the provisions of Section 4 of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act should be amended, and then he provides how it should be amended. Does my hon. Friend mean that his provisions should be substituted for the whole of Section 4 or for a portion of it, and, if so, what portion? It seems to me that the Amendment is not in a shape in which it can be conveniently discussed, and having secured his purpose by obtaining this discussion I suggest he should withdraw the Amendment, in the hope that the point may be raised at a more convenient opportunity.

(6.59.) MR. CHANCE: I think there is some misapprehension as to the precise scope and effect of this Amendment. This Bill, unlike the Ashbourne Act, does not enable the tenant to make terms with his landlord. The tendency of the Insurance Clause will be that only the tenant who sees some very considerable saving in the reduction of 20 per cent., will buy under the Bill. The clause will lead to the sale of the better lands, and leave on the hands of a future Irish Government the duty of dealing with the poorer lands in the congested districts. It must be recollected that under this Act the cream of the tenants get the advantage, and the poorest tenants get none. Under those circumstances, I think it would be only prudent that the richer and better class of tenants should in some way be made responsible to provide funds for the Local Authorities, and thus enable those authorities to deal with the congested districts and the poorer tenants. The Chief Secretary says if you diminish the benefit to the tenants you stop land purchase altogether. Never was there a greater fallacy. If the benefit to the tenant is diminished, that will not affect land purchase, but simply the price which the landlord puts into his pocket. It is absolutely incontrovertible that if the tenant, instead of paying 4 per cent. by way of annuity, was only called upon to pay 2 per cent., the tenant would not be one sixpence the better. The sole effect would be that, instead of paying 14 or 15 years' purchase, he would pay double that. Anyone who knows anything about the work of the Land Commission knows this: that in a large number of cases the Commissioners refuse to advance the sum for which the tenant has bargained with the landlord, and no wonder, because the landlord has the benefit of the advice of his solicitor, the assistance of the Sheriff, and all the advantages of his position, while the poor tenant has nobody to assist him. The tenants are not even allowed to combine, and it is apparently a criminal offence to give a tenant advice as to land purchase, and the price is fixed by reference to one consideration only, namely, what can the tenant pay. If it is a shade less than his present rent, and the Government will lend it, that he will pay, no matter what it represents in capital value. It must be recollected that it is the landlord who gets the benefit of the total cessation of payments at the end of 49 years. If the tenant, instead of paying £20, pays £15, he does not care whether it represents a capital sum of £500 or £5,000; it is £5 a year less to him, and all the ultimate benefit goes to the landlord. This point will arise on a subsequent Amendment, but meantime I ask the Committee to recollect that in this matter the tenant is merely the cat-paw to rescue this chestnut for the landlord, and that it does not matter a sixpence to the tenant whether he pays 2 per cent. or 20 per cent.; that the price he pays for the land is measured simply by the annuity the Government thinks he can pay, and has no connection whatever with the capital money advanced. Therefore, I trust that in these discussions we shall not have much said about the advantage to the tenant. There is absolutely no benefit to him except a certain reduction he gets if the landlord can induce him to unlock the Treasury for the advantage of the landlord.

(7.5.) MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): A technical objection, among others, is taken to my hon. Friend's Amendment, but the Bill is so framed by reference to a variety of Acts that it puzzles the most astute lawyer to construe many of its provisions, and to pronounce an opinion upon the form of an Amendment without very careful examination. The hon. Member for Cavan seemed to assume that it was almost an impertinence for my hon. Friend the Member for Lanark to put in an oar on this subject at all in reference to the dispersion of the funds among classes in Ireland, and that it is only a question to be regulated according to the wishes of Irish Members. For my part, I should be content to leave the whole solution to Ireland; but if we are to be concerned in giving these benefits, I think we ought to extend them to those who are in most need in Ireland. The Amendment, however, brings out a most important flaw in the Bill, and that is, that it is simply for the benefit of one or two classes—a selected number of landlords and a selected number of tenants. For these is the powerful instrument of British credit to be used. The purport of the Amendment of my hon. Friend is this: that inasmuch as an advantage is gained by tenants, and a greater, I agree, by the landlords, but by no others than these, that after they have enjoyed this for 49 years some equivalent should be gained by the Irish public at large. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle has laid down in his too short speech one of the most important propositions I think we have heard from him or from anyone for a considerable time, for he announced, as I understood, that upon any future advance of British money or credit for land purchase or cognate purposes, he would require the condition of a perpetual reservation of some rental or sum of money to be payable to the State or Municipality—that is to say, municipalisation of the land as laid down by its most recent expositors. I agree with that view of the right hon. Gentleman, but I desire to point out that the hon. Gentleman who moved this Amendment originally had on the Paper an Amendment exactly carrying out that proposal; but, unfortunately, it was discovered that it was out of Order and inconsistent with the scope of the Bill, and thus it is that this Amendment in a more moderate form is proposed for the consideration of the Committee, and the hon. Member is obliged to restrict his Amendment to a term of 11 years. I do not know whether it could be arranged that a quit rent in perpetuity should be paid in lieu of a period of 49 years. As has been pointed out, the proposals in the Bill are for the benefit of a restricted class, and for the benefit of a certain portion of a restricted class. British credit is being invoked for a special section of a class. The Bill as it stands forms a most important precedent for advanced politicians, and a most dangerous precedent from the point of view of hon. Gentlemen opposite, because it is quite certain that if the thin end of the wedge is introduced of using British credit not for the relief of distress, but for the benefit of a particular section of a particular industry, the principle will be extended. In that sense, I think the Amendment of my hon. Friend is an eminently Conservative Amendment.

(7.10.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway N.): I am astonished at the approval the Amendment has met with, and at the strange suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries. What is the proposal of the hon. Member for Elgin in its naked simplicity? That for 11 years beyond the term this Bill provides the tenant shall continue to pay 4 per cent., or 44 per cent. on the purchase money. [Cries of "No, no!"] Four per cent. for 11 years—four times 11 equals 44. Taking the actual value at the present time, it is less than they will pay at the end of the term, but, practically speaking, it is a simple matter of arithmetic. The tenant may make a better or a worse bargain, but it is an outrageous proposal that the unfortunate tenant should continue to pay for at least 11 years after the term in the Bill. Then the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries threw out a suggestion for a perpetual quit rent. But we have been told ever since the time that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) initiated this subject that the object should be to turn tenants into proprietors. But this Amendment amounts to a total abandonment of this principle. A quit rent might be an advantage, and something might be said in its favour if you reduced the tenant's payment to 3 per cent.; but the proposal of the hon. Member for Elgin gives no possible advantage to the tenant of any kind or description, but simply taxes him for 11 years more for the benefit of every section of the community. It would be a great mistake to introduce anything of the kind. If you want to benefit other sections of the community do so by another Bill; this Bill is for the benefit of tenants. There are, for instance, labourers who are well entitled to such assistance; but to tax small tenants to the extent of from £5 to £15 for any other sections of the community is an absurdity. If such a proposal were included in a Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian it would be considered Tory and reactionary. But I am afraid there are some Members who, instead of trying to make this the best possible Bill, are trying to make it the best possible Bill for Party purposes. Now, I want to make it the best possible Bill for Ireland. There are some hon. Members, I am afraid, trying to run between the two. But I would urge every Irish Member to cast other views aside and simply vote on this Bill, as the Bill may be better for the Irish tenants.

(7.15.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): It seems to be conceded upon all hands that the question of public benefit cannot be discussed under the proceedings now going on. I have not heard one single Member say that he is prepared to vote for the hon. Member for Elgin's Amendment. It cannot now be fairly discussed, and why, then, should we waste these precious hours upon it? Why should we be discussing an Amendment which refers to what may or may not be done 49 years hence? I think it is folly, for nobody now cares what may be done 49 years hence by those who succeed us. [An hon. MEMBER: 49 years in the Bill.] Yes, but the hon. Member proposes that after 49 years a sum should be continued to be paid to the Treasury in respect of holdings of a certain amount, and I say it does not matter what we now decide to do; those who come after us, 49 years hence, will decide the question for themselves. Then, I ask, why should the Local Authority get this advantage? I entirely concur with the hon. Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) in what he says. I agree with the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and I should like to point this out, that there is one great Liberal principle in danger of perishing to-night—that Liberal principle of which we have heard so much—the government of Ireland according to Irish ideas. That Liberal principle has been in the past very loudly asserted from those Benches. There is, I say, a great danger of its perishing to-night. Irish Members represent the Irish local authority as well as the Irish farmers, and this is an Irish as well as an English question; this is Irish as well as English money. If it be English money, why should the Local Authority be benefited? The Irish Local Authority does not run the risk; but the Imperial taxpayer does, and if you are going to give the benefit on account of this risk, then the Imperial taxpayer should have it. But if this question is to be raised at all, I submit that it cannot be raised upon this Amendment; so let us, then, proceed to the next Amendment, which is of greater importance.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope that the Committee will now allow this discussion to drop. It is admitted that the Amendment finds no supporters, and in no shape can this Amendment bear fruit in relation to the very interesting question raised by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. I hope, then, we may now proceed to another Amendment.

(7.18.) MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): The hon. Member on my right has asked two questions: Why, he said, should we be discussing what shall be done at the end of 49 years, and for answer to that question he should ask the Government why we have this term in the Bill. Now, the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, upon which the attention of the Committee has been occupied for some time, is one of great interest and importance. The hon. Member reminds us of the Liberal principle, that Ireland should be governed according to Irish ideas; but the Government have brought in this Bill with an Imperial guarantee, and those who might be prepared to consider this as an Irish Bill must, so long as the English taxpayer is called upon to back it, take an interest in the Bill from beginning to end. With all deference to my hon. Friends the Members for Lanark and Dundee, I think in their forcible remarks they forgot one thing, which furnishes an answer to the question propounded—Who gets the benefit under this Bill? They forget the circumstances of Ireland at this moment, and what the Government have been doing for the past five years. The question before us is a similar one to that we have often had to consider in relation to the incidence of local taxation, and on whom does the incidence of local taxation fall? Where the supply is greater than the demand by the tenants the landlord has to pay the local rates, and where the demand is greater than the supply for houses then the tenant has to bear the taxation. So it is in Ireland. We know there is a land hunger, and that the tenant is in that position forcibly represented by the hon. Member for South Kilkenny, that he cares nothing for the amount his payment bears to the capital sum provided; it opens to him a way for preserving possession of the holding, the value of which he has himself created. Now, the Government have during the last five years to the utmost of their power suppressed the right of combination among the tenants; they have placed the Forces of the Crown at the disposal of the landlords, and they have destroyed freedom of contract so far as land purchase is concerned. Therefore, undoubtedly, the benefit of the Imperial guarantee, that is, the benefit of raising money for purchase at a low rate of interest, is appropriated in Ireland by the landlords. I think, too, we have had an indication of this in the very frank speech of the hon. Member for South Hunts, that if the Government did not accept his Amendment the landlords would take another way of securing the fruits of it.

(7.23.) MR. LABOUCHERE: The Chief Secretary did not consult us before inserting in his Bill the proposition for engaging the public credit for one particular class; and yet when, on consideration of this Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Elgin and Nairn proposes a valuable Amendment, up rises the Chief Secretary, and says he does not quite approve of the Amendment, thinks it has been quite sufficiently discussed, and advises the Committee to proceed to something else. Now, with all respect to the right hon. Gentleman, we really cannot accept his views either as to the Amendment or the time we should take in discussing it. Upon this, as upon most Amendments, I daresay we shall occupy more time than he would mete out to us. On the first Amendment the right hon. Gentleman moved the Closure. Let him do that when he objects to the course we are taking, but do not let him waste his time in giving us advice which we are not in the least likely to accept. Without going into details, I may say that the effect of the Amendment is simply this: My hon. Friend thinks that certain persons do derive considerable advantage from the use of the Imperial credit, and that this advantage should in some sort of way be distributed so that all may have a share in it. My hon. Member has a specific plan with which I cannot say I entirely agree, though I shall support him if he carries his Amendment to a Division, because I should regard this as a sort of Second Reading decision, the acceptance of a general principle which we may afterwards modify in various ways. The advantage of the Imperial credit is as 6½ to 4; that is to say, that 2½ per cent. is gained by the use of Imperial credit. Of this a large portion of the benefit goes to the landlords, but unquestionably the tenants will derive large advantages. And why should all the gain be with these? My hon. Friend, in effect, says by his Amendment, leave it to those who succeed us 49 years hence to say whether the advantage shall be shared by the locality or by the Kingdom generally. Some such Amendment is necessary for the purpose, else the tenants will be left absolute freeholders, and therefore cannot be called upon to pay in any way for the benefit conferred upon them.

(7.29.) MR. KEAY: I would like to make a few remarks in regard to the observations that have fallen from various hon. Gentlemen. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) says that 44 per cent. more would be charged if this Amendment were passed. I do not think the hon. and gallant Gentleman's arithmetic is in order. The increase is one of 20 per cent., and not of 4 per cent. The Amendment is so framed as, roughly speaking, to provide for a 20 per cent. increase of the aggregate instalments. The hon. and learned Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Robertson) said my Amendment struck at the root of the principle of absolute ownership of land which is offered by this Bill. I quite admit that; and I am very sorry to say that the Rules of this House made it impossible for me to go further than I did. My hon. and learned Friend beside me said he did not know the meaning of the wording of my Amendment. All I can say is, that it is strictly modelled on the clause of the Ashbourne Act. The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Knox) objected to the form of my Amendment, but did so principally on the same score as others have done, namely, that it was impossible to insert in this Bill, as a matter of Order, an Amendment which would carry out the views we have at heart. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary adopted his usual cynical vein in dealing with us mere private Members on this side of the House, and seemed rather to pride himself on the fact of how little he had got up the subject. I understood that the right hon. Gentleman was in charge of the Bill, and, therefore, was the proper referee on any point raised in the measure. He said practically that he had never read the Amendment at all, because he said I was proposing to impose not 11 but 20 years' annuity on the poor tenants, and he playfully alluded to the main argument I put forward, that the actual amount of hard cash which constitutes the boon of British credit given to those to enter into these transactions, amounts to £67,000,000. Well, I say with all humility, that if I were in the right hon. Gentleman's place in charge of this Bill, I should not come forward until I had carefully calculated for myself the magnitude of the pecuniary boon offered. I assert, in face of the right hon. Gentleman's ignorance, that the boon is proved to amount to nothing more or less than a gift of £67,000,000 as compared with the amount which the tenants and landlords could otherwise perform the transactions with. There are interest tables in the library, and I should strongly, if I might humbly venture to do so, advise the right hon. Gentleman to realise whether it is a fact or not, that this is the pecuniary boon.

SIR J. M'KENNA (Monaghan, S.): It is not the fact.

MR. KEAY: I shall be delighted at any time to argue the question with the hon. Member. The Chief Secretary said he was convinced that the tenant would not elect to pay the increased 11 years' instalment. I am glad to find the right hon. Gentleman taking up so openly the wishes of the tenants, as this is the most egregious flaw in the Bill, if he has the wishes of the tenants at heart. That, however, is not an argument against my Amendment. It is quite irrelevant to consider whether the Irish tenant wants a boon to the amount of £67,000,000 or £100,000,000. The question is this—is it a boon or is it not? If it is, the givers have a right to regulate its incidence in what they believe a just and proper manner. Before I sit down I would remind the right hon. Gentleman of what he said in bringing in the Bill last year. He told us to what extent the Irish tenant would be benefited by this British boon. He said—

That is the extent of the pecuniary boon to be given to these tenants individually; and I say, that according to the argument of the right hon. Gentleman himself, the tenant was to live and thrive and be very happy when he got his rent of £100 reduced to £68. The right hon. Gentleman's Bill provides that that arrangement shall take place in 49 years. Why should the tenant be able to comfortably live and thrive on paying £68 per annum for 49 years only? Why should he not pay it for 11 years longer? To that question the right hon. Gentleman has furnished no reply whatever, and, therefore, I say he has opposed absolutely no argument to the Amendment now on the Paper. However, as the Amendment is so ill worded, so far as the carrying out of my own wishes is concerned, and as it was only put down for the purpose of raising a discussion, and of doing good not only in the Committee but in the country with regard to the great question decided by the Report of the Select Committee on Small Holdings, and as that object has been effected, I beg leave to withdraw the proposal.

(7.43.) COLONEL NOLAN: I object to the Amendment being withdrawn. It is one of those absurd and silly Amendments that ought to be put down. I think that when such an Amendment as this is brought forward, the hon. Member proposing it should stick to it.

SIR J. M'KENNA: I also object to the withdrawal of the Amendment, seeing that the greatest possible cruelty is shown to those interested in Ireland in raising and discussing such Amendments.

(7.45.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I hope the Committee will allow the Amendment to be withdrawn, because there is an alternative to the plan proposed, and that is reducing the rents still further, and making them perpetual. The question might be determined on principle in that way so as to save the necessity of moving Amendments to the Ashbourne Act. If we are forced to go to a Division we shall have to consider whether the Government are not proposing to create a new class of landlords altogether—whether they are not seeking to get rid of one injustice by establishing another. Then I should have to support the Amendment. I think we should have the Amendment raised on other grounds. I trust that under the circumstances the hon. Member will be allowed to withdraw the Amendment.

(7.47.) MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): As the Amendment is not for the purpose of amending the Bill, but is brought forward for the purpose of ventilating a question of abstract politics, I think it should not be withdrawn. It is distinctly hostile to the interests of Irish tenants, and therefore it ought to be either adopted or definitely rejected. Speaking as a Representative of the Irish tenants, I ask the House to definitely reject the Amendment. I pay no attention to the motives suggested to us by some hon. Members, including the hon. Member for South Monaghan, who spoke here not so much as a Representative of the Irish tenants as a Representative of other interests.

SIR J. M'KENNA: I did nothing of the kind.

MR. M. J. KENNY: The hon. Member speaks for that portion of Irish landed property which at the present time is under the jurisdiction of Mr. Justice Munro. But I need not in any way lengthen this discussion. I will only characterise the Amendment as a mischievous one, which the Committee should not allow to be withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it your desire that the Amendment be withdrawn?

COLONEL NOLAN and several hon. MEMBERS: No.

Question put, and negatived.

*(7.50.) MR. P. STANHOPE (Wendensbury): I beg to move an Amendment providing that—

"A Report setting forth the amount and full particulars of every such advance provisionally assented to by the Land Commission under this Act, shall be presented to Parliament by the said Commission, and such Report shall lie upon the Table of the House for 30 days before the said advance shall receive the final sanction of the Treasury."

In spite of our protests below the Gangway, the House has decided that the Imperial credit is to be made use of, and the question arises how this House, having regard to that fact, is to retain its full control over the financial arrangements instituted under the Bill? I would point out that, under the Act which has given rise to this Bill, no less than £9,000,000 have been expended, and though Reports have been laid on the Table of the House by the Land Commissioners or the Lord Lieutenant for Ireland containing a summary of the disposition of that amount and of the general working of the Land Acts in Ireland, most of us will agree that those Reports have been extremely meagre in detail, and give us little or no information whatever with respect to the particular estates that purpose, else the tenants will be left absolute freeholders, and therefore cannot be called upon to pay in any way for the benefit conferred upon them.

(7.29.) MR. KEAY: I would like to make a few remarks in regard to the observations that have fallen from various hon. Gentlemen. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) says that 44 per cent. more would be charged if this Amendment were passed. I do not think the hon. and gallant Gentleman's arithmetic is in order. The increase is one of 20 per cent., and not of 4 per cent. I assert, in face of the right hon. Gentleman's ignorance, that the boon is proved to amount to nothing more or less than a gift of £67,000,000 as compared with the amount which the tenants and landlords could otherwise perform the transactions with. There are interest tables in the library, and I should strongly, if I might humbly venture to do so, advise the right hon. Gentleman to realise whether it is a fact or not, that this is the pecuniary boon.

SIR J. M'KENNA (Monaghan, S.): It is not the fact.

MR. KEAY: I shall be delighted at any time to argue the question with the hon. Member. The Chief Secretary said he was convinced that the tenant would not elect to pay the increased 11 years' instalment. I am glad to find the right hon. Gentleman taking up so openly the wishes of the tenants, as this is the most egregious flaw in the Bill, if he has the wishes of the tenants at heart. That, however, is not an argument against my Amendment. It is quite irrelevant to consider whether the Irish tenant wants a boon to the amount of £67,000,000 or £100,000,000. The question is this—is it a boon or is it not? If it is, the givers have a right to regulate its incidence in what they believe a just and proper manner. Before I sit down I would remind the right hon. Gentleman of what he said in bringing in the Bill last year. He told us to what extent the Irish tenant would be benefited by this British boon. He said—

That is the extent of the pecuniary boon to be given to these tenants individually; and I say, that according to the argument of the right hon. Gentleman himself, the tenant was to live and thrive and be very happy when he got his rent of £100 reduced to £68. The right hon. Gentleman's Bill provides that that arrangement shall take place in 49 years. Why should the tenant be able to comfortably live and thrive on paying £68 per annum for 49 years only? Why should he not pay it for 11 years longer? To that question the right hon. Gentleman has furnished no reply whatever, and, therefore, I say he has opposed absolutely no argument to the Amendment now on the Paper. However, as the Amendment is so ill worded, so far as the carrying out of my own wishes is concerned, and as it was only put down for the purpose of raising a discussion, and of doing good not only in the Committee but in the country with regard to the great question decided by the Report of the Select Committee on Small Holdings, and as that object has been effected, I beg leave to withdraw the proposal.

(7.43.) COLONEL NOLAN: I object to the Amendment being withdrawn. It is one of those absurd and silly Amendments that ought to be put down. I think that when such an Amendment as this is brought forward, the hon. Member proposing it should stick to it.

SIR J. M'KENNA: I also object to the withdrawal of the Amendment, seeing that the greatest possible cruelty is shown to those interested in Ireland in raising and discussing such Amendments.

(7.45.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I hope the Committee will allow the Amendment to be withdrawn, because there is an alternative to the plan proposed, and that is reducing the rents still further, and making them perpetual. The question might be determined on principle in that way so as to save the necessity of moving Amendments to the Ashbourne Act. If we are forced to go to a Division we shall have to consider whether the Government are not proposing to create a new class of landlords altogether—whether they are not seeking to get rid of one injustice by establishing another. Then I should have to support the Amendment. I think we should have the Amendment raised on other grounds. I trust that under the circumstances the hon. Member will be allowed to withdraw the Amendment.

(7.47.) MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): As the Amendment is not for the purpose of amending the Bill, but is brought forward for the purpose of ventilating a question of abstract politics, I think it should not be withdrawn. It is distinctly hostile to the interests of Irish tenants, and therefore it ought to be either adopted or definitely rejected. Speaking as a Representative of the Irish tenants, I ask the House to definitely reject the Amendment. I pay no attention to the motives suggested to us by some hon. Members, including the hon. Member for South Monaghan, who spoke here not so much as a Representative of the Irish tenants as a Representative of other interests.

SIR J. M'KENNA: I did nothing of the kind.

MR. M. J. KENNY: The hon. Member speaks for that portion of Irish landed property which at the present time is under the jurisdiction of Mr. Justice Munro. But I need not in any way lengthen this discussion. I will only characterise the Amendment as a mischievous one, which the Committee should not allow to be withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it your desire that the Amendment be withdrawn?

COLONEL NOLAN and several hon. MEMBERS: No.

Question put, and negatived.

*(7.50.) MR. P. STANHOPE (Wendensbury): I beg to move an Amendment providing that—

“A Report setting forth the amount and full particulars of every such advance provisionally assented to by the Land Commission under this Act, shall be presented to Parliament by the said Commission, and such Report shall lie upon the Table of the House for 30 days before the said advance shall receive the final sanction of the Treasury.”

In spite of our protests below the Gangway, the House has decided that the Imperial credit is to be made use of, and the question arises how this House, having regard to that fact, is to retain its full control over the financial arrangements instituted under the Bill? I would point out that, under the Act which has given rise to this Bill, no less than £9,000,000 have been expended, and though Reports have been laid on the Table of the House by the Land Commissioners or the Lord Lieutenant for Ireland containing a summary of the disposition of that amount and of the general working of the Land Acts in Ireland, most of us will agree that those Reports have been extremely meagre in detail, and give us little or no information whatever with respect to the particular estates that have been dealt with by the Commissioners. It is only indirectly and by questions put in this House that we are able to obtain information of the working of the Commission, and of the particular direction in which the public money is being expended. Now, it is in order to remedy that state of things that I have put this Amendment down on the Paper. The object is that the House should continue to discharge what after all is its primary duty, namely, to control, and efficiently superintend the expenditure of public money. As, unfortunately, an Amendment to a previous Bill—an Amendment moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, which would have brought the salaries of the Land Commissioners under the control of this House—was rejected, we must seek by some other means to effect our object. I therefore propose that the Commissioners, instead of making the rather meagre Reports they present to the Lord Lieutenant, should make more elaborate Reports, giving fuller details as to their action, which Reports should be laid on the Table of the House for 30 days, during which it should be competent for Members to offer criticisms and suggestions. The necessity for such Reports is shown by the disparity between the four provinces in respect of the purchases effected in them and the circumstances that call for such transactions. Ulster, which does not appear to be very much in need of a measure of this character, has received the largest benefit under the Ashbourne Act. In Ulster 9,379 applications have been dealt with by the Commissioners in the last five years, and £2,751,000 has been advanced; in Leinster 2,088 applications have been dealt with, and £1,794,578 advanced; in Connaught 1,725 applications, and £433,431 advanced; and in Munster 3,564 applications and £2,327,999 advanced. Consequently, Ulster has received by far the largest portion of the public money devoted to land purchase in Ireland. Proceeding on the same lines, I would point out that many of the estates that have been purchased are estates on which there was no urgent need for interference. There was no special necessity for the purchase of the properties of the Duke of Aber-

Mr. P. Stanhope

corn, the Duke of Leinster, the Marquess of Bath, the Marquess of Waterford, and the great London Companies. My own belief is, and I think it is shared by hon. Members around me, that nearly all these purchases could have been effected without the intervention of Imperial credit. Public money, if used at all, ought rather to have been used in less fortunate parts of Ireland, such as the Clanricarde, Olphert, and Ponsonby estates, which we all know have been deplorable centres of public disaffection and public disturbance. I do not say the Commissioners could have controlled these matters, because it is not for them to initiate transactions; but it would be a distinct public advantage if this House could criticise the arrangements that are made, and stimulate intervention where it seems to be most required. In some instances purchases have been made under coercion, and there have been numberless transactions and purchases forced on the tenants at prices higher than the circumstances of the cases warranted. The other day an account was given of three estates of the Duke of Leinster. On two of these estates the agents were unable to exercise pressure on the tenants to purchase. But in the case of one of these estates where there were arrears they distinctly desired to force the tenants into an arrangement, and I understand the number of years purchase, 22 years, I think, was glaringly in excess of what would have been the case had there been absolute freedom of contract. These are cases which it seems to me will properly come before this House on the occasion of the Reports being presented for sanction. I believe that on the whole a very large number of transactions, which at present escape criticism, would, in view of publicity, be modified or never brought about. I have no doubt the Chief Secretary will say that this proceeding would involve considerable delay. But already the Commissioners allow time to the parties to make investigation of the title of the vendor, with the result that the number of loans provisionally sanctioned, is far in excess of the number issued. Consequently, it does not seem to me that the effect of my proposal would be to delay the work of the Land Commission, and the delay of 30 days does not justify the criticism that it would cause confusion in the work of the Commissioners. But I come to the principal argument in favour of my Amendment. The State is going to become a great landowner in Ireland, and it does seem to me a fundamental principle of business that the State should have an account of the transactions effected in its name, and should be in a position to examine them before they become definitive. If by the decision of the majority of this House we are to give the Imperial guarantee to the amount of £30,000,000, and probably larger sums in the future, and if we are obliged to tell our constituents that we were unable to defeat the proposal, it appears to me that we ought to be in a position to tell them that we have, at all events, provided that the Representatives of the public shall have constant supervision of the expenditure of the money, so that some of the greater evils to which this Bill will lead may be mitigated, if not altogether avoided. It is a sound constitutional maxim that the public expenditure shall be always under public control, and, in order that such a principle may be incorporated in this Bill, I venture to move my Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 11, after the word "advance," to insert the words "and a Report, setting forth the amount and full particulars of every such advance provisionally assented to by the Land Commission under this Act, shall be presented to Parliament by the said Commission, and such Report shall lie upon the Table of the House for 30 days before the said advance shall receive the final sanction of the Treasury."—(Mr. Philip Stanhope.)

(8.8.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member appears to be under the impression that his Amendment carries out the ordinary conditions of Parliamentary procedure. But no doubt the hon. Member is aware that this is by no means the first Bill which has sanctioned loans in either Ireland, England, or Scotland, and in no single case has it been the practice to include a provision like this in dealing with those transactions. The transactions under this Bill will be in the nature of loans, and it is proposed to trust to the machinery which has already been instituted to see that the loans are properly made and carried out. A very large number of loans have been made under the Ashbourne Acts, 52,000 I think, and I ask what possible powers this House would have of making an investigation worth anything. The Land Commissioners make the loans on the spot, the holdings are examined, and opportunities are afforded of examining all the facts of the case. For instance, the House might be asked to disallow a loan of £20 to a tenant in the wilds of Connemara, but it would be quite unable to form an adequate judgment on the point. If the House is to be asked to take into consideration the propriety of the loans made by the Commissioners it would have nothing else to do but to discuss every night after 12 o'clock an enormous mass of small transactions. The Representatives of the tenants would raise cases in which they thought there lurked a grievance, and the same course might be followed by the Representatives of the landlord interest, and the selection of cases would be discussed, not in the interest of the Treasury, but from the point of view of rival political Parties. Of course, I agree that the House should know what is being done, and the Commissioners will be ordered to make full Reports of their transactions, and the House will thus have an opportunity of seeing what is done.

(8.13.) MR. J. MORLEY: I am glad to hear that the Commissioners are to be asked to furnish fuller and more detailed accounts than has hitherto been the practice. More detailed Returns will not give the Land Commission much more trouble than at present, and a very slight additional expense will be entailed. If those Reports are laid before Parliament, say, once every fortnight, they will be found of great advantage, and Parliament will be placed in the position of keeping its eye on the general run of the transactions. The present Reports are meagre, and it is almost essential, if Parliament is to exercise any real supervision, to have Returns pretty constantly available of all the transactions.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I will not anticipate my Amendment on the Paper, but I am very glad to hear from the Chief Secretary admission of the fact that there ought to be further information.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I admit that this House is entitled to the information it desires, and to enforce that desire, but that is a different matter to putting accurately into a Statute what information is required. But that is a matter reserved perhaps.

(8.15.) MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): There is necessity for some Amendment on this point, though, perhaps, not precisely on the line of that of my hon. Friend, with a view of obviating such a transaction as that which occurred under the Ashbourne Act, where five landlords, among them the Duke of Abercorn and the Marquess of Waterford, had £1,000,000 divided between them. Perhaps the Government will consider the question, confining the Returns to purchases above £5,000. We are going to advance no less than £30,000,000, but if we are to enable every tenant who wishes to purchase, we will require not thirty, but ninety millions. These Commissioners, who are entrusted with the machinery, will have to exercise a considerable amount of selection among the tenants who apply for loans. Now, it may reasonably be suspected that this is simply an attempt to buy out landlords who are supporters of the Government, inducing the tenants to acquiesce by giving them 20 per cent. under their purchase money. If that be so, and having regard to the administration of the Ashbourne Act, the House should clearly have the opportunity of requiring that full publicity should be given to these transactions, by laying Reports upon the Table of this House for discussion. I think, therefore, that some such Amendment as this is necessary. Why do I support the Bill? Simply because I have regard to the fearful poverty which exists in Ireland, and feel bound to assist to the best of my power in alleviating the condition of the Irish tenant. If I can do so by getting his house rent reduced by 20 per cent. I must do my best to facilitate that object by supporting the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! These remarks are outside the Amendment.

(8.20.) MR. CHANCE: I support this Amendment, and I am not at all surprised that the Chief Secretary objects to it. All through he has shown the strongest objection not only to the control of this House, but to publicity in this House. The control proposed by this Amendment would not be a very difficult one. It would be a sort of negative control, and so long as things were going on well the House would not interfere. The Returns would be in much the same position as Provisional Orders used to be. The reason why I support the Amendment is that the House might find it necessary at some stage or another to make a selection between two estates of two landlords. The amount which can be advanced in each county seems to be strictly limited. It might very well be that wealthy tenants of a landlord who had got on very well with them, and the poor tenants of a bad landlord were willing, the one to sell and the other to buy. Now, if the House had any means of selection, it is obvious that it would give money to the poorer class of tenants, and where the quieting influence of the Act was most needed. I can quite understand that the Government, in its anxiety to aid a section of disturbing landlords in Ireland, would bring pressure to bear on the Commissioners to induce them to make grants to tenants who would prove bogus tenants. The landlord would put the money in his pocket and the bogus tenants would disappear, probably to act as catspaws in other districts and on other estates. If such matters came before the House, I do not believe that any Party, I do not believe the bulk of the Conservative Party would tolerate the grant of money to landlords in perfectly bogus transactions, and simply for the purpose of carrying on a land war in Ireland. It is said that the Amendment, if adopted, would lead to a waste of the time of the House. I confess I do not think so. The public control, and the light of day, would have the effect of stopping these transactions. The Land Commissioners would know that they would be landed into trouble by them; whereas if the Amendment be not carried, money will be advanced on certain estates which I could name, and the money will afterwards have to be paid by the county because the bogus tenants will walk away as soon as they have been paid.

(8.27.) COLONEL NOLAN: I do not at all class this Amendment with that moved by the hon. Member for Northampton. I look upon it as in some respects reasonable, though injudicious. Thirty days is asked for, but I would point out that Parliament might not sit for six months, and it would be that period plus 30 days. The completion of a transaction might be delayed seven months, and the Amendment would lead to wrangles between the parties, and to a great many law suits. I cannot see how bargains can possibly be completed, if afterwards they are to be made the subject of political discussion in this House. I think the Bill would be better without the Amendment than with it.

(8.29.) MR. M. J. KENNY: The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chance) has exemplified the course attributed to us, namely, that of sailing on an even keel. He is going to vote for this Amendment; but I do not think it will secure the object which the hon. Member has in view. There is nothing in it which would stop any sale of which the House disapproved. Still, I think, it would be an exceedingly useful thing that the House should know what the Land Commissioners are doing. We want to know why the Land Commissioners should not be responsible to this House. We are to have no means of calling their conduct into question, and that is a reason why I think the House should retain some control over the matters with which they will have to deal in Ireland. I understand that an Amendment, further down, practically meets the requirements of the case. I attach no importance to the surmise of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway that the Bill might be repealed at a future date. I do not think there is any danger of such a reversal of public policy, for the principle of land purchase has been adopted by both Parties in the State. While agreeing that the House should be fully informed of what is being done by the Land Commissioners, in the same way as was secured under the Land Act of 1881, I do not think that there is any real necessity for this Amendment. (8.32.)

(9.5.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary told us that under Lord

Ashbourne's Act there have been already something like 2,000 cases of sale and purchase, and that if this Amendment had been law the House might have debated every one of them. Even if one does not go as far in admiration of the House of Commons as the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) it is hardly to be supposed that the House is going to waste its time unnecessarily in discussing the Reports of Commissioners after 12 o'clock at night. Hon. Members who raise Debates after 12 o'clock always have great difficulty in keeping a House together, and I do not think it need be feared that such Debates will be of very frequent occurrence. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) seemed to think that bargains might be unduly delayed. I think that that would not be so, but that ordinary cases of bargain would be merely laid on the Table. We have heard a good deal in Irish Debates about sales concluded under Lord Ashbourne's Act by the exercise of undue pressure and intimidation on the part of the landlords, and about the Coercion Act being used for the purpose of forcing tenants to buy at an unduly high price. It is cases of this kind that would be influenced by this Amendment, if it were passed. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary seemed to think no one would benefit by the Amendment except advocates of the landlords and tenants, who would bring the interests of their respective clients before the House. I think the taxpayers would benefit also, and it is because I think this power would be a beneficial power to have, although I think it is one that would probably have to be exercised very seldom—perhaps only once a year—that I intend to support the Amendment.

*(9.9.) MR. P. STANHOPE: The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary's principal objection to this proposal was that if the Return were made to the House the comment and criticism would be so abundant that a great portion of the time of the House would be wasted, and he went on to say that there was no precedent for a proposal of this kind, and that in every case where an advance was made by way of loan out of the Treasury, that advance passed entirely out of the control of the House. I say that that is an unsound system, although it is unfortunately one recently largely adopted by the Government in connection with the Naval Defence Act and Barracks Act. The Government have in their Bill designedly kept outside the purview of Parliament a large sum which we think ought to come under annual criticism. As soon as this money has passed out of the control of Parliament it will be used just as the Land Commissioners please. I think we ought to keep the working of this Act constantly under our control, and I do not believe that the plan I suggest will give rise to inordinate criticism or Debate. When the Return was laid on the Table, gentlemen who were specially conversant with the cases dealt with might raise a Debate on it, in the same way as can now be done in the case of any Provisional Order. We have reason to think that the working of these Acts hitherto has been largely in the interest of the great territorial magnates, and very little in the interest of the small owners. On the grounds I have mentioned we intend to insist on the Amendment.

(9.13.) MR. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): There is one point which requires clearing up. An hon. Member has stated that the Duke of Leinster will only treat with tenants who are in arrear in order that the arrears may be merged in the amount of money paid. I hope the hon. Member is mistaken; if not, I think there is good and just cause for an inquiry by a Committee of the House. It is undoubtedly the fact that the prices obtained for these properties are unusual, and could never be obtained if the properties were put up at public auction. At the same time it has been shown that such transactions as are contemplated by this Bill confer a vast amount of good upon Ireland. We are, however, guardians of the public purse, and I feel that every care should be taken that cases of the kind stated should not be permitted—indeed, if they do occur, the purchases ought to be rendered null and void. I trust the Attorney General for Ireland will be able to assure the Committee that such cases have no existence in fact. From what I know of the Commissioners I am persuaded they would not permit anything so unbusinesslike if they could prevent it.

(9.15.) MR. CHANCE: I may assure the hon. Member I have never known cases of land purchase in Ireland in which arrears of rents were not merged in the purchase money. So long as tenants are paying a solvent landlord at all punctually it is better for the landlord to go on than to sell, because in 99 cases out of 100 landlords, if they sell, find their income very considerably reduced, although they have increased security. But the usual process is this—Tenants fall into arrear; the landlord says, "This is bad business: I can not make the estate pay." He employs a man who sells estates on commission, and invariably the first inducement held out to the tenants is that if they sign an agreement, not only will their future rent be reduced, but they will also be freed from all arrears. So well aware are the Land Commissioners of this fact that lately they passed rules requiring certificates to be given by landlords showing that all arrears had been actually extinguished.

*(9.19.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): My hon. Friend the Member for Tower Hamlets seems to think that there is some danger that a sum in addition to the amount which may be safely advanced as purchase money may be added in the shape of arrears. There is no foundation for any such alarm. We are all agreed that the interests of the taxpayer should be safeguarded, but I ask whether that will not be more effectually done by a body like the Land Commission, whose duty it is to see that a holding is sufficient security for the advance, than by the House of Commons debating the matter after twelve o'clock at night without the necessary information. There has been no appreciable loss to the taxpayer as yet, and I contend that under the existing system there is complete protection.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I am afraid that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman thinks he has disposed of the question of arrears he is rather sanguine. If the hon.

Member (Mr. Wootton Isaacson), whose speech we were glad to hear, will walk into the Library——

THE CHAIRMAN: The question of arrears does not arise on the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I was merely adverting to the observations of the Attorney General for Ireland, and, perhaps, I may finish the sentence. If the hon. Gentleman will walk into the Library and refer to the Report on Irish Estates he will find a good deal about the question of arrears; he will find the Land Commissioners have been actually unsuccessful in preventing the practice to which he referred. The Amendment provides for control by this House, and such control is so essential that I shall be obliged to support the Amendment.

MR. CHANCE: There seems a complete difference of opinion upon the question of arrears.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have already pointed out that the question of arrears does not arise on this Amendment.

MR. CHANCE: I am not going to discuss the question of arrears.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman must wait until the question of arrears arises.

MR. CHANCE: I do not propose to discuss the question at all. I merely rise to say that the difference of opinion, to my mind, affords the strongest possible argument for the Amendment before the House, because, if the Amendment were carried, this information would be before the House in each case. And yet, what do we see? One supporter of the Government asks for information. I stated specifically one thing, and the Attorney General for Ireland specifically contradicted my statement. That shows an absolute necessity for the Amendment, because it shows that while we are here discussing a Bill to get rid of £30,000,000, there is a complete difference of opinion as to what is to happen with the money.

(9.25.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): If nothing else did, the great discrepancy of opinion on the important point raised by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Wootton Isaacson) would induce me to vote for this Amendment. I understand the Government to argue that there is no precedent for a proposal of this kind. There may be no precedent, but so far as I am aware, there is no precedent whatever for a Bill of this particular nature. There have been Bills to advance sums of money to the tenantry of Ireland, but there has been no Bill to land this country in what I think is pretty certain to be a dead loss of £30,000,000 sterling. There is no guarantee worth the name; all the guarantees are simply guarantees in name and not worth the paper they are written on. Therefore, I maintain it is very material in the interest of the taxpayers of this country that there should be Parliamentary control, such as is indicated by the Amendment. It is a pity the Government do not practice a little more frequently what they preach. If this Bill is an indication of the way in which they propose to protect the interests of the taxpayers of this country, the less we have of Tory protection the better. By a series of Resolutions passed a few days ago, all the salaries of the men who will have the working of the Act have been placed on the Consolidated Fund, and therefore the House of Commons will have no control over them. What opportunity shall we have of discussing the administration of this Bill? If any job is perpetrated by one of these gentlemen and we raise the question in the House we shall be told, "Oh! these gentlemen are Judges, and then Judges do not come within the purview of the House of Commons." I think when the Government claim to hold the scales fairly as between these two claimants, they should be very careful before they pose in such a way to show us that they carry out the principles that they preach. There is a further reason why such control should be secured in future Sessions by the House of Commons. There would no doubt be considerable opportunity arising under the administration of this Act to throw some enlightenment upon the abominations that may be practised under the Act, and to bring home to the people of England the disastrous position in which they have placed themselves by putting a Tory Government in office—a Tory Government pledged against a Bill of this character—pledged against the use of the British credit to secure a high expenditure for the benefit of Irish landlords. All their election pledges have been broken, and I think it is well to enlighten the country upon this point, and hence it is that we wish to push an Amendment of this kind which will secure the free criticism of the House of Commons. Then the Attorney General for Ireland says, "But how much better off will you be if you only have an opportunity of raising a discussion after 12 o'clock at night, and such questions will then only be decided upon side issues, and by Members who will probably not be in the House itself while the discussion is going on." Well, there are Members on this side who certainly have studied these matters, and who perhaps might be able to convey instruction and information even to Her Majesty's present advisers. These it may be hoped, would be able to influence the judgment of the House upon any land question raised, and to point out acts of jobbery transacted for the benefit of the landlords. If we are unable to compel the Government to allow such discussion to be taken earlier, well, then we must take it after midnight. And I may also remind the Attorney General for Ireland that the existence of a Tory Ministry is not a matter of perpetuity, and probably the changes that will occur after the next General Election may induce him and his friends, when out in the cold shades of Opposition, to thank us if we had secured such an opportunity as this.

(9.33.) MR. SEXTON: I am in favour of full particulars of all transactions under the Act being put before the House, and nothing but good could result from such a practice. But when the hon. Member goes on to propose that the Report shall lay upon the Table for certain days, there, I think, we reach a point of policy very much open to question. The effect will be to expose the Act to perpetual review and also to what I may call fragmentary repeal, putting it in the power of a Parliamentary majority at any moment to cancel a particular operation under the Act. Of course, we cannot be certain but that at any particular hour a majority might occupy these benches opposed to the Act as a whole, and might indulge that policy under cover of an objection to any particular transaction under the Act. It would be an evil, and, I feel, a dangerous thing if every farmer or landlord were liable to have his bargain reviewed not only by the Land Commission, but also by the House of Commons. This would introduce an element of uncertainty very likely to impede transactions, and I am desirous that every facility shall be offered and every cause for delay removed. But suppose a transaction completed in the month of August, and the House having risen in July, then, under this Amendment, it would be necessary to wait until the House met again in the January following, and then to wait for a further period of 30 days. In point of fact, the whole transaction would be kept in suspense for a period of half a year, and I cannot but think that that would be prejudicial to the working of the Act. Of course, I recognise that such an Amendment might be a protection against duress to one party in these transactions, but that I think should be secured in quite another way, and I hold that there would be ample security if the salaries of the land Commissioners were put upon the Votes and subjected to the control of this House, and that these Financial Commissioners should not be treated in the matter of salaries as if they were Judges, under this Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is anticipating a future question that may arise under the Bill.

MR. SEXTON: I will not argue it. I only wish to indicate that that is one way of meeting the objection. This, I think, is the wrong method of doing so, and for the reasons I have stated I cannot vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend. When the time comes, however, I shall be prepared to support a proposal for keeping the Commissioners' salaries upon the Votes before the House of Commons.

(9.37.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I agree with the remarks of my hon. Friend as to the latter part of the Amendment, but I think that the earlier portion of it well deserves consideration at the hands of the Committee, and especially in view of the light of our experience, for we have had some experience under the Purchase Act. I refer especially to one case which has been put before us, namely, that of a large landed proprietor in a particular county of Ireland, who had three different estates in that county. Upon one estate the rents had been paid with remarkable punctuality, but on the other two the rents were generally in arrears. The tenants who were in arrear were allowed—I will not use a stronger term—were allowed to purchase. The tenants on the estates where they were not in arrear applied to be allowed to purchase, and they were not allowed to do so at all. The tenants who were in arrear found it to their advantage to come to terms with their landlord, whatever may have been the inducement, to bring about that conclusion. The Return which has been presented to the House shows us this result. This is the kind of thing which results from purchase, that the holdings of the tenants in arrear are purchased at 22 or 23 years, the purchase money covering the arrears. When there are no arrears, there is no means of purchase. This is how the Land Purchase Act is worked, and this is how it may be expected to work in the future. Under the circumstances, it does not appear to me unreasonable that Parliament should be furnished with information of the most detailed kind of the transactions that are allowed to take place from time to time. If a Division is taken, I shall support the first part of the Amendment, but I quite agree with my hon. Friend that the second part is one that we cannot support.

*(9.40.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I quite agree with the hon. Member for Belfast that it is hardly desirable that we should adopt an Amendment of this character, which, undoubtedly, would throw an impediment in the way of business, and make the working of the Act almost impracticable. At the same time, I do think that information should be laid on the Table of the House as to completed transactions. There is an Amendment later on in the name of the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division, and it seems to me that this should recommend itself to the Government, and probably it might shorten the discussion if the right hon. Gentleman expresses his willingness to accede to this.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: He has done so.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I was not aware of that; but, upon that understanding, I shall vote against the Amendment now before the House.

*(9.42.) MR. P. STANHOPE: I regret that the right hon. Gentleman should take that view. He seems to misconceive the object of the Amendment, which is to secure the continuous criticism of the House of Commons, and continual control over the distribution of these £30,000,000. Notwithstanding the comments of my friends from Ireland, I shall persist in my Amendment. I can quite understand the position of hon. Members from Ireland. They are anxious to secure in a positive and final manner this large grant of money for land purchase. They are afraid perhaps that at some subsequent period, possibly a Radical majority may be returned, and some of us may be inclined to say that we have gone far enough. That we think the book should be closed, and that we should re-consider our position. Our Irish friends are anxious that an eventuality of that sort should not occur. Now, I admit that they have claims in a financial sense upon Great Britain. There is an open and unsettled account between Great Britain and Ireland in financial matters, and I should be willing to make them a free gift of any sum which may be proved to be owing in consequence of unfair financial arrangements in the past. But I do object to this system under which Parliamentary control is to be withdrawn, and a large sum of money is to be expended upon Irish land in such form as to create a tributary charge from Ireland to England. With great respect, therefore, I must insist in submitting my Amendment to the judgment of the House.

Ayes 52; Noes 159.—(Div. List, No. 128.)

(9.59.) MR. CONYBEARE: The reason why I move this Amendment is because it seems to me that the landlords should share in the risk that these transactions would involve. So far as I have studied this complicated measure, the one class of individuals which Her Majesty's Government seem anxious to protect are the landlords of Ireland. Now my object is to try and make them share the loss, for probably there will be a very large loss inflicted upon the taxpayers of the country. I presume, if the Amendments were accepted, that in certain cases the landlords would find themselves out of pocket, at any rate to the extent of the interest upon their guarantee. Now, considering the history of a great many of these landlords, it is really absurd that they alone should be protected, for it is entirely through their conduct in the past that the necessity for a Bill of this kind has been brought about, and in common fairness we must question their claim to pocket the advantages this Bill offers without let or hindrance. I object to that principle altogether. It is because the tyranny of some landlords has put them outside the rule of consideration that I propose this Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 11, after the word "advance," to insert the words "the guarantee to be a first charge upon such advance."—(Mr. Conybeare.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(10.1.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I find some sort of difficulty in dealing with this Amendment, because I do not understand the purport of it. Sub-section 1 refers to Guaranteed Land Stock, and the guarantee there is, of course—the guarantee of British credit. How that guarantee is to be made a first charge on the advance I cannot see, nor how the operation is to be carried out, or what effect it will have if carried out. I am hardly in a position, therefore, to reply to the hon. Member.

(10.3.) MR. CHANCE: The thing is very simple. If the tenant makes a default of payment the Treasury has to pay up, and then what the Treasury has spent in paying up is made a first charge in respect of the Stock that has been paid up. Having paid up $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., that $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., if it is not paid by the tenant, has to be the first charge on the Stock itself. The House has already decided that there should be some sort of guarantee, and it appears to me that the effect of the Amendment, if it is carried, will be to nullify that decision.

(10.5.) THE CHAIRMAN: I think it would be better if the hon. Member for Camborne were to explain his Amendment.

MR. CONYBEARE: I am exceedingly unwilling to trespass unnecessarily on the time of the House, but as I cannot help obeying the Chair—your command I may say, Sir—I will endeavour to explain my Amendment to the best of my ability. There are some Members of the Committee who understand the mysteries of finance better than I can pretend to do, and I believe that those who enjoy that distinction—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must invite the hon. Member to proceed with his explanation at once. Without an explanation his Amendment cannot be put.

(10.6.) MR. CONYBEARE: I will do so. In these cases a Preamble is sometimes useful; but if the Committee does not desire to hear my Preamble, I will proceed with my explanation, though it appears to me that the explanation I gave just now was ample for the purpose I had in view. Under the Bill as it stands the only party protected is the landlord. That I object to, and I wish to introduce words into the Bill which will make the landlord bear a share of any loss. So little attention was paid to my remarks when I first addressed the House that I think it is rather hard that I should be called on to repeat my arguments.

(10.8.) THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is under a misapprehension. He is not called upon to repeat any arguments, but merely to state what he

MR. CONYBEARE: If I did not convey my meaning before, I am bound to say that my intention has just been so admirably put before the Committee by the hon. Member for South Kilkenny that I should be only further obscuring the issue were I to mix up my thoughts with those of the hon. Member, and to attempt to penetrate the skulls and minds of hon. Members opposite.

THE CHAIRMAN: I call on the hon. Member to resume his seat, and I call on the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottingham to propose his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 11, after the word "advance," to insert the words "Quarterly returns shall be made up to the end of the months of March, June, September, and December in each year, and as soon as practicable laid before Parliament, giving the following particulars respecting such advances:—(1.) Province and county; (2.) Landlord's name; (3.) Number of holdings; (4.) Area in statute acres; (5.) Tenement valuation; (6.) Rental (whether judicial or non-judicial); (7.) Purchase amount; (8.) Advance sanctioned; (9.) Name of purchaser."—(Mr. John Ellis.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(10.11.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We had a previous discussion on the matter, and I explained the intentions of the Government in substance. I do not know that this is the most convenient place for the Amendment; but as we have already discussed the matter, I do not see that there is any reason why we should not settle the matter at once. I accept the Amendment.

MR. SEXTON: I think that in No. 6, after "rental," the word "showing" should be inserted.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear.

(10.13.) MR. CHANCE: I have a previous Amendment in No. 3. It seems to me that the information given in this form would be useless. What we want to know are the particulars of each purchase. I move, therefore, to omit the "s" from the word "holdings," so that it may cover particulars so far as each individual tenant on the estate is concerned. I think the word should be put in the singular.

THE CHAIRMAN: To strike the word out altogether would be the proper way to proceed.

MR. CHANCE: I move to strike it out.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, after "number of" to omit "holdings," in order to insert "holding."—(Mr. Chance.)

Question, "That 'holdings' stand part of the proposed Amendment," put, and negatived.

Question, "That the word 'holding' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

VOL. CCCLII. [THIRD SERIES.]

(10.15.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I would make a suggestion to the Committee. We were not aware that the Government were prepared to accept the proposal of my hon. Friend in reference to this Return. It seems hardly in the competency of the Committee at a moment's notice to amend this Amendment so as to make the Returns perfect. I would suggest that the Government should prepare what they think a suitable Return, and bring it up on Report. We should then be able to consider it on due notice.

(10.16.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot accept that suggestion. The hon. Member seems to think that the Government made up their mind to accept the Amendment at the last moment, and that when they do that the Committee should be allowed time to consider the decision arrived at. That is not the way to discuss these matters. We are prepared to amend the Amendment, and I think we should now follow that course. The Amendment to No. 3 has been agreed to. I think we should now agree to the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for West Belfast, which would give all the particulars the Committee desire as to each holding.

(10.17.) MR. MACNEILL: I think you should also include the number of cases where the Land Commissioners refuse purchase. I find that since the Ashbourne Act came into operation there have been 3,426 applications for purchase refused.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think it desirable to make statutory orders on too large a scale when arranging for a Parliamentary Return. The Committee is of opinion that the Returns should include the particulars already specified. In addition we shall have annual or biennial Reports, and in those Reports all other information not included in the Returns will be given.

(10.18.) MR. CONYBEARE: I do not see in the particulars any reference to arrears. I think it would be important that we should know the arrears outstanding in each case. I do not know if that occurs to the mind of my hon. Friend, but I think the matter is important, and I hope he will accept the suggestion, or, if not, that the Chief Secretary will state whether or not he sees any objection to embodying the proposal in the Return.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We shall know what the arrears are when the transaction takes place.

MR. CONYBEARE: We should know it before.

THE CHAIRMAN: Before proceeding to suggest further additions we should deal with the Amendments on the Paper.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment No. 6, after "rental," to insert "showing."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question, "That the word 'showing' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment agreed to, to omit the word "amount" in No. 7, in order to insert the word "money." — (Mr. Chance.)

*(10.19.) MR. KNOX: I beg to move after No. 7, to insert "The amount of arrears due six months before the agreement of purchase." I think this will meet the difficulty suggested by the Chief Secretary in reply to the hon. Member. If we take arrears due immediately before the date of the agreement it will be easy for the landlord to dodge the Return by giving the arrears due just before the signing of the agreement. I have heard of a case where that was done. If we say "Arrears due six months before the date of the purchase," we shall provide against that, and shall be able to provide in a later clause of the Act that a statutory declaration shall be made giving the amount of the arrears.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, after the last Amendment, to insert the words "8. Amount of arrears due six months before agreement."—(Mr. Knox.)

Question proposed, "That those words be inserted in the proposed Amendment."

(10.21.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think that, after all, the amount of arrears is not a matter of which the Land Commission can be officially cognisant. The Commissioners do not possess the machinery to make the Return suggested. If there are any questions of duress having been exercised on the purchaser, the exact amount of the arrears is immaterial, because a year's arrears would be as effective for purposes of duress as arrears for a much longer period.

*(10.22.) MR. KNOX: My Amendment is strictly germane to the business of the Land Commission. The Commissioners have to inquire into the security for the advance afforded by the holding, and, therefore, it is necessary to know whether the tenant has or has not been able to pay the rent previously exacted. It is perfectly easy to provide by a distinct clause the machinery for obtaining this information. In the agreement the landlord and the tenant have to make certain statutory declarations, and in these declarations can be included the amount of arrears due six months previously. It is true that arrears may have accumulated merely from laxity in the administration of the estate, but even then it has always been understood between landlord and tenant that such arrears can be exacted, though in ordinary times they are not called up.

(11.35.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): There is another reason why it is desirable that the Chief Secretary should assent to the hon. Member's Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman undoubtedly referred to one motive—perhaps the governing one—which induced the hon. Member to press this Amendment, namely, that we should have some indication as to whether or not these sales are conducted under duress. I do not say that the answer of the Chief Secretary did not, to a certain extent, meet that reason, though I still think it important that we should have this information. I gather that the general object of the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division in his proposal is not quite the same as that of the hon. Member who moves the present Amendment. The hon. Member regards himself as a Representative of the country, and the country at large has a right to know what sort of estates the Government are buying for a period of 49 years. There is no single head in the suggested Return which could throw more light on the nature of the purchased property than that which shows what amount of arrears was due six months before the date of purchase. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, I think, says that in some cases a large amount of the arrears comes from the fact that there is lax administration of the estates. Now, be it remembered that when the State takes over the estates it cannot afford to be as lax an administrator as the landlords. It is bound absolutely, by the conditions of the bargain, to exact the rent. It is quite useless to say that the Land Commission is not in a condition to inquire into the question of whether there are arrears or not. The Land Commission is bound to fix in each case the number of years' purchase, and the main point governing the decision is whether the rents on the property can or cannot be easily exacted. For instance, property in West Galway or Kerry will not sell for the same amount as property of the same nominal value situated in Wexford, for the reason that the nominal rental is got in with much greater difficulty in West Galway and Kerry. Therefore, it is to enable Members of Parliament, for the county which they represent, to gather whether or not these bargains are good ones, and such as they ought to sanction, that this information is asked for. There can be no information for this purpose more important than whether or not the rent has been regularly paid. I must say that these seem to me reasons why Irish Members, and still more, perhaps, Scotch Members, ought to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member.

(10.29.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I would suggest a way out of the difficulty for the Chief Secretary, who no doubt finds it hard to grant the Return in the form asked for, for the reason that the Land Commissioners may say, "We do not know the extent of the arrears." His argument is that perhaps there are estates where large amounts of arrears are allowed to accumulate, but that the arrears must not be taken as a mark of pressure, but rather of condescension, on the part of the landlord. What I would suggest is this: Omit the question of arrears, but if within 12, 15, or 18 months, or any reasonable period, the tenants have been served with writs of ejectment or any legal processes of that kind previous to the agreement, that might be stated on the Return. Because from that it would be possible to see what is the actual amount of the arrears. That, I think, is a reasonable way out of the difficulty. Very often a tenant does not know how much he is in arrear, and I myself have known scores of cases in which landlords have made it a regular practice to refuse to give receipts.

MR. CONYBEARE: I think that the addition it has been proposed to make to the Return would be a valuable one, because it would show who are the tolerable and who are the intolerable landlords, although I do not think it would fully meet the difficulty. We require to know whether we are investing our money in a profitable speculation, and I must say that as far as I understand the Bill, I do not know a single instance in which we should be able to make a profitable investment. In answer to what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, I would point out that under the Arrears Bill of 1880, which I have in my hand, sufficient powers are given to the Commission to obtain all the information we require. By the first section of that Bill it is provided that if it be proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that the yearly rent has been paid or that antecedent arrears are due, and the tenant is unable to discharge such arrears, then the Land Commissioner may make an order, and so forth. Therefore, it is perfectly competent to the Commissioners to ascertain the particulars we are asking for.

(10.36.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, it would be the duty of the Land Commission to inquire into the solvency of the tenant who proposed to purchase his holding. I have no doubt that the relations existing between landlord and occupier and the amount of rent due are matters which will be inquired into. What I wish to point out to the Committee is that the amount of arrears due is perhaps the least important matter from the point of view of future solvency of a tenant. There are many other matters which have to be ascertained. There is the amount of stock which a man has on his farm, the amount of shop debts, and his indebtedness to others than the landlord. I feel, therefore, that I shall certainly adhere to the advice I gave to the Committee not to assent to this proposal, which, I think, has been adequately discussed.

MR. CHANCE: Why could not the Government assent to this arrangement, when the landlord and tenant have signed the contract and put an affidavit on the back of the document, certifying certain particulars, which the tenant is bound to give. One of these particulars might be that the tenant should also state the arrears of rent in addition to the encumbrances which are already provided for. In that case, no further inquiry would be necessary. This being so, I ask whether there is anything to be gained by carrying on this discussion.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I wish to point out in answer to what the right hon. Gentleman has just said that we are not considering the question of the solvency of the tenant at the present moment. What we want to know is whether the price paid for the guarantee is a fair and legitimate price. A private person wishing to make a purchase of land in Ireland would send his agent to ascertain whether the price asked represented a real or a fictitious rent—whether, in fact, the money had been paid or not, that being an essential element in the transaction. We have a duty to perform to our constituents, who, being the taxpayers, constitute the guarantee in the purchases proposed. We want these Returns in order that we may have some sort of control over these transactions, and if we find that the rent-rolls returned to us are sham rent-rolls, we have a right to protest against the action of the Land Commissioners.

(10.48.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I would put it to the House whether the information asked for by the Amendment would enable us to form a better judgment on the matter under discussion? I maintain that the statement of the arrears of rent on any particular property would not help us in the decision as to whether the price to be paid is too large; to render that information of any value you would have to enlarge it considerably by stating when the arrears began to accumulate, how much they amounted to in each year, what was the condition of agriculture during those years, and many other things which would render the inquiry almost interminable. All the Land Commissioners really have to satisfy themselves about is as to whether the land about to be purchased is a good security for the purchase money. That is a far more important question for this House and the country than the question of the solvency of the tenant, because the value of the land is the security for the payment of the money advanced by the country and not the position of the tenant. It is, moreover, absurd to say that the question of arrears has anything to do with the question whether the rent is a fair rent or not. I have only to add that I think the tendency of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan) would be to induce those who intend to become purchasers of land in Ireland to accumulate arrears, so that they might be enabled thereby to cut down the number of years purchase they would be asked to give for the property.

MR. M. J. KENNY: I wish to point out that by Rule 5 the Commissioners before deciding any question relating to an agreement for purchase or making any advance are to be satisfied that the tenants' rent up to the last gale day has either been paid, satisfied or released; that Rule throws the onus upon the landlord of showing what is the amount of arrears due, and I should point out further that the servants of the Land Commission are bound to inquire what arrears are due. Therefore the Commissioners have the means of supplying the House with the information asked for. This being so I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to accepting the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman will see that Rule 5 only provides that the Commissioners shall be satisfied that the rent has been paid, satisfied or released. But does not go on to say that the property shall be unburthened by any arrears of rent.

(10.55.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I would ask the Chief Secretary seriously to re-consider his decision. I think it hardly fair that he should treat our arguments in the purely dialectic manner he assumes, whereby he evades the entire point of the discussion. The right hon. Gentleman assumes that the only question the State has to consider is the solvency of the tenant and his ability to pay the instalments. I say that that is not the only question. The main question is, do the contracting parties enter into the bargain with free minds? Take the case of leases in Ireland. It was declared, I believe, in 1870 by Lord Selborne that the lease in a case before him had been carried out under such duress that if taken into any Court of Equity, the document would have been set aside at once. Now what is this case? It is one in which the State advances public money to the landlord, who may take himself off next morning, having got the money in his pocket, not caring a rap what becomes of the tenants, and after that the tenant is to be saddled on to the estate for 49 years, the only thing the State has to consider being whether he is able to pay the annual instalments during that period. I should have imagined that in a matter of this kind the Government would be prepared to provide the House of Commons with the fullest means of forming the best judgment. But instead of this, the right hon. Gentleman shows that he is merely directing his attention to the best means of procuring that which the landlords, on whose behalf he is now acting, shall procure the money they require.

*(11.0.) SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I do not see that the fact of having information as to the arrears of the tenant proves anything whatever. The real question is as to the simple value of the land, and whether the bargain is good and fair. It is not as to the character of a particular tenant, or as to the amount of his arrears. I do not think it is advisable that we should have an accumulation of Returns to this House. It will not assist hon. Members in arriving at a clear decision on the question.

(11.2.) MR. CHANCE: Earlier in the evening I went into the question, and I showed that in the negotiations which preceded purchase the first thing done was to ascertain the normal value of the land, and then to make additions according to the number of years arrears owing by a tenant purchaser. I think it would be very easy for the Commissioners to obtain Returns of the arrears owing, and I would appeal to the Attorney General for Ireland to say whether the Commissioners will have any difficulty in obtaining them. Surely there is nothing in the world to prevent the Land Commission adding to the contract Schedule a statement showing what the arrears are, and there is no reason why the tenant should not answer upon oath any question which the Land Commission may desire to ask of him.

*(11.5.) MR. MADDEN: No doubt they can obtain it, but the question is whether the information is material to the issue with which the House has to deal.

(11.6.) MR. CONYBEARE: When I originally proposed this Amendment I thought it was a point of which everyone in this Committee would admit the importance. The questions raised are first as to the placing the tenants under duress, and, secondly, as to the solvency of the tenant. Both of these points are connected with material safeguards under this Bill. Enormous sums of money are being voted, as is supposed for the benefit of the tenantry, and certainly they will go to the benefit of the landlords, and we shall have no right to complain if the House is ultimately placed under duress in having to evict tenants who cannot pay instalments based upon arrears as well as upon value. I should like to know what would be the value of these Irish estates if there were no tenantry to cultivate them, and if the landlords were compelled to cultivate their own acres. It appears to me that the question of the solvency of the tenant is an absolutely new element in this matter. I put it to the hon. Members opposite, who seem to think this is mere nonsense, whether any reasonable landlord in considering the letting of a farm to a tenant, either here or in Ireland, would not bear in mind the question whether or not that tenant was solvent and able to fulfil the obligations which he thus took upon himself. Now this question of arrears, raised as it is on this point, must result either in the tenant being unable to pay, and therefore the land constituting a bad security, or a man being plunged hopelessly into debt by some means or other. It appears to me that the arguments against the Government on this point are absolutely unanswerable. I believe there is something behind all this. I am convinced that this is an important Amendment, and I hold that it is desirable in the interests of the British taxpayer that we should make our views known. I hope hon. Members will insist on getting from the Government a more satisfactory explanation on this point.

(11.12.) MR. KEAY: I think the proof of the desirableness of making known the magnitude of arrears may be found in the Return recently presented to this House on the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Rushcliffe. According to the Return, the average rate of purchase under the Ashbourne Acts is about 19 years' purchase of the Poor Law valuation, but looking at the tenants now in default, and whose holdings have become worthless to them and dangerous to the British taxpayer, it is found by the capitalization of the arrears that the average purchase-money exacted from the poor men amounts to no less than 25 years' purchase on the Poor Law valuation. I hold that that is an instructive fact. I know the right hon. Gentleman claims that under his scheme the tenant will only have to pay £68 for each £100 value, but I venture to suggest that this high value is based mainly on the arrears.

*(11.14.) MR. KNOX: We do not ask for anything but information; the Land Commission has to satisfy itself whether or not the arrears have been paid, and in order to do so must know when the arrears have been paid. The facts are, therefore, clearly within the cognisance of the Commission, and, even if they are not, all this information can be obtained by inserting another column in the description of the holding, which is sworn to by the tenant when he signs the agreement. I think we have a right to demand this information.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Question be now put;" but the CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question, because it was unnecessary, inasmuch as the Committee was willing to come to a decision without Closure.

Ayes 123; Noes 197. — (Div. List, No. 129.)

Amendment amended, by inserting after the word "sanctioned," the words,
Mr. Conybeare

"9. Guaranteed Deposit." — (Mr. Chance.)

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

*(11.32.) MR. KNOX: I beg to propose the Amendment which stands in my name. I take it to be the intention of the Government that in every case the Stock shall be sufficient to satisfy the purchase money up to its nominal amount, and I think it would be well that this should be distinctly stated.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 11, to insert after the words last inserted, "and such Stock, as between the landlord and tenant of the holding purchased, shall be accepted by the landlord as equal in value to the nominal amount thereof."—(Mr. Knox.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not believe the Amendment is necessary, but it is quite in accordance with the intentions of the Government, and I accept it.

Question put, and agreed to.

(11.34.) MR. KEAY: The Amendment I have now to move is in line 13, to leave out "fifteen" and insert "ten." I desire that there should be such an arrangement effected by this Bill that no one class of holders of public funds created in the present day shall have an undue advantage over any other class. I am pleased on this occasion to feel thoroughly at one with the opinions which I know have been entertained by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman in 1888 carried out what we all know was a very excellent and successful scheme of conversion. He succeeded in converting something like £500,000,000 of the National Debt practically from 3 to 2½ per cent. What was the reason why the right hon. Gentleman entered into that scheme? I assert fearlessly that there was only one reason, and that was that he believed as a matter of financial prophecy—and I think with the little experience I have I can thoroughly join in the prophecy—[Cries of "Question!"] I am speaking directly to the question; Gentlemen who call out "Question" do not understand the Bill. I say the right hon. Gentleman rightly gauged the future. His sense of justice would have been revolted if he had not believed that the country would be able to borrow money, say for the next 50 years, at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.—in other words that the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. securities of the Government would stand at about par. It is of no use whatever for anyone to come forward now, as gentlemen have done to-night, and point to the fact that what are practically $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Consols are now at 96. The right hon. Gentleman was legislating for the century, or, at all events, for the half-century to come, when he converted the Stock, and I say that this Bill likewise makes provision for the coming half-century. I am very curious to hear what the Chancellor of the Exchequer will say to justify his creation of a higher Stock at the present moment than that which he has recently so successfully dealt with. The right hon. Gentleman knows that the effect of his proposal will be that the Land Stock will steadily rise until it reaches from 6 to 8 per cent. premium. The right hon. Gentleman is going to present the landlords with the most enormous privilege under his Bill in allowing them to fix their own price for the land. Say that a landlord fixes £100 as the price of a certain plot of land, the right hon. Gentleman puts a bit of scrip into the landlord's pocket which will sell in the market for £106 or £108. He is deliberately putting a premium of from 6 to 8 per cent. on the top of the landlord's valuation of his own land. There is, to my mind, no equity in that. Luckily for my contention the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer have shut the door upon an argument they might otherwise have brought forward. They might have argued that Land Stock, being an uncertain and unknown Stock and a new Stock, might not become a favourite in the market, and consequently it was desirable that there should be something to tempt the public to take it up. They have, however, provided that the landlords shall have the option of exchanging it at par for Consols. I say this is a most unjust and outrageous provision. It is playing against the English nation the game commonly known as "heads I win, tails you lose." What does it mean? Let us take a case: Suppose that 10 or 20 years hence the Land Stock is in great favour; that the land purchases have been very successfully carried out; that the tenants are paying up very well; that this $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is supposed to be as secure as Two and a Half per Cent. Consols. The result is evident. The Land Stock will be at a premium of from 6 to 8 per cent., and the landlords will not exchange for Consols. But suppose, on the other hand, that the operations of this Bill result in conclusions dangerous to the State—in tremendous political convulsions and social upheavals; what will happen then? The Land Stock, although it may bear a higher interest, will go below par, and the landlords will take advantage of this clause and exchange the Stock for Consols. I think I have said quite enough. [Ministerial cheers.] I understand those cheers; they come from the landlords sitting below the Gangway opposite. I understand what the hon. Gentlemen want. They do not want to be informed, but simply to hasten the stream of British gold into their pockets and those of their landlord friends. I have explained my Amendment as briefly as I can, and I commend it specially to the favourable consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the two separate reasons I have given.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 13, to leave out the word "fifteen," and insert the word "ten."—(Mr. Keay.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'fifteen' stand part of the Bill."

(11.45.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): The hon. Member assumes that this side of the House is composed of landlords.

MR. KEAY: I said below the Gangway.

MR. GOSCHEN: If statistics were prepared on the subject, I think it would be found there are quite as many landlords on that side of the House as on this. The hon. Member suggests that this Stock should be reduced from £2 15s per cent. to £2 10s. He seems to think that Two and Three-quarter per Cent. Stock of this kind is sure to rise very much above par.

MR. KEAY: If $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent is par.

MR. GOSCHEN: There is at present Stock guaranteed as this Stock is, and charged on the Consolidated Fund, and which bears interest at the rate of 3 per cent., namely, the Local Loan Stock. That Stock stands at 102. If the Local Loan Stock at 3 per cent. stands at 102 I think the hon. Member and the Committee will see that Two and Three quarter per Cent. Stock is not likely to take the position the hon. Gentleman assigns to it. What we desire is that the landlords should get par for their Stock. This Stock will stand between Consols and the Local Loan Stock. As regards the other points raised by the hon. Gentleman, he will bear in mind it is only within limits fixed by the Treasury that this Stock can be exchanged for Consols.

(11.50.) Mr. KEAY: I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman thinks he has traversed my remarks; but, in sitting down, I specially asked him to reply to two points. He has not replied to them. Of course, when he takes the present value of the Two and a Half per Cent. Consols at 96, we all know that Three per Cent. Consols would be 102. That is just exactly—[The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER rose to intervene.] I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. [Ministerial cheers.] I do not think the statement is of such a character as necessarily to elicit that cheer. How does he justify his statement that he must take the present market price when his whole conduct for years past proves that, in his judgment, the legitimate price of Consols for the next half century will be par at 2½ per cent.? I call upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say if it is not the case that he believed in 1888, and still believes, that in the grand future par is to be found as the measure of 2½ per cent. interest on the National Debt.

(11.54.) Mr. T. M. HEALY: I expected the Chancellor of the Exchequer would make some statement to-night as to why he invented this Stock, practically giving the Irish landlord a better bargain than the taxpayers. The landlords of Ireland have done nothing whatever except bring misery to the country, and yet he gives them a far better bargain for clearing out than he gives to the fundholder who has invested his money with the State. I trust the fundholding classes, who are largely Conservative, and who really do not owe very many thanks to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, will take into view the different treatment the Chancellor of the Exchequer has meted out to that deserving class, to that he has meted out to a class of gentlemen who have nothing to show except a few worn-out crowbars and battering-rams.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: If the right hon. Gentleman were to issue Consols as suggested by the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton at 3½ per cent., reducible in 15 years to 2½ per cent., in all probability it is reasonable to suppose they would stand at par. The object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer surely is to get this money as cheaply as he possibly can. Will he explain why on earth he does not issue Consols?

Mr. GOSCHEN'S reply was inaudible in the Gallery.

Mr. KEAY: Will the right hon. Gentleman kindly answer my question?

Mr. CONYBEARE: The right hon. Gentleman said just now that the Government are anxious to give the landlords Stock at par. I am not anxious to do anything of the kind. I have not the slightest sympathy with the object of the right hon. Gentleman—

Clause 4.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Dr. Tanner.)

(12.1.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): May I appeal to the hon. Member to allow this Bill to proceed? It is of importance to the public interest that legislative sanction should be given to these proposals without delay.

(12.1.) Dr. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I would suggest to the right hon.

Gentleman that if it is necessary to proceed with the measure he should put it down as first Order of the Day. I really must object to measures being rushed through after midnight.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow, at Two of the clock.

LONDON (CITY) TRIAL OF CIVIL CAUSES BILL.—(No. 269.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.3.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I hope the House will take the Second Reading now. It is simply a Bill to remove doubt whether civil cases can be taken in the City of London. There is in fact no alteration of the law. The question has been raised whether nis prius trials can take place in the City of London at the Guildhall.

Dr. TANNER: I object.

(12.3.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I notice on the Paper a series of little Bills of this character such as are usually made the subject of barter and arrangement between ourselves and the Government towards the end of a Session. Now, if we allow these Bills to go through now, we lose all the advantage of these Autumn manoeuvres, sometimes very useful to us. The Government seem to be prematurely delivered of a number of these Bills, and it is unusual to attempt to rush them at this period of the Session. I think the City of London, having waited so long for this Bill, can well wait a few weeks longer.

(12.4.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): A little time ago, in the course of the Debate, a Member of the Government pointed out as an objection to certain proposals made from this side of the House, that the House would be under the necessity of discussing Returns and approving transactions under the Land Purchase Bill after 12 o'clock at night. Upon the same grounds we may object to Bills being taken after midnight.

Second Reading deferred till to-morrow, at Two of the clock.

LOCAL REGISTRATION OF TITLE (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 189.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.5.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I hope the House will allow this Bill to be read. Its object is useful and necessary, and it is accepted on both sides of the House.

MR. CONYBEARE: The right hon. and learned Gentleman used the 12 o'clock argument, to which I just now referred, and that argument is tenfold stronger against a Bill of this kind.

Second Reading deferred till to-morrow, at Two of the clock.

(12.8.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I hope we may be allowed to proceed. This is a small Bill of a technical character, and is urged from both sides of the House on behalf of those interested. There is no real opposition to the Bill on its merits.

Dr. TANNER: I much regret that I cannot give way at the solicitation of the hon. Member.

(12.9.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): On this I venture to ask a question. The principle and many of the details of the Bill resemble those of one I have in charge, and I wish to ask if the right hon. Gentleman will consent to both Bills being sent to the same Select Committee?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I will consider this, and will communicate with the right hon. Gentleman when I have consulted with my advisers on the subject.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I would join in the appeal to my hon. Friend not to persist in his objection.

BERKELEY PEERAGE.

Petition of Francis William Fitzhardinge Baron Fitzhardinge, of Berkeley Castle in the County of Gloucester, and of Cranford House, Hounslow, in the County of Middlesex, to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that the titles, dignities, honours, and Peerages of Earl of Berkeley and Viscount of Dursley may be declared and adjudged to belong to the Petitioner, and that the Petitioner may be summoned according to law to this present Parliament in right of the said Peerages; and further, that (if need be) the Petitioner may be graciously permitted by Her Majesty the opportunity of making good to Her Majesty's satisfaction his claim, and that right and justice may be done in the premises and to the Petitioner; together with Her Majesty's reference thereof to this House and the Report of the Attorney General thereon thereunto annexed: presented (by command), read, and referred to the Committee for Privileges to consider and report.

LORD MULGRAVE.

Petition of Constantine Charles Henry Phipps Baron Mulgrave of New Ross in the County of Wexford in the Peerage of Ireland (Marquess of Normanby in the Peerage of the United Kingdom), claiming a right to vote at the elections of Representative Peers for Ireland; read, and referred to the Lord Chancellor to consider and report thereupon to the House.

The Lord Carlingford (L. Clermont)—Took the Oath.

THE LATE EARL GRANVILLE.

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount Cranbrook): My Lords, I feel confident that I am not assuming too much in supposing that your Lordships would not be willing to meet on this occasion without referring to the great loss which has fallen upon this House during the Recess. I regret very much, indeed, that my noble Friend

Lord Salisbury is absent on this occasion, because I am quite sure he would have given a more adequate picture of the character and qualities of the man with whom he was brought so constantly into relation, whether in the management of the business of this House or in the conflicts among the different parties who are contending. Of this, however, I am quite sure, that I do not misrepresent my noble Friend, nor shall I misrepresent my friends who sit behind me, when I say that whatever controversies may have been waged between Lord Salisbury and Lord Granville were marked by cordial relations, and were carried on without anything approaching to a taint of personal rancour or personal animosity. I trust, my Lords, in the conduct of politics in this House it may always be so, and that it may not be assumed that because there is a difference of opinion there is rancour on one part or the other. I trust that those cordial relations which have distinguished the parties in this country who differ on political questions may continue, and show that the heat of political controversies does not burn out personal friendships or generosity, and that men may continue to appreciate one another, believing that high motives are quite compatible with adverse opinions. But, my Lords, I know that you will not imagine, when I speak of Lord Granville as having acted on all occasions with temper, patience, and generosity to his opponents, that I intend to lead you to suppose that he ever in any way sacrificed his convictions for the sake of conciliating anyone, or that he threw over for that object those opinions which I know he held firmly and strongly. In fact, by his own admission, he was a strong politician, a keen Party-man, and it was as such that he conducted the business of this House upon all occasions when it was necessary, and only when it was necessary. He had great adversaries to meet during his long career, and those adversaries he met with a firm and fearless mien; and though he may not perhaps have risen to the heights of oratory that some attained, yet it must, I think, be admitted by all that he met his antagonists in many a stirring debate without flinching from the occasion. My Lords, Lord Granville was one who was skilful in fence; he was a great master of repartee;

but I think there again we shall all admit that he never used that power to wound or to hurt any one, or with any malicious intention. The weapon which he used was generally so sharp and polished that the wound it made healed almost immediately; what he gave he was ready to endure, and I can say confidently that none of your Lordships have seen Lord Granville in any encounter show signs of temper. My Lords, he was a true friend to the Assembly in which he sat. It is a remarkable thing, I think, that in the many controversies which have arisen with regard to this Assembly, Lord Granville never threw any slur upon its reputation in the House or out of it, and that on all occasions he watched with jealous watchfulness over its interests, its dignity, and its honour. Not by one word or action of his own did he ever throw any stain upon this Assembly. Can it be wondered at, then, my Lords, that this House reciprocated the feelings which Lord Granville always himself entertained? Thus, while he did honour to this Assembly, he was honoured by it universally. It was not one Party more than another in this House that recognised him; he was recognised by all as a fit spokesman and representative of this House. Courteous as he was to his opponents, winning as he was to his friends, it was when no Party feeling intervened, that those who have had the opportunity of watching Lord Granville's career will remember that upon many great occasions how in graceful and appropriate words he expressed the sentiments of this House with a taste, with a tact, and with a judgment which left nothing to be desired; and that upon those occasions the high breeding and the manly simplicity with which he expressed himself found an echo in the hearts of every one of your Lordships. May I be permitted for one moment to say a word personal to myself? I felt a deep regard for Lord Granville, who welcomed me very heartily to this House, and on many occasions since I have sat in it showed a kindness in his intercourse with me, which made me esteem and honour him. I, too, like his many friends, miss the touch of that vanished hand and the sound of that voice which is still. But, my Lords, I am speaking not for myself; I am speaking for your Lordships. I am quite sure that the universal regret which you feel ought not to be, and is not, separated from the deep sympathy which you must feel for those who miss that genial presence from private and domestic life. My Lords, his distinguished career is at an end, but it has not come to an end immaturely or without the honour which his country is ready to pay to one who has served it faithfully. Lord Granville for 40 years of public life lived in the sight of a censorious and critical world, with many eyes upon him, at home and abroad; and I only wish that those of us who survive him may, like him, pass from the scene with the consciousness that we have not deserved and have never incurred any personal hostility. My Lords, I leave to those who were associated with him more intimately in politics to speak for him as their political friend. In the absence of my noble Friend, and as the Leader of the House for a temporary purpose, I speak of him with a desire to show, as I feel, that Lord Granville was worthy of the honour and approbation which this House is now showing towards him.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, the noble Viscount has expressed so fully and in such feeling terms what I am sure is the unanimous sense of the House that there is little to add to what he has said; but as one of the oldest Colleagues of Lord Granville, and as having acted for him for some time during his occasional absences from this House, perhaps your Lordships will allow me to say a few words. To those who, like my noble Friend Lord Spencer and myself, have long been associated with him in public life, the loss we have sustained by the death of Lord Granville is almost irreparable. Long and sadly shall we miss his wise and sagacious counsel and guidance, the genial friendship which he extended to us at all times, and his constant support in all circumstances. My Lords, as the noble Viscount has said, Lord Granville was not perhaps endowed with the gift of powerful and commanding eloquence, but upon serious occasions the House knows well that his speeches were wanting neither in weight nor in dignity. At the same time, he possessed a singular gift of lightness of touch, of felicity of expression, and happy anecdote, with which he enlivened even the driest Debate in this House. Our lamented friend was never deficient, never failing in his popular sympathies, and, as the noble Viscount has truly said, he never shrank from the open expression of his opinions and from their firm and consistent maintenance whether in this House or outside of it; but, as the Leader of this House or as the Leader of the Opposition, he possessed the remarkable gift of expressing his views without compromise, and yet never with any offence to those who were opposed to him. He had many opponents in this House, but even among those opponents he had many friends. Your Lordships all remember how he conducted the business of the House when leader of the Government for many years—with what tact, with what discretion, with what conciliatory temper and patience he conducted the business under circumstances often of very great difficulty in the face of adverse majorities; but that tact and that temper never failed. He had that singular way of tempering his opposition with moderation and that kindly manner which disarmed any feeling of hostility to himself personally. The noble Viscount has most truly said that it was one striking characteristic of him that he always had at heart—the honour and the dignity of this House, and by that he gained its confidence and its esteem. I will say no more, except this: that to his own family and to the many friends who mourn for him, a career so honourable to himself and so useful to his country must yield them some consolation, for they must feel that it has been crowned with what I believe to be the universal regret of all, both in this House and throughout the country.

*THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, after what has been said, and said with so much taste and with such genuine feeling, first by the noble Viscount and next by my noble Friend, whose connection with the distinguished Member of this House whom we have lost has been certainly longer and perhaps closer than mine, I have only a few words to add, and I add them, not because they are needed as a tribute to Lord Granville's memory, but in order that what I know we all feel in common may be expressed alike by every quarter of this House. The loss which the country has sustained by the death of Lord Granville is heavy; but the loss which this House has sustained is heavier still, for probably no statesman and no political leader has ever lived who was more closely and entirely identified with the Assembly in which he sat. I agree with what has been said by the noble Viscount and by the noble Lord behind me, that to keep this House efficient, to keep it, as far as possible, in harmony with the other House of Parliament, and to preserve for it the respect and esteem of the public, was an object in which he felt at all times the deepest personal concern. That is a feeling in which your Lordships can all sympathise in whatever quarter of the House you may sit, and even though in particular cases your Lordships might not agree with the methods by which that result was to be attained. My Lords, there were other traits in Lord Granville's public character which it is easier for most men to admire than to imitate. How skilful and dexterous an antagonist he was in Debate, how firmly and effectively he maintained the opinions which he held, whether popular or unpopular, we do not need to be reminded; but I can remember no occasion, and I have heard of none in the many years during which he took part in our Debates, when either Lord Granville himself appeared to be actuated by any personal animosity or bitterness, or when he spoke in such a manner as to excite that feeling in the minds of his opponents. It was also, I think, a part of his nature and of his training, that no one actively engaged in public life ever indulged less or, I should rather say, more entirely abstained from indulging in any exaggerated or sensational language. He held strong and definite opinions; he held them more strongly than many of those outside, who judged only by the invariable gentleness of his language, were apt to suppose, but they were the opinions of a statesman and a man of the world, of one whose immense experience had taught him tolerance, whose thorough knowledge of individual character was combined with a knowledge of the wants and ideas of society as a whole, and who, by his mental constitution, was free alike from optimistic enthusiasm in his earlier career, and later from that which is often the reaction from exaggerated enthusiasm, the pessimism and despondency which are too often the characteristic and the misfortune of old age. I think I should be justified if I said that by his peculiar position representing and inheriting as he did the traditions of an older state of society, yet accepting the ideas of one more modern, he was eminently suited to deal with men and affairs in an age of transition such as that in which we live. When it can be said of an English political leader, that he was always loyal to his supporters, always fair and courteous to his opponents, a faithful Colleague, a laborious public servant, warmly and frankly attached to his Party, but not so as to place its interests before those of his country; when it can be said that for half a century he lived in the public eye without reproach, and that he has gone to his rest amid the regrets of thousands to whom he was personally unknown—when these things can be truly reported of a man there is not much that need or can be added in the way of panegyric, and all these things are undoubtedly true of the eminent and remarkable statesman whose loss we now deplore.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: My Lords, if it were only my own personal feeling which I wished to express I might have difficulty in excusing myself for adding anything to what your Lordships have heard so well said. To repeat it would be idle; to improve upon it would be impossible. But besides my personal feeling, which is the result of an active and constant communication and co-operation in public affairs with Lord Granville for more than 20 years, during the greater part of that time without any difference of opinion, besides my sense of his kindness experienced during all that time, I have on this occasion to attempt to express the feeling of an absent friend, who would, I know, have been here to-day were it not that he is prevented by an illness which makes his presence impossible—I mean the Duke of Argyll. He longer than myself, longer, perhaps, than almost any of your Lordships, had been on terms of intimate personal communication and friendship with Lord Granville, and of official co-operation also with him during many years. He would have been very desirous of expressing his own feelings on this occasion. He is prevented from doing so; but I am so far in possession of his mind that I may venture to say to your Lordships that, whilst he would have spoken more fully and more eloquently than I can pretend to do, he would have concurred in the substance of the few words which I think your Lordships will excuse me for adding to what has already been said. I think if there were any cause which might possibly lead any person to estimate at less than their true value the services rendered by Lord Granville to his country, that cause was a quality which in him was most admirable—singular disinterestedness and a singular absence of self-assertion on all occasions. He had many opportunities which he would not take of advancing his own personal reputation, but he always thought of the duty which he had to do, and in my judgment he never thought of himself. There was another quality, which, I think, was unique in him, in which he excelled all the public men of his day, as far as my knowledge and memory go, and I can remember Sir Robert Peel, and had the privilege of personal intercourse on many occasions with Lord Russell and Lord Palmerston—of course, I shall not speak of any who yet remain. He had the quality of mitigating the asperity of Party warfare, a quality admirable and excellent at all times; especially in a man who never shrank, as has been well said, either from expressing his opinions, or from doing so with an effect which every one felt. His power of infusing, not merely the gloss of an acquired courtesy, but the innate courtesy of a most genial and generous nature into all that he said and did was a gift at all times most valuable, and perhaps more wanted at the present time than it ever was before. I cannot express a wish more sincere or more to the purpose, I think, for those who in this House may have to take his place than this—that in that respect, as well as in others, they may be able to follow and to imitate his example. On all occasions when great men are taken away from amongst us it is the practice of your Lordships' House to pay such tribute as you can to their memory, and on all such occasions, I believe, that tribute has been sincerely paid: though there have been times when we have availed ourselves of the privilege of looking only to the bright side of the character of those who were taken away and put out of sight, whatever might detract from that brightness. But on this occasion I know of nothing which could dim the brightness, nothing to be suppressed, nothing that could be said in derogation of the praises which have been bestowed on this great man whom we have lost. I believe that there has never been an occasion when the feeling of your Lordships was truer, deeper, or more unanimous.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES BILL.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I wish to ask my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies when he intends to take the Second Reading of the Newfoundland Bill. We only received the Bill—at least, I did not receive it until this morning; and I am informed—whether rightly or wrongly, my noble Friend will know—that the delegates from Newfoundland are expected to arrive to-morrow. Then, unfortunately, we have not the advantage of the presence of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and it is obvious that this is a question which concerns the Foreign Office quite as much as it concerns the Colonial Office. Beyond this, although I have only glanced at the Bill, and I do not desire to anticipate any discussion upon it, I must say there are some details in it which appear to me require very careful examination. It seems to me it would be unwise on the part of this House, and I appeal to my noble Friend opposite whether it would be in the interest of the Government to press forward this measure (of course having due regard to such urgency as it has in itself) in the absence of the delegates from Newfoundland, and before we have had any opportunity of learning their views and what they may have to communicate concerning this very grave subject. I hope the rumour may be true that they are coming here with conciliatory proposals, and if they have anything to say which could be heard before the Bill is discussed, and which might lead to any modification of the Bill with a view to remove objections which are felt in the colony, and smooth the way for dealing with this exceedingly thorny subject, I am sure my noble Friend will rejoice as much as I should if that opportunity could be given. For these reasons I sincerely hope that my noble Friend will find it possible to give us ample time for the consideration of this important Bill before the Second Reading, and I beg to ask him when he intends to take the Second Reading.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KINTHURST): My Lords, I have no intention of bringing this Bill on for Second Reading in the absence of my noble Friend the Marquess of Salisbury, because I feel as strongly as the noble Earl that the question is not purely of Colonial interest, but is also one closely connected with the affairs and procedure of the Foreign Office. I purpose, therefore, with the Marquess of Salisbury's concurrence, to take the Second Reading of the Bill on Monday. I hope earnestly that the rumour, which I had not myself heard, but which my noble Friend has referred to, that the delegates have come over with the desire of smoothing away difficulties, and if possible of assisting us in our efforts, may be correct. Certainly it is our hearty desire to co-operate as far as possible with the colony. I have seen, however, a statement in the newspapers that the delegates from Newfoundland or their agents would desire to be heard at the Bar of the House. I do not know at present whether that Report be true or not, and it will be time enough for us to consider whether that desire shall be acceded to or not when a Petition has been presented to Her Majesty's Government praying for that privilege. But I would point out what may not perhaps be understood, that the invariable practice has been, when parties have desired to be heard by Counsel, that the Bill should first be read a second time. That question was discussed in 1838 when a Bill was proposed to suspend the constitution of the Province of Lower Canada, and Mr. Grote then moved that Mr. Roebuck be heard at the Bar of the House of Commons as Counsel for the Province of Lower Canada. After some discussion it was decided that he should be heard after the Second Reading of the Bill; from other sources is not made by the Department, but is laid down by an Act of Parliament.

CRIMINAL CONSPIRACY.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the case of two men who were tried in the Sheriff Criminal Court, Glasgow, on the 30th of March, and found guilty of criminal conspiracy, on the ground that the accused, being members of a Trades Union, called out, or said they would call out, their fellow members unless a non-Unionist fellow workman was dismissed; whether his attention has been called to the comments of the learned Sheriff on the novelty of the charge, and his statement that its legality had been ascertained by the trial; and also to the ruling that the exemption from the Common Law of Conspiracy contained in "The Conspiracy and Protection to Property Act, 1875," does not extend to trade disputes between workmen; and whether, having regard to the great importance of the issues involved, he will consent to lay upon the Table an authentic Report of the proceedings, including the Sheriff's charge to the jury?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: As the information to enable me to reply to this question has not yet reached me, I must ask the hon. and learned Member to postpone it until Thursday.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I will give it again on Friday.

POSTAL DELIVERIES IN EAST LONDON.

MR. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will state the reason why the northern and eastern portions of the Metropolis are not included in the 7 o'clock delivery from the House of Commons?

MR. RAIKES: In answer to the hon. Member, I have to state that the 7 o'clock collection at the House of Commons Post Office for delivery in all the London districts, except the eastern and northern, was established about 20 years ago, and those two districts were excluded because the letters for them were found to be too few in number to justify the expense of their conveyance. I will, however, have inquiry made to ascertain whether there has since been a sufficient increase in the correspondence to justify the cost of including those districts in the arrangement.

MR. ISAACSON: I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that the population of the East End of London is now something like 10 times as large as it was 20 years ago.

GWYLLWYR SETT QUARRY.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what is the nature of the provisions contained in the lease of the Gwylwyr Sett Quarry, Carnarvonshire, for enforcing the effective working of the quarry by the lessee; and especially, what is the minimum number of men the lessee is called upon by the terms of his lease to keep employed upon the quarry?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am informed that Clause 3 in the agreement makes provision for the efficient working of the quarry by the lessee, and requires it to be worked to the satisfaction of the lessor.

ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any steps have yet been taken, in accordance with his promise of last year, to see for the public the advantages of open competition or limited competition for the supply of drugs and medical comforts and appliances and surgical instruments to the Army?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The supply of drugs and medical appliances has been put up to limited competition, and the contract has fallen to Messrs. Herring. No change has as yet been made in regard to surgical instruments. Experience will show whether the public has gained by the change of system.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: If the list was decided after considerable inquiry, how is it that the name of the best known firm in the trade was omitted?

MR. BRODRICK: I cannot answer that question off-hand.

SAVINGS BANKS DEPARTMENT.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received repeated applications from Messrs. Mann and Harting, two Second Division clerks, to be re-transferred to the Savings Banks Department, from which they were removed in November last without cause for their removal being assigned; whether similar applications have been received from Messrs. Foord and Johnson, whose removal from the Department was stated to the House to be intended as a punishment in consequence of being suspected of communicating an official document to the Press; whether it is a fact that these two officers have received his assurance that he is satisfied that they were not responsible for such communication; if so, why they are still undergoing punishment for the alleged offence; and whether, having regard to the undermanned condition of the Department, the application of these officers to be re-instated is still refused?

*MR. RAIKES: I have received the application referred to, but do not think it would be in the interest of the Public Service to re-assign the officers in question to the Savings Bank. I have accepted the assurance given by Messrs. Foord and Johnson; but it is not my intention to employ them again in that branch of the Service.

FOREIGN ENLISTMENT ACT—BRITISH SUBJECTS ON CHILIAN WARSHIPS.

MR. DUNCAN (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have taken steps to prevent the engagement of British subjects to serve as officers or crews on the vessels of war now being built and equipped in France to the order of the Government of Chili, one of which is reported to be on the point of departure from Havre; and whether it is true, as reported, that the French Government have prohibited the service of French subjects on these vessels?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): No steps have been taken of the nature indicated in the first paragraph of the question.

It has not as yet been considered necessary to apply the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act under existing circumstances in Chili. No official information has been received to the effect stated in the last paragraph.

SCOTCH SHERIFF SUBSTITUTES.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he claims any right to review or to animadvert on the conduct of, or observations made by, a Sheriff Substitute in his judicial capacity in a civil case pending before him in the Small Debt Court in Scotland; if so, under what law or authority he makes the claim, and the extent of his claim; and whether he has powers to censure or dismiss without an Address to the Crown being carried in Parliament?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The hon. Member is entirely mistaken in supposing that a Sheriff Substitute in Scotland cannot be dismissed from office without an Address to the Crown being carried in Parliament. Under the Statute 40 & 41 Vict., c. 50, he may be removed from office by the Secretary for Scotland for inability or misbehaviour upon a Report by the Lord President of the Court of Session and the Lord Justice Clerk for the time being. As regards the first part of the hon. Member's question, I have not in this case, on which I gave an answer yesterday, claimed any right in the matter, but merely stated to the House the facts of the case, and what I understood from his own statements and from the duties of his office to be the views of the Sheriff Substitute.

MR. CALDWELL: Then I understand that the right hon. Gentleman has not given any official intimation upon the subject?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I think I have sufficiently answered the question already.

BECHUANALAND.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is true, as is reported to have been last week stated by the Colonial Secretary of Cape Colony, that the Imperial Government has expressed its willingness to agree to the annexation of Bechuanaland by Cape Colony?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Perhaps I may be allowed to answer the question. The incorporation at some time or other of the southern portion of Bechuanaland into the Cape Colony has always been contemplated since the first establishment of British authority in that country, but Her Majesty's Government have not at present decided to take any action. I may add that the telegraphic summary of the speech can hardly be accepted as correctly representing Mr. Sauer's remarks.

TRESPASS BY COTTARS IN LEWIS.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the fact that at the trial of 12 Lewis cottars, under the Trespass Act, for raids upon Orinsay and Stimrenay, the prosecuting Procurator Fiscal was Mr. John Ross, the private agent of Lady Matheson, proprietrix, and Mr. J. Martin, tenant, of the localities in respect of which the trespass was charged; and whether, considering the repeated declarations of Scottish Law Officers in this House as to the undesirability of Public Prosecutors, where it can be avoided, being allowed to engage in private practice, he will direct regular Procurator Fiscal Mr. William Ross to act personally in any other cases arising out of the recent raids?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I understand that Mr. John Ross, Depute Fiscal, conducted the prosecution in question, in the absence of Mr. William Ross, the Procurator Fiscal, who was engaged in other official duties. Lady Matheson's interest in the matter of the recent trespasses are being attended to by an Edinburgh solicitor unconnected with the Fiscal's firm, and not by Mr. John Ross. I have no doubt that the Procurator Fiscal will endeavour to take any remaining cases of this nature where this is possible. I entirely adhere to the Ministerial declarations referred to by the hon. Gentleman in regard to new appointments of Procurators Fiscal.

ILLITERATES AT THE NORTH SLIGO ELECTION.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that at the recent North Sligo election, owing to a large number of illiterate voters presenting themselves at one time at one polling station, the forms for illiterate votes ran short, and in consequence that polling booth had to be closed for a considerable period, and also that, when many of the voters presented themselves to vote as illiterates, long discussions arose between the personation agents of the two candidates as to whether the several claims to vote as illiterates were bond fide ones or not, and in consequence great delay arose; were any persons who had not taken the oath of secrecy permitted to remain in the polling stations while the illiterates' votes were being taken; and whether the Government propose to cause inquiry to be made into the subject?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The official Reports furnished to me do not afford the additional information asked, but I have directed a further inquiry to be made into the subject.

MR. WEBSTER: I will repeat the question at a later date.

LAND PURCHASE BILL.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if it was by inadvertence that the clause providing permanent tenure for the Fair Rent Commissioners is inserted in the Purchase Bill, while the clause providing equality of salary for the Purchase Commissioners is inserted in the Land Department Bill; and will the Government undertake to treat the entire question of the status of the Commissioners connectively, and deal with it in the same Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The settlement of the question of official tenure appears to the Government essential to any sound land purchase scheme. The question of alteration of salary evidently only arises if there is an alteration of duties. Now, the Bill we are at present discussing does not suggest any alteration of the duties of the Land Purchase Commissioners. This is done in the Land Department Bill, and it is on that Bill that the subject should, I think, be discussed.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Are we to understand that the Purchase Commissioners are to have all the powers of the Fair Rent Commissioners, and that the Fair Rent Commissioners are to have none of the powers of the Purchase Commissioners?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; we leave that question entirely on one side to be discussed when it is proposed to make an alteration. I think that will be the proper time to discuss the matter.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

MAIL SHIPS BILL.—(No. 163.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 4 stand part of the Bill."

(2.30.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I must protest against the practice which the Government have recently adopted of putting down Bills of this kind as the First Order of the Day at Morning Sittings. The Government ask hon. Members to give way at 12 o'clock at night, and having done so we find these Bills put down as the First Order on the next day, so that they may slip through without discussion. I look upon this as a most objectionable practice. The present Bill is a measure of great importance, and it contains many matters which are deserving of attention, but at present I do not wish to do more than raise a protest against the system. All I can say is, that if the Government intend to continue the same course, the result will be that hon. Members overnight will keep on their blocks, and the Government will not succeed in making progress with their business.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 5 agreed to.

Clause 6.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 20, after "detained," to insert "and any legal proceeding in relation to any such matter as aforesaid may be commenced by such service in the United Kingdom of any writ or process as may be prescribed by rules of Court."—(Sir J. Ferguson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. T. M. HEALY: As these words deal with a special matter I think the Committee is entitled to some explanation of them.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The whole effect of the Amendment is to give the same advantages to British as to foreign ships.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it likely to result in a convention?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes.

MR. T. M. HEALY: When were the terms of the Convention submitted? I want to know whether any agreement has been come to as to the terms of this Amendment.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Convention has been weeks before the House. This Amendment was decided upon after the Bill was in print. It will be of advantage to British ships in giving a ready means of recovering damages against a foreign Mail steamer which may have caused damage. I can assure the hon. and learned Member that all the provisions of the Bill have been most carefully considered.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): In the event of a foreign ship committing damage to a British ship, will the same summary mode of procedure apply?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Certainly. All the obligations in the Bill are reciprocal, and the object of the measure is to prevent the detention of a Mail ship when a claim is made by entering into a permanent Mail bond.

(2.35.) MR. T. M. HEALY: That being so I cannot help thinking that it is most injudicious to introduce this provision, for this reason—that England owns more ships than any other country, and it is not to the advantage of this country to have a provision of this kind made reciprocal. It will undoubtedly give foreigners a great advantage over us against the very slight advantage which we can possibly obtain from them.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: On the contrary, the provision will confer great advantages upon British interests over those which they at present enjoy. Hitherto, French mail ships have been free from arrest on account of their national character, but no British vessel will be placed under any disability not previously borne.

MR. CHANCE: This Amendment will enable any service to initiate proceedings. I have no doubt that the Judges would act with great discretion, but I think it would be desirable, as part of the service, to require some notice to be given to the Consulate of the country to which the ship belongs. I am sure that this must be intended, and that the omission is a mere slip.

Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will consider the matter before the Report.

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I shall be glad to consider it; but I can assure the hon. Gentleman that every line of the Bill has been most carefully considered by the legal advisers of the Crown. There is no need for the intervention of the Consul for the recovery of the damages, the parties having been heard in the suit.

Question put, and agreed to.

SIR J. FERGUSSON moved, in page 6, line 21, after "shall," to insert "in accordance with Rules of Court."

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

(2.38.) SIR J. FERGUSSON moved, in page 6, line 27, at the end of the clause to add—

"Where the Commissioners of Customs, in pursuance of any Act or as a condition of waiving any forfeiture, require a deposit to be made by any exempted Mail ship to which this section applies, the amount of such deposit shall, on notice from the Commissioners of Customs, and without any further proceeding, be set apart out of the security as money belonging to the said Commissioners, and shall be paid and applied as they direct, and any Rules of Court relating to such notice, payment, or application shall be made with the consent of the Treasury."

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Clause 6, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 7 agreed to.

Clause 8.

SIR J. FERGUSSON moved, in line 3, after "Scotland," to insert "and the Court in which it is recovered may reduce the amount of such fine."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. T. M. HEALY: I observe that so far as Scotland is concerned the Court is to have power to reduce the fine. Is that the present practice in Scotland?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is intended that the practice shall be common to the United Kingdom generally. The amount of the fine can now be reduced.

(2.40.) MR. T. M. HEALY: It may not be the case in the Scotch Law, but in Irish Acts it is customary to say any fine may be recovered not exceeding a certain sum. The Bill does not impose upon the Scotch Courts the duty of inflicting a maximum fine; and why, therefore, insert these curious words, which will enable the Court to reduce the amount of the fine after it has been imposed?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The word "Scotland" does not govern the proviso, it will apply to all the Courts of the Kingdom.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then the Bill is drafted in a very curious manner.

MR. CHANCE: The Amendment is open to two interpretations—first, that before judgment is given the Court, instead of imposing a fine of £50, may impose one of £40, £30, or £20; and, secondly, that after the Court has given judgment its jurisdiction shall not cease, but that it shall have the power to reduce the amount of the fine.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Amendment has been suggested by the Judges of the Court of Admiralty, and I think the House ought to consider that sufficient.

MR. T. M. HEALY: On the contrary, that is a reason which renders it suspicious, and, for my part, I protest against the manner in which Bills of this kind are brought in. It is most unfair, I think, to ask the right hon. Baronet to conduct such a Bill, and I beg to move that Progress be reported until the Attorney General can be present.

Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again," put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

Clause 1.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 13, to leave out the word "fifteen," and insert the word "ten."—(Mr. Keay.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'fifteen' stand part of the Clause."

(2.45.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think the Committee are rather unfortunate to-day in the attendance of Ministers. It was very inconvenient to discuss the last Bill in the absence of the Attorney General, and as this Amendment ultimately concerns the Department of the Chancellor of the Exchequer I had expected to find the right hon. Gentleman present.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): He is in the Library, and will be here in a moment.

MR. SEXTON: The clause as it stands is justified on the solitary plea that the Government desire to create a Stock that shall be worth par value; but the Chancellor has not explained why the Government consider themselves under an obligation to give a Stock worth more than par value to the Irish landlords. Hitherto the Irish landlords have been the worst enemies of this country, and have brought nothing to it but trouble and disgrace, and I think they ought to be content to receive a Stock which stands on a level with any other class of funds whatever. The Government ought, I think, to have had regard for the present as well as for the future. It is abundantly clear, however, that they apprehend a depreciation in the value of Stock hereafter, and that they believe that $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. will be of no higher value in years to come than $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. now. It is somewhat curious that in this Bill provision should be made for $2\frac{3}{4}$ for 30 years, while the best class of Government Stock stands at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for 12 years only, and then falls to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The result will be that this particular kind of Stock will run considerably over par value before it comes to be redeemed. I have no wish to dogmatise, but I should like to submit two or three principles which ought to have some bearing on the case. In fixing the rate of interest on this Stock I think the Government are bound to consider the interests of the tenants, the fundholders, and the community. The tenants have suffered grievously and long from the policy of the State, and they are now entitled to such encouragement as the Government can give them. Such encouragement should be to place the annuity which they will have to pay at the lowest possible figure. The amount of interest to be paid to the stockholders measures the annuity which is to be paid by the tenant to the State, and

The amount of interest to be paid to the stockholders measures the annuity which is to be paid by the tenant to the State, and if the Stock is issued at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. the tenant would be let off for a less annuity than 4 per cent. Therefore, I contend that we are acting unfairly to the tenant, while, at the same time, we are giving to the landlord too high a rate of interest. Then, again, I say that the Government ought also to consider the interests of the fundholders, and it is certain that Stock at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. will depreciate if a higher rate of interest is to be paid on this particular description of Stock. My contention is that you will depreciate the property of every man who has invested his money in the funds, and that the Irish landlords are not a class in whose interests you ought to inflict such a blow upon the fundholders. So far as the community are concerned, their interests will be best regarded by stimulating the creation of a peasant proprietary, and it is manifest that this can only be done by exacting a low rate of interest—that, in fact, the lower the interest the better will be the security. Possibly the Government may be inclined to accept a compromise upon the question. The right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) has outlined one that is certainly deserving of consideration. What he asks is that we should not give the Irish landlords a better class of Stock than any other class of public funds, but simply as good a Stock, to be converted in 1903 to a Stock yielding dividends at the rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I am disposed to think that if the Government are prepared to consider that proposal favourably, a lengthened discussion may be avoided.

(2.54.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I think it would save the time of the Committee if the Amendment were withdrawn and the discussion were taken on the Amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, which raises a broader issue than is involved in the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Before that is done I think it is essential to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer in what manner the Land Commissioners are to deal with this clause. They may deal with it in either of two ways. They may assume when authorising an advance that the Stock is worth par, or that it is to be taken at its market value: and the difference between the two might be a very serious one, because the landlord would get the benefit and not the tenant. I see no distinct direction to the Land Commissioners as to how they are to deal with the clause; and as the Bill is of a complicated character, I should like to have an explanation from the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I think it would be convenient if my hon. Friend the Member for Elgin (Mr. Keay) were to withdraw his Amendment in favour of that of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton, because the latter really places the Stock precisely in the same position as the present Two and Three Quarter per Cent. Consols.

*(2.56.) MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): Under the circumstances, I am quite prepared to withdraw the Amendment; but before I do so, I think I am justified in complaining that for the third time the Government have absolutely refused to reply to a question which is essential to the consideration of the facts of the case. I find in Hansard a report of the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he brought forward his Conversion scheme. My Amendment recommends a Two and a Half per Cent. Stock, and in 1888 the right hon. Gentleman defended himself against proposing a Two and Three Quarters per Cent. Stock in consequence of the mere present price of a Two and a Half per Cent. Stock being 96. He said that he must look to the price of the Stock for 50 years to come, and the estimate which the public and he himself had formed as to what that price must be. The right hon. Gentleman was totally wrong in talking of 96 as the future value of the Two and a Half per Cents.: and so far as a Two and Three Quarters per Cent. security is concerned, the value of it would be a good deal more than par.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): I did reply upon that point last night, and it is quite unnecessary that I should re-state the whole position.

MR. KEAY: The right hon. Gentleman did reply to one of the points I urged last night; but to the main point he made no reply at all.

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken; I did reply.

*MR. KEAY: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the Committee what he believes the future value of British credit based upon a Two and a Half per Cent. Stock will be?

MR. GOSCHEN: The point was whether or not in the course of years a $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. conversion would stand in the same position as Consols. I hope the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his Amendment without further discussion.

*MR. KEAY: I would willingly give way if the right hon. Gentleman would make any real reply. But what does he say?—

(3.5.) THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must warn the hon. Member that it is in the power of the Chair to put a Member to silence, and he is now laying himself open to a charge of tedious repetition in pressing an argument which he has announced his intention to withdraw.

*MR. KEAY: I only wish I could get the chance of pressing my argument. I was endeavouring to quote Hansard in order to show what the view of the right hon. Gentleman was in regard to the value of the securities. The right hon. Gentleman said that he did not think we should secure the advantage to which the State was entitled if he were to convert the Stock into a permanent Two and Three Quarter per Cent. Stock, yet this is what he is now going to do for the Irish landlords. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the Stock ought to be reduced to $2\frac{3}{4}$ for a term of years, and then descend automatically, without any further action of Parliament, to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. That is what I maintain ought to be done in this case. It has been somewhat doubted whether or not these securities will be at par when they reach $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. What does the right hon. Gentleman say? He says, "I will assume, but I will not grant, that the new Stock will not be above par." What, then, must be his estimate of what the price of a Two and Three Quarter per Cent. Stock will be, which is practically to be perpetual. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. I quite admit that it is to be redeemable at 30 years, and that that fact diminishes the value of the Stock; but the right hon. Gentleman, speaking of the Two and a Half per Cent. Stock created by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Childers), stated that it had been most valuable to the Exchequer, and that he was desirous of securing the same advantage for the taxpayers of the country from the new Stock which he himself proposed to create. The right hon. Gentleman, in refusing to admit that $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is the future value of Stock at par, places himself on the horns of a dilemma. If, on the one hand, he confesses that $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. will form a par security in the future, he thus cuts the ground away from under his feet in regard to the creation of a Two and Three Quarter per Cent. Stock for the Irish landlords. On the other hand, if he believes that Two and a Half per Cents. will be, as at present, at a discount, he must be prepared to admit that he has deceived a considerable number of innocent widows and orphans who took the "Goschens," as they are called, at par on his representations. The right hon. Gentleman said last night that it was necessary to keep the Stock in this way simply that it may be earmarked; but I fail to see how that affects this Amendment at all. It might be earmarked by calling it "Land Stock," or it might be printed on pink paper in order to show its sporting character. On these grounds I venture to say that the reply which the right hon. Gentleman gave last night was insufficient to establish a case for the rejection of the Amendment.

(3.15.) MR. GOSCHEN: I and the Committee generally agreed with the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) that this discussion should be taken on the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton, but I did not know that the penalty we should have to pay for the conception would be to hear the whole speech of the hon. Member for Elgin repeated over again. Nor did I ever, throughout the whole of my Parliamentary experience, find an hon. Member who was as anxious as the hon. Gentleman is that the last word should be given to his opponent. He always seems to think that every argument he employs must be replied to. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that it would be a rather novel proceeding to take stock of every argument which an hon. Member is pleased to address to a Committee, and for the hon. Member to threaten to report Progress if each of them is not answered seriatim. I did reply to the hon. Member last night, but only briefly, because I was anxious to save time. The point which he raised was why this Stock should have a higher rate of interest than Consols, and I pointed out that small separate Stocks never commanded so high a price in the market as the great Stocks of the country. I prefer, however, to give the fuller answer which the case requires on the next Amendment, which stands in the name of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton.

*(3.18.) MR. KEAY: I do not think that I deserve the strictures of the right hon. Gentleman; I have raised no objection to anything that has occurred on the other side of the House except that distinct questions, which were undoubtedly germane to the issue before the Committee were not noticed or replied to. I beg now to withdraw the Amendment, but in doing so I wish to remind the Committee, that up to this moment the right hon. Gentleman has not said a word in reply to the one essential question whether or not this new Stock at 2½ per cent. is, in his opinion, to represent Stock at par value generally in future time?

MR. CHANCE: I wish the Chancellor of the Exchequer would answer the question whether, in making advances to the landlord, the Land Commissioners are to be bound to treat this Stock at its par value or to deal with it at its market price?

MR. GOSCHEN: The Land Commissioners will take all the circumstances of a case into their consideration, and will see whether the State is secure on the terms on which the advance is granted. Whatever is the price of the Stock, that would have some influence on the number of years' purchase the landlord would take.

MR. CHANCE: Then am I to understand that where the Stock is perceptibly below par you are really requiring the tenant to pay somewhat more than 4 per cent.? Is that so?

Mr. Goschen

MR. GOSCHEN: If we were to give the landlord Stock very much above par he would have to take so much less himself, or to give less favourable terms to the tenant. If you depreciate the value of the Stock you will render the progress of land purchase in Ireland on reasonable terms more difficult.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(3.22.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to move to insert, after "capital," the words—

"Until the first day of June one thousand nine hundred and three, and thereafter yielding dividends at the rate of two pounds ten shillings per cent. per annum."

I am afraid that it will be necessary to repeat, although I shall do so very shortly, what has been said already. The Amendment which has just been withdrawn was virtually to give the Irish landlord a Stock inferior to English Consols, whereas the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to give the Irish landlord a Stock superior to English Consols. My Amendment proposes to give to the Irish landlord a Stock that shall be the same as English Consols, and the words of the Amendment are taken from the original Conversion Act. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated last night, and has repeated to-day, that the Government wish to secure an even field between the landlord on the one side and the tenant on the other. That is my justification for the Amendment. I have no wish to attempt to cut off any portion of the value of the purchase money by giving the landlord something less than its par value; but, at the same time, I have no desire to give him anything more. The object of the Bill is to encourage the principle of purchase, and it provides the means by which that is to be effected. If the landlord is entitled to receive £100 or £1,000, as the case may be, we are bound to give him what is equivalent to that, and nothing more. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says he is anxious to give the landlord par value, and what I say is that if the conversion scheme is founded on a right basis it is founded on this principle: that the creditor of the English Government is entitled to receive 100 sovereigns for every £100 of debt he holds. In lieu of these 100 sovereigns, I propose to give him Stock which for 12 years will bear $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. interest, and which for the remainder of a certain period will stand at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The right hon. Gentleman says that is equivalent to £100. If it is not so, a gross injustice has been done to fundholders. What the English fundholder was told, both by his broker, by the English Government, and by the experts, was that in the probable future state of the English Money Market, the Government Stock would bear interest, first at $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. and then at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and that such Stock was worth £100. Upon that basis the conversion proceeded. The Stock stands now at 96.

MR. GOSCHEN: We are not to deal with the temporary value. I do not press that part of the argument.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I appreciate the force of that remark. There is a practical admission that this Stock will be worth £100 to the Irish landlord. The Chancellor of the Exchequer meets the proposition I make in two ways, if I understand him aright. He says that a small Stock does not command as high a price as a large Stock. I do not like to question the authority of the right hon. Gentleman, but I am bound to say that experience, and especially that of an English railway, points the other way. A small Stock, where there are a limited number of people selling, will command a higher price than a larger Stock. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer is right, why not give the Irish landlords Consols? I think the argument of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) last night was unanswerable. Why say to the Irish landlord, "We are going to give you Stock; we believe that the market will be a limited one, and we therefore give you a higher rate of interest in order to compensate you." That interest must come out of the pocket of somebody—either the State, the tenant, or the public. Then why not give the Irish landlord Consols at once? The right hon. Gentleman says, "If you do that you will interfere with another part of my scheme. I want to earmark the new Stock"; but my rejoinder to that is that it is simply a question of professional book-keeping. I am not urging this from the point of view of depriving the landlord of a penny of his purchase money, nor do I wish by my Amendment to improve the terms for the Irish tenant. I believe the terms given under the Bill constitute a boon of great magnitude, and one which Parliament is not called upon to increase. Out of the £4 payable by the tenant on every £100 of the advance, £2 15s. is applied to the payment of interest, £1 is payable to the Sinking Fund, and 5s. is paid into the Local Taxation Account, with a specific enactment in favour of the appropriation of the sum for the benefit of Irish labourers' cottages. To this extent there is an endowment of Irish local taxation, and, as has been pointed out, the 5s. in the £4 represents a total sum of £75,000 a year. The effect of my Amendment would not be a reduction to the Irish tenant: it merely provides that when the interest on the land comes down to £2 10s. per cent. there will be 10s. per cent. to pay to the Local Authorities. Thus Irish local taxation will be strengthened and British credit will be used for the benefit of the community at large. I wish to know why, in paying this specific purchase money, there is to be given to the Irish landlords for £100 what is worth more than £100? Why should the Irish landlords be placed in a better position than that in which the deserving English middle class were placed by the conversion scheme? In that case the contention was that £2 10s. paid annually by Government was worth £100. I am afraid I have to some extent gone over ground already traversed, and, now, I put this proposition before the Committee as one of purely financial opinion, not mixing it up in any way with the rights and wrongs of Irish landlords or Irish tenants. When a hundred sovereigns are paid to an Irish landlord, why should not this be subject to the same conditions as when English creditors of the State were paid in Two and a Half per Cent. Stock?

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 14, after the word "capital," to insert the words "until the first day of June, one thousand nine hundred and three, and thereafter yielding dividends at the rate of two pounds ten shillings per cent. per annum."

—(Mr. Henry H. Fowler.)

(3.35.) MR. GOSCHEN: I appreciate the tone in which the right hon. Gentleman has spoken. I also appreciate the way in which the right hon. Gentleman and others have spoken of the conversion scheme. I wish to make it absolutely clear that, in my opinion, this Two and Three Quarter per Cent. Stock will be about par, and nothing more. This is the conscientious view of the Government, though it may prove to be erroneous. The right hon. Gentleman very fairly asks why the Stock should not be equal to Consols if the terms are the same; and the right hon. Gentleman is of opinion that a small Stock always commands a higher price than a large Stock. That view may be right with regard to Railway Stock, but it is not right with regard to Public Funds. A large Stock suits the market best, because of the rapidity of the transactions. Consols are used, not only for investment, but as the basis of loans which are constantly taking place. Therefore it has happened that in the Public Funds no smaller Stock with the same guaranteed security has ever been equal to Consols. The Government have accordingly, in all good faith, come to the conclusion that the Stock to be issued in connection with the Bill would not be equal to Consols. The right hon. Gentleman next asks, very properly, why Consols were not given in these circumstances. I feel confident that if the Government had proposed to issue Consols a totally different set of arguments would have been brought against the scheme. Having regard to the future, I have felt that the country ought to have clearly and constantly before it what the proposed operation is, and that the operation should not be mixed up with Consols. I wish to keep before the public eye how from year to year the Stock has either decreased or increased, and I believe, therefore, that the best plan is to keep the Stock, like Local Loan Stock, as a separate operation. I have held the same view with regard to all Stock which is represented by assets; and I have always been of opinion that the proper financial measure to take is to separate that Stock on which there is to be repayment from that on which there is not to be repayment. At all events, the right hon. Gentleman will admit that the Government in these two matters have not acted hastily, but on a settled policy. Then as to the value of the Stock. Hon. Members have argued as if the Stock in question were a Stock of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for 49 years. But there are conditions under which the Stock is redeemable in 30 years; and, of course, if this Stock should be at a premium 30 years hence, any Chancellor of the Exchequer would borrow money at the rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and would pay off this sum. The difference between this Stock and Consols is that Consols at $2\frac{1}{2}$ have 14 years to run, and the stock created under the Bill has 30 years to run at $2\frac{1}{2}$. I do not myself believe—though I should be glad if the contrary were to prove true—that the Stock will stand high. If it does, it will facilitate transactions between landlord and tenant, but it is in no such expectations that the Stock is created. I wish to point out to hon. Members who are sincerely desirous of passing the Bill, this fact: Supposing the Government were to give to the landlords a Stock which during the next few years was 4 or 5 per cent. below par, an impediment in the way of purchase would be set up. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: No, no. It does not matter to the tenant.] Hon. Members must see that the offer of the landlord to the tenant will depend upon the revenue which the landlord will be able to derive from the Stock.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): That depends on the Local Land League.

Mr. GOSCHEN: It will depend upon whose influence is supreme in Ireland at that time; but I notice that, according to the hon. Gentleman, the Land League is to be continued after the next General Election; and that, if right hon. Gentlemen opposite should succeed to power, the Local Land League is to have the same power as in earlier days. The Government have not regarded the matter from that point of view. Supposing, as an extreme case, we were to give the landlord paper that was worth, say, 9 or 10 per cent. Surely hon. Members must see that that would have the effect of preventing sales from taking place. The landlords are free to act in this matter—whether to sell or not to sell, and it is not as if the tenants had to agree to buy or not. Therefore the placing of British credit wholly at the disposal of the guarantee will the more easily enable the purchases to take place.

The lower we place that credit the less use we make of it—that is to say, the lower the Stock the less likely we shall be to attain the object in view, the more we shall hinder the operation of the Bill, and the less able will the tenants be to get terms from the landlords. What the Government wish is that the landlord should be in such a position that he can and will sell, and hon. Members will remember that, as matters stand, the land revenue of the landlords will be considerably reduced after this Bill is passed. In many cases the landlord will not get more than half the gross rent he now obtains; and if we still further gave him Stock which will be 5 or 6 per cent. below par, shall we not again diminish the return he will get? We shall be removing from him the inducement to sell, and the reduction will be no advantage to the landlord or the tenant. The Government are not placing any loss upon the State by putting 2½ into the Bill. With regard to any advantage to the Local Authorities, that must rest on the general desire of hon. Members opposite whether they wish to lessen the temptations to sales between landlord and tenant in order to increase the amount to be paid to the locality. What the Government desire is that the Bill should work, and we believe the rate we have fixed will make it work. In those circumstances, we are of opinion that anything that would tend largely or seriously to diminish the amount of Stock, as we have put it, would be an impediment to the working of the measure, would be a disadvantage to the tenant, and would confer no advantage on the taxpayer. I understand it is now the feeling in all parts of the House that the benefit accruing from the Bill should go only to Ireland in one form or another, and, that being so, it becomes a question between the tenants and Local Authorities of Ireland. It appears to the Government that the inducements both to the tenants to buy and the landlords to sell, large as they are, ought not to be diminished by any change in the framework of the Bill.

(3.53.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): There is one point which arose last night, and to which I attach more importance than the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given it. I say, emphatically, that the higher the interest on the Stock the better it will be for the tenant. That I take to be beyond argument. For my own part, I object to any money going to the Local Authorities; and I intend to move an Amendment exempting small holdings from contributing to any fund, even for the labourers. It is an elementary principle of finance that it is better to issue at par than below par. I am quite aware that some States pursue a contrary policy, but not, I think, those whose credit stands high; and though Pitt did the same thing in days gone by, I think it is now acknowledged he made a blunder. I repeat, that to issue the Stock below par would be a disadvantage to the tenants.

(3.57.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I do not intend to pursue this subject at length, but I desire to say a few words with reference to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. The chief argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is that the landlord, in selling his land, will look to the revenue—to the interest he will receive on the capital—in order to see how far he will be recouped for the rents he gives up. I believe, however, that the landlord will look rather to the capital value of the Stock than to the actual interest he will receive, and that it will be his desire to hold the Stock, whether it is Land Stock or Consols. He will look at the price at which he can sell the Stock rather than at the actual revenue it brings in. Nobody at present can tell what the value of the Land Stock will be; and I should have thought an Irish landlord would prefer to have Consols offered him rather than a Stock of which he does not know the value.

MR. GOSCHEN: Judging from precedent, the value of the Stock will stand between the price of the Local Loan Stock and the price of Consols.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The right hon. Gentleman's interposition shows, at all events, that no one knows what will be the price of the Stock. The landlord would prefer a Stock of which he knows the price. I think the right hon. Gentleman ought to remember that half of those who take the Stock will desire rather to sell it than to hold it, and if there are a large number of sales of a small Stock like this, which is not very negotiable, it will be likely to put the price down below what it would if it were a large Stock, like Consols. The Chancellor of the Exchequer somewhat naturally wants to keep all these arrangements in reference to Land Stock separate from our great National Debt, and to that extent I think we all agree with him. But, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton pointed out, that after all is simply a matter of book-keeping. The interest on the Stock will have to be found through the National Debt Commissioners, just as in the case of Consols, and it is simply a question of book-keeping, and not a matter of real practical importance. The question for us is whether it is worth while charging this Stock with the extra $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in order to keep it distinct from Consols, when we believe it would be better if it were put into Consols. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) said he would not be a party to anything which would go to benefit the locality at the expense of the small tenant. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said this is a matter simply between the tenant and the locality. I think it is to be remembered that, as far as the English taxpayers are concerned, we wish to get the locality the largest possible interest in the repayment of the fund. We want to do what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian did in his Bill, and make it to the interest of the locality to see that the tenants pay their debts to the State. We therefore think it will be of advantage to the taxpayers as well as of advantage to Ireland itself that the locality should have such an interest in the re-payment. The Government do not give us the real reason why they oppose this proposal; the fact is that they do not want it to appear to the public at large—as it would if they simply issued Consols—that the English taxpayers are practically guaranteeing the interest to the landlords. That is the real reason why they decline to accept the Amendment. It seems to me that the financial arguments used by my hon. Friend and others have been entirely in favour of issuing one large Stock instead of these little un-negotiable Stocks.

Mr. Sydney Buxton

(4.5.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I only rise to notice one remarkable statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He spoke of the disadvantage under which the Stock would be placed if it went down to £5 or £6 below par. That is his estimation of a Stock which would rest exactly on the same footing as his own Consols. I suppose, then, that is his estimate of the future of Consols.

MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman was not in the House when I pointed out the difference.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Of course, I know the right hon. Gentleman pointed out that one Stock was larger than another. That may have a small effect, but it will only be a small one. The right hon. Gentleman, in order to support the proposal he has made, talks about the Stock being 5 or 6 below par.

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman would wish to misrepresent me. I simply made an assumption for the purpose. I never suggested that the Stock would be 5 or 6 below par.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then let us get rid of the assumption for the sake of argument. The assumption was used to support an argument, and if the assumption disappears the argument disappears with it. I saw an article a few weeks ago in the Economist criticising the financial ingenuity of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his extreme love of creating a quantity of new Stocks. It seems that now, to the great heavenly body of the National Debt, the right hon. Gentleman is adding a number of satellites to revolve round it. It seems to me there is very great inconvenience in this multiplication of accounts. The great object of the original Consolidated Fund was that there should be one great Stock, and that the National Debt should be one single item, as far as possible, in which the country would have to deal. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his great success in the creation of the Stock which is now Consolidated Stock of the United Kingdom, by his conversion scheme, but that he should follow that up by immediately creating a new Stock on different terms is, I think, an unfortunate experiment in finance. These are the financial considerations which, I think, weigh against this proposal.

But the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down pointed out another. You may argue as you please as to what terms shall be made between the landlord and tenant, but there is this intelligible thing which will be known to everyone, namely, that the Stock you have offered to the Irish landlord in respect of this great experiment of purchase, is a Stock of higher value and at a higher rate than Consols. That will be a fact perfectly understood of the people. I regard that as a great objection in a proposal of this character, and, therefore, I shall certainly vote for the proposal of my right hon. Friend.

(4.12.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I do not wish on this question to speak in anything of a Party spirit, but I am bound to say I regard this as a fad of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that may cost the country £75,000 per annum. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton put the thing clearly. He said he was not entering into the question of whether the landlord would profit or whether the tenant would profit. He simply asserted that it was the business of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to get the money in the cheapest manner possible. When the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose, he tried to drag a quantity of red herrings across this trail, and we have for some time been discussing the position of the landlord and tenant—a very interesting question, no doubt, but not the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton. Why does the Chancellor of the Exchequer want this separate Stock? He says he wants it in order that this money should not be mixed up with the general debt of the country, but should remain before the eyes of the country? Well, is it worth while to tax the people £75,000 per annum, in order that this fund should remain before the eyes of the country? It will be really a most costly spectacle.

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not understand where the hon. Member gets his £75,000.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I get it as the amount which would accrue after, say, 14 years. To anybody but the Chancellor of the Exchequer—who deals in millions—£75,000 a year is a very handsome sum, which we could save. The whole reply—I cannot, with all respect to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, call it an argument—of the right hon. Gentleman was this fancy and fad of “keeping the matter before the eyes of the public.” He said last night, and again the first thing this afternoon, that it is necessary to keep this Stock separate in order to carry out the objects of the Bill. He has given that up now. He knows perfectly well that it is really a question of book-keeping. You always keep the Stocks separate, as between the Land Commission and the Exchequer, and you may keep them separate, as between the public in their relations as buyers and sellers of this Stock. I hope the House will stand by what has been said by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, and will vote with him, putting aside all questions of where the money is to go to, unless the Chancellor of the Exchequer can give us some more valid reason for making this separate stock.

(4.19.) MR. SEXTON: The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his otherwise clever speech, has left the question of the future value of this Land Stock in rather a vague condition. I should have expected him to deal with it more precisely. He believes, because the Stock will be what he calls a small and separate Stock, that it is not likely to stand on a parity with Consols. But it will not be a small Stock. Some day it will be £30,000,000. I would point out that Two and a Half per Cents. are small Stock, relatively to Consols, but that does not prevent Two and a half per Cents., though a $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. lower than Consols, being close to Consols in market price. It does not, therefore, appear that the smallness of the Stock is a reason against its having a high value. As to the question of separate Stock, why need it be separate? I see no reason why this Land Stock should not be merged in Consols. The right hon. Gentleman points out that there are no assets against Consols, whereas there are assets against these Stocks. But that is a question of book-keeping. The main question before the Committee is not that of assets, but the liability of the country to the stockholder. This Stock will be held by a great many persons, for the Irish landlords will, generally, be ready to invest in it, and I say, therefore, that from the largeness of the amount and the plurality of the ownership it will command the largest price corresponding with its value, and I conclude that the Land Stock in future years will be of more value than Consols. I say that that is a Stock you have no right to give to the Irish landlords, because, by doing so, you will be inflicting a wrong on the whole of the country. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway has assured me that I shall have his vote if I can extract from the Government a promise that the amount of the savings will be given to the Irish tenant.

COLONEL NOLAN: I spoke of a promise from the Opposition.

MR. SEXTON: I am afraid I must throw back the overture to the hon. and gallant Gentleman. At the present moment—and I hope this is only a temporary condition of things—the hon. and gallant gentleman is in a better position for obtaining pledges from the Government than I am.

COLONEL NOLAN: I said the Opposition.

MR. SEXTON: The Front Opposition Bench are not in a position to give effective pledges in reference to this Bill, and I must assume, therefore, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman's observations were directed to the Government. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has got in this subject, it appears to me, considerably out of his depth. He has made to-night one of the most extraordinary proposals I ever heard. He has actually laid down the principle that the higher the interest you give the landlord for his Stock the better it will be for the Irish tenant.

COLONEL NOLAN: Provided he pays 4 per cent.

MR. SEXTON: The hon. and gallant Member should remember that the chief figure in measuring the interest is the amount paid to the stockholder. The inference to be drawn from the hon. and gallant Member's speech is, that if the State pays a high interest to the landlord, the landlord's sense of equity is so nice that he will extend the benefit to the tenant.

COLONEL NOLAN: I never said anything of the kind.

MR. SEXTON: That was the inference I drew from the hon. and gallant Member's speech. The Bill fixes the 'annual value of the holding. What will be the position of the transaction? The landlord will endeavour to get as many years' purchase as he can. I do not think that the rate of interest on the Stock or the price of the Stock in the market will have any material influence on the price of the holding. The annual value of the holding will be determined by the Bill, and the landlord will try to get as much as he can, no matter what may be the interest on the Stock or the value of the Stock in the market. It is clear, therefore, that the price of a farm will be determined by figures other than the value of the Stock; and if you tell me that if the landlord gets 6 per cent. on the Stock, he will be disposed to sell his farm to the tenant for half the money he would have wanted if the interest he had got had only been 3 per cent, I say the statement is monstrously absurd. I say the lower the interest on the Stock, provided the landlord accepts the Stock at all—and he will accept it if it is Consols—the better it will be for the tenant. And why? For a reason lucidly stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—that the State makes no profit in the case. The annuity of the tenant is measured chiefly by the interest of the stockholder. If this amendment is carried one of two consequences will follow. Either the annuity of the tenant will have to be reduced from £4 to £3 15s., which I should hail as a great boon, or else the county percentage which goes to local uses, either relief of rates or erection of labourers' cottages, will have to be increased from 5s. to 10s. for every £100 lent under the Bill. I should prefer that the annuities of the tenants should be reduced, because I think the main interest of all classes in Ireland is to stimulate transactions under the Bill. At the same time if I were defeated in that I should be glad to see the relief given in the other direction; but I challenge my hon. and gallant Friend to say that in either case the acceptance of the Amendment would not be followed by a distinct advantage.

(4.25.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I should like to know what would be the real nature of the Stock. One Stock will amount to £30,000,000, created from time to time, but all of the same kind, and redeemable in 30 years. Is that so, or will there be a fresh Stock created, whenever a fresh purchase is effected, redeemable in 30 years from the date of the purchase? There is a difference according to the meaning attached to the language adopted. In the one case the purchasers, five or six years hence, will get paid in a Stock of somewhat less value than those who are paid immediately on the passing of the Act. On the other hand, if a new Stock is to be created, redeemable at the end of 30 years after purchase, there will be a creation of separate kinds of Stock in respect of which there will be different prices. Which of these two systems does the right hon. Gentleman propose to adopt?

(4.26.) MR. GOSCHEN: It is intended that there shall be one Stock, and I think the right hon. Gentleman will see how extremely important it is that there should be one Stock, so as to enable transactions to take place as between bankers and others. Ultimately it will be a large Stock, but for some time it may be a small one; but whatever arguments hon. or right hon. Gentlemen may bring against it, everyone seems to me to agree that there should only be one Stock. I had not omitted to consider the question. The Stock may be higher or lower, but however that is it will adjust itself to the purchases. If it is lower the landlord will ask for more years' purchase; if it is higher the tenant will have so many less years' purchase. Our desire is that it shall be as near as possible at par. I cannot go beyond this and enter into prophecy, a responsibility which no Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to undertake.

(4.28.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): The Chancellor of the Exchequer has now explained to the House clearly what the character of this Stock is to be; and, unquestionably, as between the one alternative and the other, I should think he has taken the right one—but still one which lands him in enormous difficulties. The first difficulty that arises is this: The Chancellor of the Exchequer, of course, sees that the value of this Stock will vary according to the number of years for which the higher rate of interest has to run certain. Where it is to run certain for 30 years, the value of the Stock will be higher; where it is to run for 20, 10, or 5 years the value of the Stock will be materially lower. The meaning of that is that the landlords of Ireland are to receive for their property different rates of compensation from the State.

MR. GOSCHEN: Not from the State, but from the tenant.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The Stock in which the landlords are to be paid will be of different values in each succeeding year. It will be of a continually descending value. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer says it will not come from the State, but the tenant. What has the property of the tenant got to do with the Stock? Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that the Land Commissioners, in fixing the number of years purchase that each estate is to be worth, are to take into view this sliding scale? The doctrine of the sliding scale is so perplexing and confusing that I can hardly understand it to be the intention of the Government to adopt it. Are the Land Commissioners to say, "This estate would have been worth 18 years' purchase if the landlord were to be paid in a Stock that had 30 years to run at £2 15s. per cent.; but as he is only going to be paid in a Stock that has 15 years certain to run it is worth 20 years' purchase." The number of years' purchase which an estate is worth ought to be governed by a fixed and certain standard, and ought to have no reference whatever to the change of interest.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The right hon. Member for West Bradford has asked a question, and the answer has been given. The question does not arise on the Amendment whether the reduction will be made 12 or 30 years hence.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The whole subject is a very difficult one, but I have no doubt that you are quite right. I think, however, that you will find that the result of this discussion will be to show that it is a mistake altogether to create these differences of Stock. If we are going to have these estates bought by the Irish occupiers, the only mode of proceeding is to give the landlords a Stock created in the way suggested by my right hon. Friend, or a Stock which is equivalent to Consols in the market. Whatever course may be pursued, I am quite certain that there must be some time or other when this matter will have to be fully discussed, because it is most relevant to the purpose of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman opposite must see that he has presented most serious dilemmas to the Committee, and has afforded no solution of them.

MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian has suggested that the Government introduce a fresh complication in fixing, as he said, the price of purchase by the Land Commissioners. But the Land Commissioners do not fix the purchase at all; they merely ratify the purchases which are made.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: There is a standard of approval.

MR. GOSCHEN: There is no standard whatever. All that the Commissioners have to do is to see that the purchase is such that satisfactory security is obtained by the State. That ought not to be in any way regarded as applying to the number of years' purchase, and all that the Commissioners have to look to is to see whether the security is sound.

(4.34.) SIR W. HARCOURT: Surely the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a fallacy. What is it that the Land Commissioners do? They determine what is a fair and safe bargain between the landlord and tenant. The number of years' purchase as well as other matters will have to be considered. Therefore, if, in consequence of the Stocks varying in price, the price agreed upon between the landlord and tenant varies, why, of course, the judgment of the Land Commissioners is based upon that bargain so made. The main argument which the Chancellor of the Exchequer used with reference to the variation at future periods in the value of this Stock, cuts from under him the whole ground upon which he has based his objections to my right hon. Friend's proposal. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said it was quite true that this Stock at future times might vary in value, but that in time the parties would accommodate themselves to that variation in value. If that be the case, why should they not accommodate themselves to the present value of Consols? Every argument, therefore, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has used is in favour of the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment. All that part of the argument which relates to the creation of Stock to bear par value disappears. If the Stock is now at par value, it is quite plain that it might be something below par value next year. ["No, no."] I do not understand the hon. Member saying "No." If the number of years for which the interest is granted affects the value of the Stock, then, as the number of years diminish, the value of the Stock must diminish. I should have thought that anybody who understood the elements of the question would have understood that. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian observes that it is a perpetually descending scale. ["No."] There is no use in saying "No." The hon. Member might just as well say "No" to the proposition that twice two make four. It is quite plain, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not deny it, that 10 years hence the Stock must be of less value than it is now, because there will be only 20, instead of 30, years' value attaching to it, and so it will go on from time to time, and we will have, as the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian said, a sliding scale established. The argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is that all parties should accommodate themselves to the alteration in the value. Why should they not accommodate themselves to the value of Consols now? The whole answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is practically in support of the Amendment.

Ayes 144; Noes 209. — (Div. List, No. 130.)

*(4.51.) MR. KEAY: The Amendment which I now propose to move is in line 16,

To leave out from the word "after," to the word "redemption," in line 20, inclusive, and insert "for the purpose of paying off the whole of the Land Stock at or before the expiration of the time at which the purchase annuities hereinafter mentioned will cease."

The general object of this Amendment may be said to be of the same character as that of the last, namely, to endeavour to secure that the landlords do not get a Stock which will come to a premium, and thus injure the interests both of the British taxpayer and of the Irish tenant. The object of leaving out the words is to prevent the landlords from obtaining an undue premium upon their Stock, compared with what is got by the general creditor. I object to the 30 years, and want to leave that provision out, because I am anxious that there should be prompt and immediate reduction of the liability on the British taxpayer, whom I want to see relieved as speedily as possible. What I propose is that there should be, either by annual drawings or otherwise, a prompt and early application of the Sinking Fund to the diminution of Stock. I do not know the object of the 30 years' clause, unless it is to command a premium on the Stock I have mentioned. I hold that the only object is to give the landlords at once 30 years' enjoyment of the higher rate of interest of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. If it is not for that purpose, what is it for? Judging from what has transpired in the Debate, the Chancellor of the Exchequer believes that in this $2\frac{1}{2}$ Stock he has got a par Stock. He is aiming at a par Stock, and that is why he is giving the enjoyment of this interest for 30 years. But in order to ascertain the full significance of this 30 years' clause, it must be read along with Clause 7, Sub-section 2, towards the end of the first part of the Bill. That clause provides that if the Land Stock should be, in the opinion of the landlord, undesirable, he may exchange it for Consols; and if he does not consider the exchange desirable he may stick to the $2\frac{1}{2}$ Stock. I hold that the benefit of the alternative is given to the landlord, and to the landlord alone, who will be in a position to enjoy the $2\frac{1}{2}$ Stock at a premium for 30 years. If the Stock is to remain on the border line of par, naturally it will be likely, as do other Stocks, sometimes to go below par. Why does the Chancellor of the Exchequer put in 30 years, then? Surely to retain it at par the best way would be to make it redeemable at once, or within a year or two. But I say the only reason that can be attached to its being made a 30 years' Stock is that it may have the capacity of going to a premium, otherwise the right hon. Gentleman would be very sorry indeed, for the sake of his landlord friends, to put in the 30 years clause, if he were frightened that the Stock would come to a discount. Now, the words proposed to be added by my Amendment simply secure that there is a direction in the Bill that none of the Stock shall be left outstanding in the 49th year. I do not know whether the Government will consent to this, but I hope they will. All the annuities are to be paid into the Treasury in 49 years, and they furnish the interest at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and cease at the end of that period. That seems a very good reason for putting a direction into the Bill that the Stock itself shall be compulsorily paid off by the end of the 49th year. There is another argument, namely, that the Government themselves thought it necessary to put this very clause into the Land Purchase Bill of last year. I do not see how they can refuse to accept the Amendment, which is simply a copy of Clause 5, Sub-section 2, of their own Bill of last year.

Amendment proposed, page 1, line 16, to leave out from "after," to "redemption," in line 20, inclusive, and insert—

"For the purpose of paying off the whole of the Land Stock at or before the expiration of the time at which the purchase annuities hereinafter mentioned will cease." — (Mr. Keay.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'And after 30 years' stand part of the Question."

(5.2.) Mr. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member has divided his Amendment into two parts—the words to be omitted and the words to be inserted. He wishes in the first place to omit words which settle the whole process and method by which the transaction shall take place. It is impossible to omit these words and to leave everything vague. In the next place, the hon. Member has put a sense upon the word "redeemable" which I do not think it will properly bear. "Redeemable" means that the State has the power to redeem, but not that the State shall redeem. The hon. Member says that if the Stock is not redeemed in two years it must remain at par. Not at all. It depends upon whether it is likely to be redeemed or not. The State ought never to engage to redeem large sums at a certain date when it does not know precisely how things may stand at that date. I do not think the hon. Member will object to my passing over in silence that part of his argument which relates to the 30 years, because after all it is only a modification of the contention we have been arguing over all the afternoon. I do not say there is much to object to in his words, but the whole tenour of the Bill is that the redemption will take place within 49 years, and, in the case of Stock above par, within 30 years.

(5.4.) MR. LABOUCHERE: The hon. Gentleman has used an argument which seems to me a strange one after the discussion we have had this afternoon. It is said that after a certain time these particular ear-marked annuities would be converted into Consols. The right hon. Gentleman has been fighting that point all the afternoon and telling us it was impossible to issue this Stock in the form of Consols because he wants to keep it separate. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will explain the discrepancy between his argument and this provision of the Bill.

(5.5.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I was going to raise the same point. If it be the case that there is a provision in the Bill which will enable the Stock to be exchanged into Consols, what becomes of the right hon. Gentleman's argument?

MR. GOSCHEN: If the hon. Member will turn to Clause 7, Sub-section 2, he will see that, within limits fixed by the Treasury, there is power given to the National Debt Commissioners to take the Stock in lieu of Consols. That is totally different from putting the whole of this into Consols. If applications were made for the exchange of moderate amounts no doubt the National Debt Commissioners would exercise their option.

(5.7.) SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the question. We want to know what now becomes of the argument about keeping before the public this separate Stock. Supposing the National Debt Commissioners exchange any of this stock for Consols, pro tanto that amount disappears.

MR. GOSCHEN: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to explain. It would not disappear at all, but the National Debt Commissioners would have so much less Consols and so much more Stock.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is "all persons" and not the National Debt Commissioners.

Mr. Goschen

MR. GOSCHEN: It is the National Debt Commissioners who are to have the power. It is not a power of cancelling Stock or changing one Stock for another, but a power of investment. The two Stocks will remain entirely separate.

(5.8.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: We understood from the previous statements on the Bill that the landlord was to have no option of conversion into Consols. Now, if I understand it rightly, the case is different. The National Debt Commissioners will give Consols in exchange for the Stock created under this Bill when they find it agreeable to their own convenience, so that of course the landlord's option becomes a qualified and conditional one. If I understand the matter rightly the National Debt Commissioners do not necessarily hold such large amounts of Consols as to have great quantities disposable for the purpose of enabling landlords to exercise that option. Therefore, it will have to be understood that it is not a free option but one qualified and conditional according to the state of the investments of the National Debt Commissioners.

(5.10.) MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman is perfectly correct. If I am not out of order I will read the clause:

"All persons, including the National Debt Commissioners, shall have the like power of investing in the Land Stock as they have in Consolidated Annuities, and the National Debt Commissioners shall also, within the limits fixed by the Treasury in communication with them, give on application Consolidated Annuities in exchange for an equal nominal amount of the Guaranteed Land Stock."

That is to say, the Treasury may say, they will take £5,000,000 or £7,000,000 of the Stock. Of course, for the State, it would be a good investment. I am glad to say the amount of Consols held by the National Debt Commissioners is extremely large—something like £60,000,000. This is a power that would be exercised with very great caution by any Government, but the probability is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day will think it would be very desirable that a portion of this Stock should be held by the National Debt Commissioners.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Would the National Debt Commissioners have power to sell this Stock like any other of their investments?

MR. GOSCHEN: Certainly.

(5.12.) SIR W. HARCOURT: There is one question I should like to ask. The clause says—

“The National Debt Commissioners shall also, within the limits fixed by the Treasury in communication with them, give on application Consolidated Annuities in exchange for an equal nominal amount of the Guaranteed Land Stock.”

But who are they going to give it to? Who wants it, and why is the exchange going to be made? I suppose the person who gives this Stock to the National Debt Commissioners and gets Consols in exchange for it expects to get some advantage. I do not understand what the nature of these transactions is. What is to be the interest of the persons who take part in these transactions?

MR. GOSCHEN: We are really discussing Sub-section 2 of Clause 7; but I will answer the right hon. Gentleman. I do not know what the interest of the persons may be, but the matter amounts to this: that, considering that this Stock bears a guarantee of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the National Debt Commissioners can never do wrong in giving Consols in exchange for it. I think the clause shows the bona fides of the Government. It shows that we do not believe that this Stock will be so much above par. I submit, however, that any further discussion on the subject ought to be taken on Clause 7.

(5.15.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I do not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer would do well to try and shut out this discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is quite irregular to go on discussing the meaning of Sub-section 2 of Clause 7.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Quite so, but the consideration of the words we are now on involves comparative consideration of the value of Consols and the value of the Land Stock. As I understand the Amendment refers to the paying off the whole of the Land Stock. The hon. Member for Elgin and Nairn proposes to leave out the 30 years; in other words he proposes that this shall not be a terminable or redeemable Stock. I submit that opens up to us comparative considerations of the two Stocks.

(5.16.) MR. CHANCE: On the question of order, I should like to point out that if the Bill is allowed to stand as it is the Sinking Fund which would be created would, in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners, be applicable to the redemption or purchase of any of the Government Stocks, but if the Amendment is carried that Sinking Fund can only be applied to the redemption of the Land Stock. If that is so, is it not relevant to consider which Stock would most properly be redeemable, and whether the Committee would be wise or not in depriving the National Debt Commissioners of the power they would have of using the Sinking Fund for the purpose—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman has addressed the Committee under a complete misapprehension.

(5.17.) MR. KEAY: The Chancellor of the Exchequer is a very distinguished and experienced statesman, and he is also very ingenious; but I am sorry to say his ingenuity as practised towards myself is directed to not answering the main point of my Amendment. I propose to leave out the 30 years. That is of course the gravamen of my Amendment, but the right hon. Gentleman stands up and says “the hon. Gentleman will excuse me for not saying anything about the 30 years,” and then goes on to refer to the very innocent words I proposed to substitute for the omission. If the right hon. Gentleman did not put in the 30 years for the purpose of appreciating the landlords Stock above par what was his object? I hold that even we, private Members, humble as we are, are entitled to have the clear gravamen of our Amendments replied to. He says there is no object in giving the landlords the enjoyment of this Stock for 30 years, because it will not go to a premium. It is very difficult for me to get replies from the Chancellor of the Exchequer’s own mouth. I have already to day made him answer himself by quoting from his speech last year. I will make the Chief Secretary for Ireland answer him now by quoting from the speech the right hon. Gentleman made in bringing in the Bill of last year. On the 24th of March last year, the Chief Secretary said—

"The second explanation is that the owners are to be repaid in Government Stock bearing 2½ interest not payable before 30 years."

I am quoting from the Times: I have not the revised version of the speech in Hansard. The right hon. Gentleman went on—

"This part of the Bill will be explained more fully by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he tells me that in his opinion such Stock is at least as good as Consols, and if any landlord is foolish enough to take a different view there is a provision in the Bill which obliges the National Debt Commissioners to exchange Consols for the Stock."

(5.23.) MR. GOSCHEN: I will reply at once. The hon. Gentleman says I have omitted to answer the point he raised with regard to the 30 years. I stated that the whole of the point which the House was discussing on the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton was that this Stock would bear 2½ per cent. for a longer period than Consols. Consols are at 2½ per cent. for 14 years, and the whole point of the discussion on the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton turned upon the difference between the two periods. It is that difference which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton wishes to remove. The House has been debating that point the whole time, and has come to a conclusion in favour of the provision in the Bill. Therefore, I thought that a reference to that would be a sufficient answer to the hon. Gentleman opposite. With regard to the second point, I do not know how far the report quoted by the hon. Gentleman was full or accurate; but I have no doubt it entirely confirms what I have stated.

*MR. KEAY: Is the House to understand that it is not the expectation of the right hon. Gentleman that this Stock will go to a premium?

(5.26.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The Chancellor of the Exchequer leaves the matter at large as to whether in his judgment this Stock is a better or a worse Stock than the original Consolidated Stock he has converted. If it is a better Stock, why give the landlords more interest? If it is a worse Stock, then it is worse to get 2½ per cent. than 2½ per cent. In this matter the Government seem to me to be dancing on eggs. They do not know what position to take up.

Mr. Keay

(5.28.) MR. GOSCHEN: I thought I had made the point as clear as possible. I look upon the two Stocks as very nearly identical in value, though I look upon one as rather superior to the other. The length of time given for the enjoyment of the 2½ per cent. is in favour of the Land Stock, while, on the other hand, the fact that Consols have always been put on a separate footing and have always been higher than other Stock, reduces the difference between the two Stocks, and I believe, on the whole, that their values will be very nearly identical. When hon. Gentlemen ask me to prophesy what will be the precise value, that is a matter I cannot undertake. I will, however, venture to say that within three years there will not be any divergence in the prices of the two Stocks. It would be forcing the situation to ask me to prophesy what the value of the Stock will be.

MR. LABOUCHERE: What I want to know is, will it be permissible at any time to change Consols into this Stock?

(5.31.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to give us some reason for this fancy of his, and he will do so if he is anxious to shorten the Debate. We have heard of fancy franchises, and he is now creating fancy Stocks.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That is not the question before the House. The question is whether this Stock is to be redeemable after 30 years, in accordance with the provisions of the Act of 1888, or whether it is to be redeemable as soon as it has been created under a plan which the Amendment does not reveal.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It appears to me that the whole question of the redeemability of the Stock is involved. I cannot, for my part, object—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

(5.32.) MR. SEXTON: I hold that either this Amendment must be accepted or some identical provision be inserted in the Bill later on. My hon. Friend's proposal is that Parliament should indicate that the whole of the Stock issued is to be paid off within the period of the annuity. The whole of this financial scheme is founded upon an arrangement whereby after payment of interest to the stockholder 1 per cent. is reserved for the formation of a Sinking Fund. The information we at present have as to the nature of this Sinking Fund is of a most meagre character, and I think the time has come when it should be supplemented. How soon, I may ask, will the 1 per cent. per annum enable the Government to redeem Stock; and if it is allowed to accumulate, will the Government be able at the end of 49 years to redeem the whole of the Stock?

MR. GOSCHEN: That is our calculation.

MR. SEXTON: I assumed so. Then what is the actual intention of the Government? At what period do they intend to redeem the Stock? They seem to bind themselves to nothing. The provisions of the Bill in this respect are very peculiar. The proviso is that 30 years after the commencement, and not before, the Stock shall be redeemable. That is to say, the State must not redeem at all for 30 years. Why should the State be put under such an obligation? Why should the Government and this House now attempt to bind the State not to redeem the Stock for a period of 30 years? Let us see how this Sinking Fund is to be created. First, there is the 1 per cent., and the purchaser's assurance money. The average number of years' purchase in Ireland is about 15, instead of 20, so that every purchaser will have to pay about a quarter more than he ought to in the first five years. The result will be that there will be a sum of about £1,500,000 lying idle. Why should it be idle for 30 years? I do not see why that sum should not be devoted to the redemption of the advance. Why should the Government be bound not to redeem for 30 years? I believe that their real reason in this matter is that they want the Stock to have an artificial value, so that the landlords may sell it at a premium. We must resolutely oppose any proposal of that nature, and must secure that the Stock is redeemable as soon as it has been issued. I may point out that there is no provision making it obligatory on the Government ever to redeem the Stock. I can only add that the Government ought in this Bill to bind itself to put this Sinking Fund to its proper in saying that the insurance money will be applied to the Sinking Fund. It will have nothing to do with it.

(5.36.) MR. GOSCHEN: I think the hon. Member for West Belfast is in error

MR. SEXTON: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. If he will refer to Sub-section 4, Clause 7, he will find the words "Sinking Fund, including purchasers' insurance money."

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes; but that insurance money is not to be applied to the purposes for which the Sinking Fund is created. The Insurance Fund is part of the annuity. I doubt whether this is a proper occasion on which to explain the whole operation of the Sinking Fund. It has been considered wisest to leave to the State the freest possible hand in dealing with this Stock, in the interest of the State itself. I should have no strong objection to the insertion of words making it more clear that the State is absolutely bound to redeem, but we have thought it best to leave a free hand, and the Sinking Fund will be employed by the National Debt Commissioners in paying off the advance in the best manner possible. It must be remembered that a Stock with regard to which there was doubt as to how long it will go on paying 2½ per cent. is not one which can be held by trustees at all. We wish to make this a Stock which can be held by trustees, bankers and others, and I fear that a provision such as the hon. Member suggests would disqualify it as an investment for permanent purposes. I will, however, consider the question of inserting words with regard to the paying off of the advance.

(5.41.) MR. SEXTON: I shall be glad if the right hon. Gentleman will insert words which will place it beyond all doubt that the Sinking Fund shall be applied to the purposes for which it is proposed now to create it.

(5.42.) MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): If it should occur that the Stock be worth 2 or 3 premium in the market, would it not be well to reserve to the State the option of paying the landlords in cash instead of Stock, paying them, say, £100 in money instead of bonds to that amount?

*(5.43.) MR. KEAY: Did I understand the right hon. Gentleman to promise that he would insert words which will have practically the same effect as is arrived at by the Amendment?

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): From all I hear, it seems to me it would have been very much better for the Government to have borrowed the money in Consols and paid the landlords in cash, for then we should not have had all this trouble about the varying value of the Stock, while it would have been made clear to the British taxpayer exactly what this experiment is costing him.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That is not relevant to the Amendment before the Committee.

(5.44.) MR. CHANCE: I think there is one method of redemption to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer could have no objection. He might allow the tenants to tender for Stock at nominal value and thereby extinguish their liability for annual instalments. That surely would not interfere with the market value of the Stock.

MR. GOSCHEN: Of course, anything which would lead in the direction of the redemption of the Stock would meet with the approbation of the Government. I believe there is an Amendment down which aims at the object suggested by the hon. Member, and which indicates some process of that kind, but I have not yet been able to understand exactly what is proposed. I do not see how it would work.

(5.45.) MR. CHANCE: The right hon. Gentleman has pointed out with some degree of force that the value of the Stock will be interfered with unless people are certain that they will get interest on it for a definite number of years, and he, therefore, objects to a proposal enabling the Stock to be redeemed before 30 years have expired. My suggestion is this, that if a tenant owed £300 in a given year he should be allowed to go into the open market and purchase Stock to the nominal amount of his annuity and tender it to the Government in payment. That would practically extinguish the Stock without interfering with its market value.

(5.46.) MR. SEXTON: May I ask whether the Government are prepared to fix the redemption within a specified period?

Mr. Keay

MR. GOSCHEN: I should not like to say anything final as to the redemption until I have had an opportunity of consulting the draftsman. As to the proposal that payment should be accepted in Stock, I do not for the moment see any considerable objection, and I will consult my right hon. Friend as to whether an Amendment of that kind will be acceptable. Of course, if the Stock is below par it will pro tanto delay redemption.

(5.47.) MR. MONTAGU: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my question.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That subject is not relevant to the Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has certainly gone some way to meet our objection. The proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for South Kilkenny involved only a small operation, while that made by the hon. Member for West Belfast embodied much larger considerations. I think, in the interests of the country, we ought to have a definite answer on that.

MR. GOSCHEN: On what point?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the Government bind themselves in the matter of the redemption? They seem to be proceeding under the idea that they are sailing under the flag of the Ashbourne Act. That Act provided for an advance of £10,000,000, and when that sum has been re-paid the operation is entirely done with. You are, however, now using the framework of the Ashbourne Acts to involve the British taxpayers in altogether new liabilities. It is proposed that the Stock shall not be redeemed for 30 years, although £20,000,000 out of £30,000,000 may have been paid off. The money is during that period to be dammed up like a financial river, and will not go to redeem the Stock. The reason the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given for that is that he does not like to offer his friends, the Irish landlords, a Stock of precarious value, which this Stock will be if unascertained portions of it are subject to redemption at any moment. Of course, he does not say that in so many words, but he hints at it. He says he will give the holder of the Stock an absolute guarantee of non-extinguishment for 30 years. What in the meantime is to become of the money which the tenants are re-paying? The whole thing hinges upon the proposal in Clause 7, by which the National Debt Commissioners and the Treasury—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! Clause 7 has nothing to do with the point before the Committee. As I have already explained, the sole question is whether the Stock shall be redeemable at the end of 30 years under the Act of 1888, or whether it shall be redeemable at once, in a method as yet unexplained.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I appreciate the point, Sir. My object is to prevent this money being dammed up in the pockets of the National Debt Commissioners, and to provide that there shall be some blood-letting arrangement.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is clear to my mind, and I am sorry I cannot make it clear to other minds that the meaning is—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. T. M. HEALY: Well, I will drop that, and simply ask for a distinct statement from the Government as to when the Stock will be redeemed?

*(5.54.) MR. KEAY: As I understand the concession of the Government to be of a substantial nature, I am prepared to withdraw my Amendment.

MR. GOSCHEN: There must be no misapprehension on this point. My observations were confined to the point raised by the hon. Member for West Belfast. I distinctly hold the view that the first £30,000,000 shall be paid off within the 49 years, but I cannot undertake that the re-issues shall be paid off within the same period. I promise that words shall be placed in the Bill indicating that view.

(5.55.) MR. SEXTON: I agree that there must be no misunderstanding. It seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman is over cautious. He admits the 1 per cent. will enable all the advances to be redeemed within the 49 years, but when we ask him to bind the State by this Act to redeem, he says he will consider the point.

(5.56.) MR. GOSCHEN: I am anxious to safeguard myself. My promise is that the intention of the Government that the original advance of £30,000,000 shall be paid off in the 49 years, shall be indicated in the Bill.

(5.57.) MR. SEXTON: That is sufficient. Of course, I did not expect the right hon. Gentleman to go further. He says he will see how this object can be secured, and that promise means he will do it.

*(5.58.) MR. KEAY: I think the right hon. Gentleman hardly understands his own Bill, for it provides for the possible cancelment of all Stocks when the annuities cease, as also did his Bill of last year, from which my Amendment is taken. I do not see any difference between the right hon. Gentleman's intention and my wish as expressed in the Amendment. Therefore, I ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.0.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): The Amendment I propose to move is the omission of the words—"After 30 years from the commencement of this Act, and not before," and subsequently I have an Amendment to omit the reference to the "National Debt Conversion Act, 1888." So my proposition is that the clause should run—

"Such Stock shall be a Capital Stock, consisting of annuities yielding dividends at the rate of £2 15s. per annum on the nominal amount of the capital, payable by equal half-yearly payments on June 1 and December 1, and shall be redeemable at par by yearly drawings to an amount equal to the capital value of the sinking fund for the same year."

There is, first, the intermediate Amendment to line 16, and these, I may say, are alternative proposals. There is something to be said in favour of annual drawings, and without now entering upon a lengthened argument, I put forward the Amendment as it stands, and it may be deemed worthy of discussion.

Amendment proposed, in line 16, to leave out from the word "after" to the word "before," in line 17 inclusive.—(Mr. Conybeare.)

MR. GOSCHEN: I thought this was practically disposed of by the Debate we have had. We debated upon the last Amendment whether 30 years should stand, and I think we exhausted the arguments on both sides.

MR. CONYBEARE: The right hon. Gentleman has not quite caught my meaning. I do not wish to re-argue the question, which I am well aware has been discussed, as to whether 30 years should remain or not, but to get rid of the limit and introduce the alternative proposal of a yearly drawing. As a financier, the right hon. Gentleman is well aware of the fact that national and foreign loans are frequently redeemable in that manner.

MR. GOSCHEN: I did, in the previous discussion, address myself to the point. It is true the system to which the hon. Member refers is often applied to loans, but it is generally applied to other than first-class Stock, and not to Stock that Trustees can invest in. Nothing can be worse for a Stock to invite investors than that it should be subject to redemption at uncertain intervals. If for no other reason Trustees would not avail themselves of Stock of this character because of the uncertainty and trouble possibly of re-investment of the funds under their care at short intervals. In no Stock of high class is this considered a desirable method of redemption. The plan the hon. Member has suggested would be of no advantage to the State, nor would it be of any advantage to stockholders themselves, and I trust the hon. Member may not think it necessary to press the Amendment.

(6.5.) MR. T. M. HEALY: It is because of the mathematical precision with which the right hon. Gentleman puts his points that we have urged upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he should never have made this distinction between this Land Stock and Consols. I now ask the right hon. Gentleman—and the opportunity presents itself on this Amendment—to explain his position on this point, and why the distinction is made, and to defend the term of 30 years. We have observed the right hon. Gentleman's uneasiness whenever reference is made to the difference between this Stock and Consols; but we may ask him, why this term of 30 years? He has said, and no doubt his contention is correct, that if you have Stock redeemable at a moment's notice, the precarious nature of that Stock reduces its value as an investment; but when you have funded the Stock, why the provision of this term of 30 years?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member is wandering wide of the Amendment before us.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I did not intend to wander. I may say my mind remains at anchor upon this point; but I accept your ruling, Sir, that my observations are wide of the Amendment, and will not pursue the discussion.

(6.6.) MR. CONYBEARE: I admit the force of what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said as to the position of Loans and Stocks in the market, and have no inclination to waste time with my suggestion beyond saying that I should like to see it adopted in an experimental transaction like this. In reference to the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, I may say that I had not taken the view that this will be a first-class Stock, and I do not see any arrangement by which it could be made a first-class Stock. I should be sorry, indeed, for the Trustees and others who placed their investments in Stock of this kind based on a bogus security. However, that is a question for the protégés of the right hon. Gentleman in time to come. I do not insist on the Amendment. I accept the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, and ask leave to withdraw.

(6.9.) MR. CONYBEARE: I presume I shall now be in order in moving my Amendment to leave out "thirty" and insert "ten," and I am not aware that the ground of my Amendment has been covered by any discussion we have had already. The proposal of the Government, we are told, is to establish what they call a first-class Stock in which Trustees and bond fide investors may invest their money; and to make it a first-class Stock it is placed in a position better than that of what is usually known as the best first-class Stock for Trustees, namely, Consols. So far as I can judge the effect of the proposal made by the Government, it is to give a higher rate of interest to this than is given to those who invest in the ordinary and more or less depreciated Consols. In order, further, to protect their friends the landlords of Ireland, in order to give them the very best security in their power, they—to use a Stock Exchange slang expression—they “bull” this Stock, raising it to an inflated value, and giving the holders the advantage of selling out at an inflated price. The Chancellor of the Exchequer now proposes that it shall be fixed—that is to say, that it shall not be redeemable until after 30 years from the commencement of this Act. Now, we have here two extremes. In my last Amendment the proposal for annual drawings was pronounced precarious and unsound for a first-class Stock, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer goes, I think, to the other extreme when he proposes that the redemption shall not be until after a term of 30 years. Between these two points of extreme there are, I daresay, many points of agreement. I hold that the term of 30 years is too long, and that it is a long term I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer will admit, and I now propose to limit the period to 10 years, by way of an alternative for yearly drawings, the proposal I made just now. In fixing the term so high as 30 years the Chancellor of the Exchequer is taking a measure which will undoubtedly inflate the Stock he is creating in a manner wholly unnecessary and unfair. Now, the proposal to which I invite the attention of the Committee is to substitute “ten” for “thirty” and I shall be interested to hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether there is any substantial objection to that proposal. If his objection is one of those of the same character as his last, possibly we may approach each other by some figure between 10 and 30, but I think that a shorter term than 30 years is essential in the interest of the public.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 16, to leave out the word “thirty” and insert the word “ten.”—(Mr. Conybeare.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘thirty’ stand part of the Clause.”

(6.15.) MR. GOSCHEN: It is not probable that the whole of the £30,000,000 will be issued in two or three years, and if the period of issue were to approach five years then during five years the holders of the Stock would be uncertain what interest they were to receive. I notice with pleasure the view taken by Irish Members that the Bill is likely to operate pretty fast, there being a disposition among landlords and tenants to avail themselves of the facilities the Bill offers. But still I think the period of 10 years is much too short.

(6.16.) MR. CONYBEARE: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman, and there is apprehension that the Bill will operate pretty fast and our constituents will be defrauded by the operation of the Bill. But let me explain that my proposal is that the issue of Stock should be divided into certain quantities, thus: The right hon. Gentleman may want to issue, say, £10,000,000 this year, and perhaps another £2,000,000 in another year, and so on, and the time would run from the date of each issue. I do not say that provision is made for this in the Bill, but such provision could be readily made. I am not wedded to the term of 10 years; it may be a term of 12 or 15 years or 20 years, but I do think that when, as was said last night, the object is to give the landlords good security at par, there should be an undue inflation of value by fixing this term of redemption at 30 years. However, I survey the question with indifference, and do not press the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

*(6.19.) MR. KEAY: The Amendment I now have to move is that which appears at the end of the page at line 26. It is better, I think, that I should move the Amendment in the form I propose, because, so far as I know, other hon. Members may desire to introduce Amendments to the same line. I do not quite know what our Irish friends may say to my proposition, but, for my own part, I see no reason to strike out the Guarantee Fund in this place. In the interests of the Imperial taxpayers we think it better to retain it, and that is why I move the Amendment. The object of it is simply to prevent the general assets of the taxpayers of this country from being pledged for the benefit of the Irish landlords, and it is also for the purpose of securing that the Land Stock which they receive will rest, as it ought to rest in our opinion, on what the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself called in his speech of last year “the network of securities provided in the Bill." I remember that he was very strong upon this point, for when he followed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in Debate on the Second Reading he boasted that the great master of finance did not find himself able to attack this network of securities with which the Bill was surrounded. Now, if there is this excellent network of security I say why bring in the Consolidated Fund? It has been the standing boast from the Treasury Bench that this Guarantee Fund will in itself cover the whole of the advances under this Bill. Well, then, if these securities are sufficient, why, I say, bring in the Consolidated Fund? If, on the other hand, they are insufficient, what, then, becomes of the pronouncement that the British taxpayer incurs no risk whatever? Both of these propositions cannot be accepted; either the public taxpayers have risk, or they have not. If they have not, why this additional security? Before I proceed any further, perhaps I may be allowed to refer to a few words in the recommendation contained in the Report of the Royal Commission, which reported upon the working of the Ashbourne Act in 1887, words, I think, very pregnant in the consideration of the Amendment which I propose. The Commissioners say—

"It is clear from the evidence that the great majority of the small Irish tenants are not in a condition to meet the risk of fixed rents for so long a period as 15 years. It would, therefore, be prudent without further delay to make provision for revision at a shorter term than 15 years. We therefore recommend that the term should be shortened from 15 to 5 years."

Well, now, I ask what is the position of Her Majesty's Government, who, having appointed this Commission, and having received its recommendation, yet in these days—I may almost say in these decades—of falling prices and falling agricultural values, forget altogether this recommendation of their own Commission, and now provide for fixed payments for a period of 49 years? I do not want right hon. Gentlemen opposite to suppose that I am founding my argument on the figures of the old rents, as the Commission did. I know they will say—and they have a certain right to say—that they hope and believe that these annuities under this system are very different from the rents of which the Commissioners were speaking. I admit that the immediate necessity of revision may disappear, yet the principle, which the Royal Commission says is enforced by the evidence, is equally applicable to the present case, that principle being that it is impossible for the tenant to accept a fixed rent which he may not be able to sustain in case of a fall in value. There has, indeed, now been added an additional and enormous risk to the Consolidated Fund, inasmuch as this Bill deliberately provides for the wholesale overvaluing of the holdings. The Bill is apparently framed for the purpose of providing that the tenant be steeped in insolvency. Who would ever capitalise the gross value of a lease, or of any fixed property, as is done here, if he wanted the buyer to remain solvent? Suppose one of the right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench were going to buy an advowson, and the price was to be 25 years' purchase. He would not agree to pay 25 years' purchase of the gross value of the benefice, but would first deduct the outgoings, say for the salary of a curate, and then capitalise the net income of the benefice. This Bill is absolutely unique in proposing to capitalise the gross value instead of the net value of the holdings, and I say that an enormous additional risk is being placed on the Consolidated Fund by this means. We are, fortunately, indebted to the Government for having—tardily, it is true—provided a Return of a most interesting character, as elucidating this important matter. I refer to Return No. 47 of the present year. It must be remembered, in the first place, that the whole of the sales effected under the Ashbourne Acts have been at an average of 19 years' purchase of the valuation. Of course, the great majority of the tenants have been successful up to the present in paying their instalments. But what about the defaulters? The Return shows the number of them, and the ruinous annuities which have been saddled on them in consequence of the extortionate prices at which they have been compelled to purchase their holdings. I have averaged the whole, and find they have paid not 19, but 25 years' purchase. The lesson we must draw from this is that the deliberate overvaluing of holdings and the deliberate misguiding of the Commissioners as regards overvaluing, has the effect of making the tenant bankrupt and consequently of largely increasing the risks which come on the Consolidated Fund. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary will remember having produced to the House in his first speech a statement which was certainly very clear and much appreciated by the House, in which he took £100 as the ideal of rental, and said that the £100 would come down to £68 under the scheme of this Bill. When we look at what has actually taken place with the defaulters, what do we find? We find that the defaulting tenants have been charged 25 years' purchase of their holdings, and have, therefore, had to pay a 4 per cent. instalment on 25 years' purchase, which is equal to the whole of the Poor Law valuation of the holdings. This means that these poor tenants, instead of having had their £100 reduced to £68, could have had it reduced in the Land Court to £80, but by purchasing instead of going into the Land Court have had what would have been a judicial rent of £80 raised to £100 for 49 years. I do not wonder that these men are bankrupt. The deliberate capitalising of the gross value of the holding, instead of the net value, has the effect of almost ensuring their being placed in financial difficulties. I am very anxious to know by what method the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary can explain how the advance out of the Consolidated Fund to pay the dividends and the Sinking Fund payments can possibly be, as it is termed in the Bill, a "temporary advance." The provision is that the dividends and payments to the Sinking Fund shall be paid out of the Land Purchase Account; and if it is insufficient shall, to the extent of the deficiency, be paid as a "temporary advance" out of the Consolidated Fund, and every such advance shall be repaid out of the Guarantee Fund. I have no hesitation in saying that as the different Amendments come up I shall succeed in demonstrating that this clause simply directs that an impossibility be done. A "temporary advance" must, of course, imply that the Guarantee Fund had the coin, or in a short time would have the coin, in it for the purpose of repaying to the Consolidated Fund the whole of the dividends and Sinking Fund payments to be created by the Bill. I say that even if the Guarantee Fund succeeded at any time in paying off one year's instalment rendered necessary by default, the result would be that the income of Ireland would be correspondingly diminished by the denial of Imperial grants and contributions, and that would tend to cause a recurrence of the default in the following year. But there is a stronger argument. If the Guarantee Fund fails to pay up, the temporary advance becomes more or less permanent, and the Guarantee Fund can be shown to be absolutely, arithmetically, unable to pay up to the Consolidated Fund what is temporarily advanced until after an enormous lapse of time, and until an enormous amount of debt has accumulated. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, replying to a question I put to him in December, laid great stress on the alleged temporary character of the advance from the Consolidated Fund, and he even somewhat lost his temper, and accused me of "suppressing the fact that the Consolidated Fund is at once recouped by the Guarantee Fund." But I say that the whole of the Guarantee Fund is positively insufficient, and, therefore, it is impossible that the Consolidated Fund can have its advances at once recouped, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman. How can the Guarantee Fund at once recoup when it has not the coin in it to do so? Let us look at the figures in the Return presented at the request of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford and myself, showing the operation of the Sinking Fund. This Return was not all I wanted. For some reason best known to himself the Chancellor of the Exchequer has confined it to 30 years, and has not carried it to 49 years as I desired. But it shows that on the 30th year the annuities due from the tenants amount to £1,845,000. But the whole income of the Guarantee Fund for each year it is also shown will amount to £1,200,000 only. The right hon. Gentleman's own Return, therefore, shows a deficit at once for that single year of £645,000. What does this clause in the Bill say? Why, that the difference, which will be £645,000 on this one year alone, is to be "temporarily advanced" from the Consolidated Fund. Now, suppose that the whole of the £1,200,000, which constitutes the income of the Guarantee Fund, is got in. I will not enter into the difficulty of realising the Guarantee Fund and of denying the Contingent portion's contributions to Ireland. I take it all as cash, and I say the right hon. Gentleman will exhaust his Guarantee Fund. He will have a deficit which the Consolidated Fund will make good. Then how is the "temporary advance" to be recouped? It cannot be done by taking the next year's £1,200,000; assuming always that there is a default, for that will not only all go but the next year's deficit will in its turn appear to the extent of £660,000, and so on every year. Thus, deficits will go on accumulating year by year in the Consolidated Fund, although you sweep off the whole Guarantee Fund every year, and, as a result, at the end of 49 years you will have £13,000,000 or £16,000,000 that has been advanced out of the Consolidated Fund for a period of 19 years. I want to know if the right hon. Gentleman considers that to be a "temporary advance"? I want to know where the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his reply to me come in—the words in which he said I had suppressed the fact that the Consolidated Fund was at once recouped? Nineteen years is surely a long time for recoupment not to have been begun. The fact is, the Government have solved an extraordinary hydrostatic problem. There is an old saying that you cannot put a quart of water into a pint pot, but the Government have enormously powerful hydraulic machinery at their command. They have actually succeeded in putting the quart of water into the pint pot; and not only so, but the answer of the right hon. Gentleman showed that they are just preparing by this Bill to take it out again. All I have got to say is this: that the network of securities of the right hon. Gentleman will be proved to be only a network in the sense that it is full of holes.

It being ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

RESOLUTION.

(9.0.) Mr. ARTHUR DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): In rising to move the Motion which stands in my name on the Paper, I think I shall be right in saying that the House will not think it unreasonable that, after three years' working of the Local Government Act, it should once more consider the question how Local Government in our rural districts, that part of Local Government still the most incomplete, the most unsatisfactory, stands at the present time. I am not going to spend any lengthened time in speaking of the chaos and complication of Local Government in rural districts. I think that the whole of that subject is well known and well understood, and I will only say that after three years' promises in three successive Queen's Speeches of a District Councils Bill, the anxiety of the country for such a Bill, which will give some further measure of reform in the matter of Local Boards, Boards of Guardians, and other authorities, is certainly growing every day. I can testify, and I am sure many north-country Members can testify to the fact, that dissatisfaction as to Local Board elections and the election of Boards of Guardians, and the manner in which these elections are carried out, is increasing and growing constantly. It is one of those matters our constituents are constantly bringing before us in a great variety of ways. They ask why, when they vote for a member of a Town Council or a Member of Parliament under a simple straightforward method why they should be condemned to an antiquated and unreasonable method in these local elections for Local Boards and Boards of Guardians, where still the plural vote obtains, with a property qualification vote and the voting paper method, all profoundly annoying to people in populous districts. Now I have confined my Motion to rural districts because the problem there has a distinct aspect, and because I think that even town Members are brought to realise that the country question, the rural question, the state of the inhabitants of villages, and the kind of life they lead there, are matters of great importance to dwellers in towns as well as to those who live in the country. I hope my Motion in its wording is sufficiently clear, and I am somewhat surprised at the Amendment my hon. Friend the Member for Somerset proposes. I have not a word to say against District Councils. District Councils were in the Bill of 1888, that part of the Bill which had to be dropped. In my opinion, District Councils which shall do more than the Bill proposed they should do, and in the same way in some districts, though in some respects differing, in which the Boards of Guardians shall be merged, will be necessary for sanitary and Poor Law purposes for a long time to come. But what the upshot of my proposal comes to is this—that, the next time a Local Government Bill is brought in, whether you call it a District Councils Bill or whatever other name you give to it, it must be fundamentally of a different character from that part of the Bill of 1888, which we may call the District Councils' portion of that Bill. The District Councils' portion of that Bill, what did it do? It practically wiped out the parish. Many of those powers which, though not much in working, still exist as belonging to the parish, that Bill proposed to transfer to District Councils, and the Bill did nothing whatever to bring back any life into the parish or to reform the Vestry, and practically ignored the parish altogether. Now I say, if my Motion be accepted to-night, it would mean a fundamental change from the position in the Government Bill of three years ago. In my opinion, it is fundamental. You may say, after all, that the Vestry and the parish are very small matters, and they may be small matters, I know, but they may also lead to valuable local work and education in citizenship which in your little villages may, though it be a humble position, comparatively, be of very large educational value indeed. After all, what are the principles of Local Government, and the objects of Local Government, but the drawing out of local patriotism? It is not a question of poring over maps in an office, of sub-dividing areas and settling unions that they may be of the same size, or multiples of units nearly of the same size; nothing of the sort; we do not deal with great towns in that way. A great town grows from a small one, and we do not propose to split it in half. We give it the same Local Government whether it has 20,000 or 300,000 or 400,000 inhabitants. Nobody dreams of making any separation or division of the town grown from a small to a large size. In the same sort of way we must look to the question of Local Government in rural districts, not as a question of numbers but of interesting people in their own parish, large or small. I know that some of these parishes are small. The parishes I refer to, of course, are civil parishes. I am not concerned with ecclesiastical matters to-night. The parish is one of the most ancient institutions in the country, and it is rather remarkable that the Conservative Party should do anything to expunge from our midst the parish, the old township around which associations have gathered. Not so very long ago, there really was some parish life in the country. But by degrees, and for various reasons, village government dwindled to nothing worthy of the name, and gradually died out. I believe the time has come when we ought to revive it, and I believe there is a strong feeling among the inhabitants that they are capable of managing their own affairs if we give them an opportunity of doing so in their own way. Now the stock argument, which I dare say we shall hear more than once to-night, against doing anything for the parish, is that many of the parishes are so small. I shall be told, I dare say, that there are 6,000 parishes, with under 3,000 population. I quite admit this, and some of these parishes must be merged in those around and become larger parishes. But that does not affect the Motion. There are, I know, parishes so small that there is no strong feeling in connection with them. I am reminded of a friend of mine talking to a farmer in Wiltshire, and who asked how he stood in his relation to the parish, and the farmer replied he held land in two parishes, that he was made overseer in one of these parishes, but no Vestry had been called during four years, and it was not necessary; and in the other parish he generally sat on a stile and talked over matters with the overseer and settled them every Easter; so practically government in either parish was pretty much the same. An hon. friend of mine, who is a Member of this House, tells me he is one in a parish of 25 in population, and he tells me that he and two of his friends take turns in the office of overseer, and appoint an assistant overseer to do the work. Well, of course, parishes of that sort might well have been merged long ago, and not of such do I speak. What I say is that though there may be great difficulties in these boundary questions you have no right to sacrifice the interests of the larger parishes to the interests of the small. I am quite aware that there are parishes in Norfolk and in other counties where difficulties may arise, and it may be difficult to merge parishes with rural claims. But it is a question for the County Council to deal with. Each County Council knows its own county well, and can adjust boundaries and amalgamations, as the Local Government Board will never be able to do. I have looked into this question, and I find that in Wiltshire there are 10,000 people in little parishes of populations below 200, and 150,000 in parishes of populations from 250 to 4,000. These first parishes are small, but why, therefore, should we sacrifice the interests of the 150,000 for the 10,000, and of a population say of 10,000,000 in the rural districts? Now, my Motion first of all speaks of reformed Vestries; but, of course, the name is a matter of small importance. Some of my friends think that the word Vestry so much stinks in the nostrils of some people, because as an institution it has so long remained effete and non-efficient, that it would be better to do away with the word. Well, they may be called open parish meetings, or any other name would do as well, but I like the name of Vestry as well-known to the rural population; it has a meaning to them; and at any rate I wish to see a complete and effectual reform. Why it is asked by some, have Vestries, if you are to have District Councils? Well, it is a very important matter I think that you should have the opportunity of an annual open meeting of the parishioners, where all may meet. I think those town meetings of which we often hear as being held in American towns, and which are sometimes summoned by the Mayor in English towns, are very useful means for the discussion of questions of local interest. The reason why towns meetings are so difficult in towns is because the population is so large; but in proportion as there is less to interest, less to excite, less to occupy the attention of our country people, in proportion as the people's life is dull and dreary, and the means of entertainment are fewer, so in proportion also, ought you to give every opportunity to the villagers to meet in gatherings which would be the subject of considerable interest to them. I would say, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer said 20 years ago—

“You ought to give every opportunity for these town meetings, and make every reasonable provision for 10 or 20, or whatever larger number of ratepayers you think right, to summon open public meetings, for the discussions of matters which concern the inhabitants.”

An Instruction was moved in 1888 that provision should be inserted in the Local Government Bill to reform the Vestries. That proposal was defeated by the Government at that time. The whole of the Vestry Law is in a very chaotic state, and on some points there is a good deal of obscurity. The powers of summoning the Vestry are extremely limited. The powers of giving notice of business at Vestries are also extremely limited. The Chairman of the Vestry cannot be selected by the people, the plural vote arrangements are extremely unsatisfactory, and there is no adequate power of adjourning the meeting—each meeting is complete in itself—and when attempts are made to alter the time of meeting, they constantly prove ineffectual. The principle of one man one vote should prevail in all Vestry meetings, in all polls; the plural vote should be abolished, the people should choose their own Chairman, and in country villages there should be full right and opportunity of always meeting in the evening, which is the only time when the labourers can attend. Some of these changes would be perfectly simple. You could incorporate the Vestry, as the hon. Member for Rugby proposed to do in his Parish Councils Bill of last year. You could arrange for deliberations, for resolutions which might initiate important reforms, you could have gatherings which would back the Parish Council in their action, which would criticise the action of other authorities if they thought it injured in any way the interests of the parish. What is the Vestry as it stands at the present time in a good many parishes? I have here a Vestry notice which was hanging on some church door only a week or two ago. This is the notice—

it is a parish of 700 or 800 people—

“are requested to take notice that a meeting in Vestry will be held for the nomination of overseers and for the election of way wardens. It will be held on the 24th of March, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon, at the ‘Crown’”

—the “Crown” is a public house. If that is English Local Government in rural districts it is a very unsatisfactory thing. It would have been much better to say that “the five farmers and the one parson, and the five publicans”—for there are five publicans in this parish—“and the six tradespeople, and one or two other persons who may possibly come at 11 o'clock in the forenoon are hereby invited, and that the 120 or 130 labourers and artisans in the parish who cannot possibly come at 11 o'clock in the forenoon are asked to take notice that the meeting is to be at a time when it is well-known they cannot possibly attend.” We have many indications that the people are anxious to take advantage of the Vestry, incomplete and insufficient as it is. I heard the other day of a Vestry meeting in a northern county. About 9 or 10 people had been in the habit of attending it, but it so happened that recently a School Board has been started in the parish, and School Board matters had stirred up the people to take some interest in their own parish concerns. The people said “we will go to the Vestry.” The Vestry meeting was held in a public house. The room was not a large one, and the labourers and other people crowded in till the public house people were greatly upset lest their best parlour would be turned topsy-turvy. That is a warning against holding meetings in public houses, which I am glad to say I do not think is at all a common practice. A friend in my own constituency wrote to me recently to say that two years ago a majority of the working men from his parish, who live in the parish but work in the town, lost half a day to attend the Vestry meeting and see if they could not get the time altered from 4 to 7 p.m. A resolution was passed by a very large majority that the time should be so altered, but in the face of the resolution every meeting since had been called for 4 o'clock. There is no redress for anything of that sort. There is a little parish in Wales where there is a School Committee of a National Church School, of which the clergyman is the Chairman, and nearly all the other members of the Committee are Nonconformists. The Committee, of which I happen to be Secretary, work harmoniously. One of the first things this Committee discovered was that the school attendance officer, who lives several miles away, was doing nothing whatever to get the children to school. His pay was £25, equivalent to 1d. in the £1. The Committee sent a deputation to the governors, who referred the matter to the Vestry, thinking no doubt that the Vestry meeting would be attended by very few people. What happened? The Vestry meeting was held in the National School, and I am told the proceedings were rather lively. It was resolved that the work of the school attendance officer had not been done satisfactorily, and it was suggested that he should appoint a deputy and pay him out of his own salary. And then it was resolved to ask the School Attendance Committee to present a balance-sheet each year. Since the meeting, the attendance of the children has enormously improved, and the parties concerned have begun to get frightened of the parishioners. I am glad to know that some clergymen are holding Vestry meetings in the evening, and are encouraging the people to elect their own Parochial Council. One clergyman writes, that he thinks the labourers ought to be represented on this Council in the proportion of three to one of any other class. Then he says he has a Voluntary School Board elected on the same principle, and adds, that whatever else it does it disarms jealousy and suspicion, and produces more or less confidence all round. Why should we not emphasise such a state of things by making it a legal and proper process which should be gone through in every parish, whether the authorities that be like it or not? I now pass to the question of Parish Councils. I hold that in every parish of reasonable size a Parish Council, the members of which might vary in proportion to the number of the inhabitants, should be elected. It should be elected by ballot, and on a thoroughly popular basis. Such a Council should have administrative powers over matters which purely concern parishes. It should have the administration of the charities, of the allotments which are granted under the Allotment Act; it should have powers of control over public buildings, free libraries, common lands and footpaths. Then I think it might very reasonably, in some cases, be entrusted with limited sanitary powers; and besides all this, it would have its eyes open to a great many things which are wanted in the parish. It could call the Vestry together, and could appear with authority before the District or County Council. Amongst other matters it would be able to show and prove whether compulsory powers were wanted for the purchase of land or for the leasing of land for any public purpose—either for allotments, or small holdings, or for public buildings, village halls, or in some cases for dwellings. I consider that this question of dwellings and the security of tenure lies at the very root of all progress in a great many of our villages. I have present to my mind the case of a man living three or four miles outside a large town. He works in the town and goes backwards and forwards every day. His idea was that some day or other he would get around his house a piece of land as a vegetable garden, give up his town work and devote himself to country life. The man organised the flower shows in all the parishes around, and is one of the foremost men in the district. He has just got a month's notice to quit his house in order to make room for a second or third gamekeeper the landlord is going to engage. I do not complain of that, but this man, to my knowledge, is being driven into the town. He knows perfectly well that none of the chief landlords there would dream for a moment of giving him a piece of freehold. Mr. Fife in his evidence before the Town Holdings Committee mentions cases in which the landlord refused to give one bit of freehold. I say that no Small Holdings Bill, or any other Bill, which has not some kind of compulsory power behind it, will do any good whatever to the United Kingdom. Well, there is the question of education. I quite admit that the little parish School Boards, as we have them now, are not satisfactory. In England, at any rate, however things may be in Scotland, where there is a stronger feeling in favour of education, our rural districts will not be effectually organised until we have district School Boards embracing a number of parishes, with a view to providing higher and evening instruction for the children in the upper standards. At the same time there must be strong management, and if we have, as we ought to have, the schools under popular control, the parish Council will be well represented on such a body. There is a growing interest throughout the country on this matter of organised village management. I believe, and I do not hesitate to say, that when people learn lessons of association and lessons of responsibility a good many other things will follow. They will learn to develop the principle of association for their own interest in a way they have never hitherto learnt. I hope we shall see the great co-operative movement so successfully carried on in many towns introduced in the villages, where no facility is now given for the acquisition of freeholds for co-operative purposes. In many towns in the North of England they are a matter of course. The movement could not be successfully carried on without it. I hope we shall see the introduction of such co-operative societies as one I know. There is one society with which I am acquainted in a large district where something like 700 members, all working people, receive over their own counter £18,000 or £20,000 a year, of which they save £2,000 to put back into their own pockets; and for a labourer's wife, whose husband does not earn more than 15s. a week, to receive back £6 of her own, made by her own society, and not given her by any one else, is important as a lesson in self-help. I hope these methods of association will lead them to appreciate the value of a Trades' Union for the agricultural districts. In my opinion the successful development of an agricultural Trades' Union throughout the South East and middle of England would be one of the best possible things for the agricultural labourer. I do not know why, but for some reason this has been looked at askance by some who would not hesitate to tell the town labourers that they have to thank Trades' Unions for the progress they have made. I hope the agricultural labourers will learn the lesson which has been so beneficial to their brethren in the towns, and which has made them what they are. I hope my Motion is thoroughly clear. I have only been able to sketch my views in support of it in broad outline. I do not exclude District Councils; but when a District Councils Bill is brought in it will be utterly unsatisfactory unless it contains, as part and parcel of the Bill, these powers given to Vestries and Parish Councils. As I understand my hon. Friend's Amendment, part of which seems to me to refer to urban districts, it is merely a benevolent and pious opinion that District Councils are wanted. We said that long ago, and we have asked the Government for it, over and over again. District Councils have been mentioned in the Queen's Speech for three successive Sessions, and therefore I should not have thought my hon. Friend's Amendment was particularly necessary. In a Tory leaflet which I hold in my hand, and which was printed at Birmingham, it is said that some parishes are too large and some too small for Parish Councils; that Lord Salisbury's Government proposes to create District Councils elected by the householders, which will take over the duties of Boards of Guardians—that is new to me, for it was not in the Bill of 1888—and which will have power to look after labourers' cottages, establish libraries, repair the roads, and attend to many other matters. The leaflet goes on to say that they would have carried their proposals into practical effect before now but for Radical obstruction. I do not complain of that, for I suppose the writers of these leaflets have general instructions to fill up any blank spaces with "Radical obstruction." If there is one subject on which the Radicals never offered any obstruction it is District Councils, and if the Government had introduced a Bill dealing with that subject, instead of their attempt at temperance reform last year, they would not have had the slightest difficulty in bringing it to a successful issue. I think I know the views of some of my Tory friends in rural districts on this subject, and I believe they will strongly protest against Tom, Jack or Harry having an equal voice with themselves on parochial affairs. For my own part, I am sure that by degrees, they may be slow degrees—when Local Government has died out it cannot be revived in a day—I am quite sure we shall find our village people worthy of a trust of this sort. We shall be able to give those who must leave the villages, many of them strong, vigorous, enterprising men, a better knowledge of Local Government than they have at present; we shall accustom them to a sense of public responsibility—and as to those who remain behind, we shall be able to brighten their lives and give them a sort of education they have never had before. The process may be slow, but we must be patient with people who have had so few chances, though, for my own part, I do not believe in any speedy cure for the grave difficulties and hopelessness which beset much of our village life, due to a great variety of causes. The House of Commons can, by the means I have indicated, provide a training school in public responsibility and self-government at the very door of the people. Every example of such efforts in other countries shows they are almost invariably attended with success. It is in order to grant these responsibilities, to provide that kind of training in citizenship of which I have spoken, that I think we may heartily and earnestly ask the House of Commons to pass the Resolution which stands in my name.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I beg to second the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, no measure of Local Government for the rural districts of England and Wales will be satisfactory which does not provide for the reform of Vestries and the establishment of Parish Councils, so as to secure to the inhabitants of country villages a reasonable share in the management of their own affairs."—(Mr. Arthur Acland.)

*(9.44.) MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): There was a great deal in the excellent speech of the hon. Member who moved the Resolution with which I cordially agree. When I first saw this Motion on the Paper, drawing attention to the unsatisfactory position of Local Government in rural districts, I sincerely hoped that I should have the pleasure of supporting him. I thoroughly agree with him that it is unsatisfactory, and I am certainly not one whit behind him in wishing for its speedy reform. But I have two very strong objections to his Resolution in its present form. I object to it because it is a negative Resolution—a Resolution which, if it be carried, is more likely to delay Local Government reform in this House of Commons than to advance it—a Resolution which does not affirm the urgency of this reform, but which is in the form of an Amendment to the Second Reading of the District Councils Bill—a Resolution which, as my hon. Friend himself explains, requires a fundamentally different Bill to be introduced as regards District Councils from the provisions which were before this House three years ago—a Resolution which also, if he will allow me to say so, seems intended rather for consumption on public platforms than for practical use in this House. Such a Resolution is surely one which those who wish for a speedy settlement of the present difficulties which surround Government in rural districts cannot very well vote for. My second objection to the Resolution is that it gives quite an undue prominence to the parish as related to the district; it exaggerates the functions of parochial Government, and entirely ignores the district. It tends to put Local Government reform in the future on a wrong basis, and, in effect, it puts the cart before the horse. Therefore, the carrying of this Resolution will, in my opinion, embarrass rather than aid those who are anxious to put Local Government on a more satisfactory basis in the future. The present position is eminently unsatisfactory. We have got the reformed County Councils above, and below we have the chaos of overlapping areas and unreformed authorities and conflicting rates, which has been so often alluded to. The only way, in my humble opinion, to evolve order out of this chaos is to unify areas, to create proper District Authorities, and to concentrate in those authorities all the powers which appertain properly to district affairs—powers relating to the Poor Laws, highways, and sanitation. And then it must be secured that the District Authority is brought into proper subordinate relation to the County Council. Care must be taken that this District Authority is not only the only rating authority within its district, but that it is the predominating administrative authority. That being so, the question arises, what is to be the principal unit of district government? I should certainly gather from the remarks of my hon. Friend, that his opinion is that the parish ought to be the predominant unit in District Government. Certainly the choice lies between the parish on the one hand and the Union or Rural sanitary District on the other; and it seems to me that the Motion affirms the necessity of setting up in every parish, or at all events in every parish of tolerable size—for my hon. Friend did not clearly define what, in his view, ought to be the exact number of the population which should be required,—a Parish Council endowed with sufficiently extensive powers to make it the serious rival of any District Council. With regard to the reform of the Vestry, I am willing to admit that I am very much at one with my hon. Friend in that matter. I confess that our present Vestry needs reform; but I decline to put the reform of the Vestry side by side with Parish or District Councils, because, after all, the Vestry has extremely little to do in the matter of local government. It ought, moreover, to be borne in mind that there are many Vestries which are conducted in a way that fairly meets the needs and wishes of the inhabitants; and, therefore, this reform of the Vestry is not such a pressing thing as seems to be imagined. My hon. Friend has made light of the question of the size of parish areas; but I must say I think it necessary to impress this fact on the House, because, after all, in choosing new areas, the number of the population is the most important point to be considered. In England and Wales there are some 15,000 parishes; and about half of these have a population of under 500. I have not with me the exact figures; but from the Returns which were published some years ago, it may be gathered that there were some 6,000 parishes in England and Wales in which the population was less than 300. In my own county of Somerset we have 550 parishes in 300 of which the population is under 500, and in Norfolk I find that out of 800 parishes no less than 600, or three-fourths have a population of under 500. Thus, more than one-half of the parishes in England and Wales have a population of under 500 people, and yet that is the area my hon. Friend thinks the most suitable area in which to establish Councils with extensive powers. There are only two arguments, as far as I know, for taking the parish as the principal area for District Government. The first is that it is an ancient institution to which a large amount of local sentiment attaches. That is naturally an argument which recommends itself extremely to hon. Members on this side, and which also recommends itself to me. But when you come to examine the size of the parishes, the amount of rearrangement, and, in some cases, of sub-division which they will have to undergo, it becomes perfectly clear that your reformed parish will be very different to the original parish, and will probably become an area to which very little local sentiment attaches. The other argument is that the parish is a small area containing a number of inhabitants who could meet together for the purpose of discussing matters of Local Government, and would not be barred by distance from so doing. But there is this fatal objection—experience has shown us that these small areas have been found to be unsuitable both for Poor Law and for highway administration. I think it will be admitted that the parish would also be a most unsatisfactory area for sanitary administration. ["No."] If that is not admitted I might remind the House that when the Local Government Bill was passing through it, there were serious complaints from hon. Members on this side of the House that sanitary matters could not be satisfactorily administered in small areas, and for that reason steps were taken to enable the County Councils to appoint sanitary officers. On the other hand, I may remind the House that the sanitary district which was practically brought into existence by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax at a date subsequent to that at which the present Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed the parish should constitute the area of county government, has been found so convenient in practice as to have been almost universally adopted for all new district purposes during the last 20 years. I think this will constitute a very strong argument for the sanitary district against the parish. The sanitary district is not such a large area that men cannot meet together to discuss local affairs, even in the most scattered parts of the country, but it is large enough to give a choice of able and competent administrators. Now my hon. Friend proposes to set up Parish Councils in every parish, and I want the House to realise how these Parish Councils would work, and I think that in so doing I am entitled to call in aid the Bill of last year which was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby. The House is able to judge from that what kind of powers the Parish Councils are likely to have if they are set up according to the wishes of hon. Gentlemen on this side. Take a parish with a population of 200 persons. Its Council would be elected for three years; its Council would be able to appoint its mayor, clerk, banker, surveyor, and solicitor; it would have powers to acquire an unlimited amount of land compulsorily for allotment purposes, and now my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham proposes to give it power to acquire land for erecting houses.

MR. A. D. ACLAND: I do not propose that.

*MR. HOBHOUSE: That explanation I accept. But at any rate the Parish Council would have the management of the schools and charities, and extensive Poor Law powers, according to the Bill of the hon. Member for Rugby, for it would be actually able to discharge indoor paupers and order the Guardians to relieve outdoor paupers. As to sanitary powers, they include the inspection of all houses, and the services of sanitary officers are required. They were to have some highway powers, such as preventing the obstruction of footpaths. That is a short account of the powers proposed to be given to the Parish Councils. What I want to ask the House to consider is how this could be worked. Suppose we have a parish of 200 inhabitants, that means 30 or 40 families—perhaps 30 agricultural labourers' and a few farmers' families. These 30 labourers will have absolute control of all parish matters; even a small minority of them may get this control, because we know that, unfortunately, in these country districts there is great apathy in regard to local affairs. Therefore we may have ten or a dozen agricultural labourers electing their mayor of the parish, and this mayor, where the population of the parish is over 500, is to be an ex officio Magistrate. These Parish Councils when elected would, perhaps, in many places, consist of five agricultural labourers—because in many places where, I am sorry to say, the agricultural labourers are not on very good terms with the farmers, they would certainly object to electing any but a member of their own class to a Parish Council, and these Councils are to have extensive powers over land, houses, charities, Poor Law, and sanitation. Then, the members of these Councils may be all compound householders, not paying rates. There is no doubt that in many of the rural districts an increase of rate does not fall on the occupier but on the owner, therefore, it will matter very little to the members of the Parish Council how much the rates are increased. They will have no interest in economy, and very little leisure to attend to public affairs. I wish to ask the House whether, under these circumstances, which will probably prevail in a large number of parishes out of the many thousands you have to deal with, there is likely to be a very wise administration of local affairs? Let us look back 50 years to the way in which the Poor Law was administered by the parish, and do not let us do anything to recall that state of things, and to bring back the abuses which prevailed. I am bound, however, to remind the House that under that system the Poor Law was administered mainly by those who had a direct interest in keeping down rates, while in the proposed Councils these matters would be administered by those who have practically no interest in keeping down rates. There is another illustration which, I am glad to see, was alluded to by the hon. Member for Rotherham—the small parish School Board. That is the only instance, or, at any rate, the nearest instance, of a body similar to that he proposes to set up. I was not surprised to hear my hon. Friend, who has devoted so much valuable time and labour to the cause of education, admit that these small parish School Boards are not very satisfactory bodies. Of course, there are exceptions, but I have heard from Government Inspectors and schoolmasters serious complaints of the small parish School Boards, for the simple reason that in the small area of a parish there are not always competent men to man such bodies. But now the hon. Member is proposing to set up bodies with far more extensive and varied powers in the very areas where these bodies have failed. I, therefore, contend that by setting up these bodies we should be running the greatest risk of bad administration. But there is another objection. We should fail to simplify the present chaos. For it is acknowledged that District Councils would remain for many purposes side by side with Parish Councils, and the last named, if they receive the powers I have mentioned—poor-law, sanitary, and highway powers—will usurp the functions of the District Councils, and materially interfere with the performance of their duties. You would have the powers divided between two bodies mutually interdependent—half dependent and half independent—neither subordinate to the other, and the Parish Council practically the more powerful of the two. You would then have either waste and expense from these bodies employing a double set of officers, or constant friction, confusion, and general irresponsibility from their employing the same set of officers. Thus, if we set up without due consideration these Parish Councils with extensive powers side by side with the District Councils—which we all admit must be set up—we shall run the risk of making confusion worse confounded, of deterring good men from taking part in local affairs, and the still more serious risk of generally discrediting the development of Local Government throughout the country. This last consideration is to those who approach this question, as I endeavour to do, from a non-Party point of view—[Laughter.] Hon. Members may laugh, but I have a right to say this to the House, for before I took any active part in politics at all I expressed publicly in writing exactly the same views I am expressing to-night, which views I have always held, and shall continue to hold, until I am convinced that I am wrong. I say the consideration I last referred to is an important one to those who consider the matter from a non-Party point of view. If we want steady and healthy development of local institutions we must guard against too precipitate forcing. No doubt further steps are required, but we ought to be secure of our ground, and take care that we shall not have to reverse our steps in the future. We must remember that we are legislating in the South of England for districts which, compared with some others, are backward. We want good administrative bodies, manned by competent men, and I hope we shall not sacrifice the cause of good Local Government to any considerations of Party. I am well aware that "Parish Councils" is a very popular name on public platforms, but there are higher considerations than those of the platform. I think we should take care to realise what we are proposing, and to regard the matter from a responsible point of view. Having said so much about Parish Councils, I will shortly deal with my own proposal. My own Amendment proposes to do that which I believe we all desire—to group the rural parishes under popularly elected District Councils, with concentrated powers, and in touch with the people, through making the areas of a fair and workable size. These District Councils when established must be put in proper relations with the County Councils. Every County Councillor, for instance, should be an ex officio District Councillor. With regard to the second part of my Amendment, which provides for the control of local affairs in urban and populous places, I would point out that in many rural sanitary districts there are towns or populous places which stand on a very different footing from the ordinary small country parish. Those places will require different treatment in respect to local control, and various suggestions may be made in respect to them. We might set up Local Boards for all towns of 5,000 inhabitants and under, or we might enable the County Councils to delegate to them certain powers, but powers not so extensive as Local Boards will possess. Whatever course we adopt let our system of district government be as elastic as possible. We should have a system of joint committees, so that the sanitary districts included in a union may be able to work together for Poor Law or other purposes. On the other hand, power should be given to set up executive committees in all small towns or large villages. I would give every town or village of 2,000 inhabitants, the right to have powers delegated to an Executive Parish Committee by the popularly-elected District Council. These Executive Committees should manage the lighting, sewage, allotments, public buildings, burial grounds, and perhaps the schools of the parish. I would extend the Parochial Committees now existing under the Public Health Act, and would make them really responsible bodies with some financial control. In this way there would be elastic and suitable machinery set up for any parish which desires it. I would further urge that such reforms are greatly needed. The present difficulties existing between the County Councils and the District Councils are really of an urgent and an awkward character. Many County Councils have hung up the question of the maintenance of the main roads until District Councils shall have been created. The responsibility of maintaining roads and bridges being now vested in the County Authority, the improvements required mainly for the benefit of particular localities cannot be effected at the cost of those localities. The Allotments, Housing of the Working Classes and Sanitary Acts are not properly administered, owing to the want of a popularly elected District Authority. These evils are fully recognised. The County Councils Association, at a meeting the other day, passed a resolution by a majority of 2 to 1 urging the introduction of a District Councils Bill. On behalf of all interested in Local Government, I would make a strong appeal to the President of the Local Government Board to redeem the promise he has so often made, and produce a District Councils Bill. Even if there is no possibility of passing the Bill this Session, much good would result from the introduction of the measure. In dealing with such a complicated subject as Local Government, the more time that is given for the consideration of the questions involved, the more likely is there to be produced a good measure in the end. I believe that no time will really be lost by giving a Second Reading discussion to the District Councils Bill this Session. I feel sure the right hon. Gentleman will be a willing party to this appeal, and that he will not wish to leave the great reform he has undertaken incomplete. He will not wish it to be said on his retirement from office that the system of Local Government is left, as the Latin poet has said—if it is still allowable to quote Latin in this House—

"Desinit in piscem mulier formosa superne."

Above we have a well-planned and successful superstructure of County Government, while below we have nothing but chaos. I trust that by accepting this Amendment the right hon. Gentleman will give a further pledge for the introduction of that Bill which is to complete his scheme of Local Government on sound and satisfactory lines.

Mr. Hobhouse

(10.22.) MR. HASTINGS (Worcestershire, E.): I do not desire to say one word against the introduction of improved Local Government into our rural districts. I think, however, that the hon. Member who brought forward this Motion has done a little injustice towards the inhabitants of rural districts in imagining that they do not avail themselves of the means they at present have of making their voices heard and of improving their local administration. With regard to County Councils, I was very much struck with the interest that was taken in my own parish in the election of a County Councillor nearly three years ago. I was asked to take the chair at a meeting, and although it was a night in November, and was pouring with rain, and although many of the people had to come a considerable distance, there was a large attendance of all classes, and the keenest interest was taken in the question who was to represent them on the County Council. I listened to what the hon. Member said as to the indifference of the rural populations to District Councils, and their desire for Parish Councils. I am frequently in every parish, I believe, in my own constituency, and I have been asked again and again within the last 12 months why the District Councils Bill has not been brought in, but not once have I been asked if there is to be a Parish Councils Bill introduced. The hon. Member will allow me to say that I cannot agree that Parish Vestries are so very ineffective as he seems to imagine. In my own parish we have Vestry meetings much more frequently than once a year, and they are very well attended. I was present at one not long ago, called at the wish of the electors, because it was believed that the Poor Law and sanitary administration was not properly carried out by the parish. Men of all classes were there, and they showed complete ability to understand the questions at issue, and to manage their own parochial affairs. Although there is no doubt that the Vestry system requires amendment, it might be made much more effective if it were placed upon more modern lines than it is on at present, and I do not see why it should be superseded. I believe that reformed Vestries would much more commend themselves to the minds of our rural population than Parish Councils. I do not think it is desirable that we should search for a more distant object when we have before us a question that is ready for immediate solution. It is for District Councils that we ought now to press; and it is because I feel that the bringing forward of a Parish Councils Bill would seriously embarrass us in pressing for District Councils that I support the Amendment. It may well be that at some future time we may go on from District Councils to a further development of Local Government. I believe, however, that District Councils can now be brought practically before us, and I therefore ask the House to say that District Councils shall be first constituted.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out all after the words "provide for," in order to add the words "the grouping of rural parishes under popularly elected district councils, and the effective control of local affairs by similar bodies in urban and populous places, and that such further reform of Local Government in rural districts is urgently required,"—(Mr. Hobhouse.)

—instead thereof.

*(10.27.) Mr. SEALE - HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I desire to say a few words in support of the Motion, and I must congratulate my hon. Friend (Mr. A. Acland) on having brought the question so fully and ably before the House. I regret that the hon. Member for East Somerset (Mr. Hobhouse) should have endeavoured to drag a red herring across the scent by substituting an Amendment relative to the establishment of District Councils. The hon. Member for East Somerset is a supporter of Her Majesty's Government, and Her Majesty's Government have promised us District Councils. When they introduced the Local Government Bill of 1888 they promised to deal with the question of District Councils in the following Session. That promise was not kept. I believe they also promised to deal with it this Session, and it seems to me there is very little chance of that promise being kept. However that may be, as the hon. Member for East Somerset supports Her Majesty's Government, I take it that he ought to be satisfied with their promises, and not throw obstacles in our way, who desire to go at once to the root of the matter by creating Parish Councils. It has been acknowledged by all those who have undertaken the question of Local Government Reform that in order to establish a satisfactory and thorough reform you must begin with the parish. The hon. Member for East Somerset desires that the district should be the unit of Local Government. The district, in my opinion, is too large, and I think that in some instances even the parish is too large. I live in a parish five miles away from the centre of Parochial Government, and I have the pleasure of paying for lights which I cannot see, for drains which are useless to me, and for burial grounds, recreation grounds, and other supposed local advantages. To make the anomaly more absurd, the next parish within a few hundred yards of my residence provides some of these things, should I require them, at the expense of their rate-payers, whilst I have to pay a considerable rate for those which are absolutely useless. I admit that in order to obtain a satisfactory Local Government we should begin by readjusting our areas; and whether you call these units of Local Government parishes or districts, the beginning must be made by ascertaining first of all the proper dimensions to the local area, and adjusting the local boundaries to meet the necessary requirements. I live in the West of England, a little further west than the hon. Member for East Somerset. In my part of the world we do not care very much for the squire, and we do not pay much attention to the parson; but we rather want to get rid of the dominating influence of both the squire and the parson in parish matters. We want to have the control and management of our own affairs. First, we want to control the allotments of the parish; we also want power to take land on compulsion for the purpose of allotments. I, for one, would go even a step further, and give them power to take land for the purpose of small holdings, subject to the control of the District or County Councils. This, I think, is a sine quâ non for rural parishes in the West of England. We also desire that the parish should have full control of the parochial charities, and be able to administer them irrespective of denominational considerations. We know that they often get into the pockets of those who are, or represent themselves to belong to one denomination, and we want them to be administered fairly by Council elected by the people on which all parties are represented. Again, we feel very strongly on another point; we have an Established Church and the clergy of that Church, I assume, are our servants as long as the Church is the Church of the nation. We desire, therefore, to have some control by means of Parish Councils over their nomination, and to be able to get rid of those clergymen who do not satisfy their parishioners. We desire to be placed in the same position as our Nonconformist friends, who are able to select such ministers as will serve them in a suitable manner. As long as the Church of England takes the national money the clergy ought to be subject to national control. Then, again, the Parish Councils ought undoubtedly to have some control over the relief of the poor. I do not say entire control, but sufficient to enable them to amend the manner in which the aged and infirm are dealt with. I am afraid it is often very harsh under the management of the Guardians. Then, again, the sanitary condition of the villages ought to be in the hands of Local Parish Councils; and where there are no active and efficient School Boards, I think it would be expedient to place parish school management in the hands of Parish Councils, because, being elected by the people, they would be the proper authorities to exercise control. Beyond this, we desire to have control over the management of open spaces and commons, believing that the Parish Councils on the spot would be able to keep better watch over any encroachments that may be made than is the case under the present system. In fact, we want our

Mr. Seale-Hayne

Parish Councils to have the same power as the Town Councils. We want to get rid of the various Boards which at present in some parishes exercise an overlapping authority which leads to a chaos of control. There is also no reason why Parish Councils should not also have the control of all burial grounds, in which case they would certainly put an end at once to many of the scandals that are common at the present day, when high-handed action is taken by clergymen of the Church of England which is the cause of gross offence to many of their parishioners, and contrary to the true spirit of Christian charity. I do not see why the chief of the Parish Council should not have the same position as the Mayor of a municipality, and be made a Magistrate of his district. By doing this we should satisfy the want felt by the people that they should have some control over the appointment of the Magistrates. By giving the Chairman of the Council the powers of the Magistrate you would ensure the election of the best men in the parish, who, in such case, would be induced to come forward. If you wish to set up a thorough system of Local Government you must begin at the foundation and re-constitute the parish. I assure the House that this reform is ardently desired in every rural district; and, from personal experience, I know that there is no more popular topic on which you can address a rural audience than that of showing them how they may get control of their own affairs. Whatever may be the fate of this Resolution, I trust the Government will think fit to give this matter their most earnest consideration; and that when they introduce, as I trust they will within a short period, a further measure of Local Government, by bringing in a District Councils Bill, they will at the same time include the appointment of these Parish Councils, and thus satisfy a great and growing demand on the part of the people of this country.

(10.38.) MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I came to the House to-night in order to hear from my hon. Friend what work he intended to give these Parish Councils which has not hitherto been conferred on the Vestries. In addition to that, I wanted to hear something I have not yet heard, namely, how he proposed to group the small parishes together. That is a practical difficulty which has occurred to me. I see great utility and advantage in the case of many parishes arising from the constitution of Parish Councils, but I think they ought to be of a sufficient size, and that the difficulty is not removed when the hon. Member for Rotherham tells us we must merge the small parishes in the best way we can. My hon. Friend has told us that in the small parishes there is no sentiment. My experience is that the smaller the parish the more sentiment there is in regard to it, and that if you try to group two small parishes you will have a more difficult task than in the case of two large ones. Differences arise between the smaller parishes which do not exist between larger ones, and if you lump together three or four small parishes under one Parochial Committee you will necessarily raise questions of very considerable difficulty. I was particularly struck by the impractical way in which the Mover of the Resolution, and those who supported him, dealt with this question. I should like to know how many hon. Gentlemen who adopt these views ever attend parish Vestries, how many hon. Gentlemen opposite, for instance, attended the Easter Monday Vestry in their own parish this year? My hon. Friend made certain statements which puzzled me immensely. He spoke of a state of affairs which I hardly knew of as existing under the present law. For instance, the hon. Member for Rotherham has said he knew of a case of a Vestry who got rid of a Guardian. How, I ask, can a Vestry get rid of a Guardian? The Vestry has no power to appoint a Guardian, and, therefore, has none to take away his office; although I can imagine cases in which they might think it very desirable that an obnoxious Guardian should be got rid of. The hon. Member also said he knew a parish where the accounts had not been audited for years, but how about the district audit, how had they got over the presentation of the books half-yearly to that audit? The hon.

Member also said he knew a parish where a Vestry meeting had not been held for four years. I want to know how such a thing could have taken place. I know that Vestry meetings are not called very frequently in the rural districts, but they are always held when required if the parish expresses a wish to hold them. Again, the hon. Member told us cases in which Vestry meetings are held at hours that are not convenient to the bulk of the local community. That, unfortunately, is true; where there is a whip up the labourers may be got together, but as they have not attended those meetings regularly, they do not take much interest in the business, and I think it very desirable that all Vestry meetings should be held at hours at which a labourer can attend them. Again, my hon. Friend wished us to believe that it was a matter of constant occurrence for Vestry meetings to be held in public houses. For my part, I never heard of such a thing in my life, and I do not believe it can have happened in more than half-a-dozen parishes in England. At any rate, such a scandal could not exist if public attention were once called to it. For my part I am anxious to see in certain parishes some sort of practical committee that might be more useful than the existing Vestry. Under the existing Sanitary Acts all the parochial work has to be delegated or ought to be by the Sanitary Authority to local committees. Those parochial committees are sometimes elected partly by the parish and partly by the Guardians, but as the money expended is that of the parish, I should like to see the parish initiate a great deal more than it does. One great difficulty, however, is that the parish has at present no machinery. It has no clerk, and is obliged to employ the clerk to the Guardians for the work it requires in this way, and this, of course, adds to the expense; but in large parishes this difficulty is got over by the appointment of a Standing Committee to look after sanitary matters. Again, the Parish Authority has to carry out the Allotments Act, the expense of which falls on the parish itself. Again, in almost every parish there are certain roads and approaches which might be left to the Parish Authorities. As it is, the improvements in the roads are not as numerous as formerly; and it would probably be an advantage to give the parish control over such matters. Reference has been made to the question of parochial benefactions. I am certainly inclined to think that during the last 50 years the Vestries have been very lax in looking after benefactions, the result being that in some cases they have been entirely lost owing to their being left to one or two persons to look after, and to this duty having been neglected. But when hon. Members say that those benefactions should be handed over entirely to the control of the Parish Committee, the difficulty arises that they have generally been left to the management of trusts, usually the vicar and churchwardens, or one or two of the principal residents in the parish; and it would be a very easy matter to transfer them to trusts other than those appointed by the donor. We have also had reference made to the question of co-operation and the advantage of setting up co-operative societies in the villages. For my part, I should be sorry to see the co-operative stores set up in many of our rural districts, notwithstanding the fact that they might enable the villagers to get their goods a little cheaper. I should regret to see the small village shopkeeper entirely swept away. At present a great number of widows and poor persons obtain their livelihood by keeping small shops, and I should be very reluctant to see them suppressed by co-operative stores. In conclusion, I hope the hon. Gentleman opposite will give an answer to my question—how does he propose to deal with the grouping of the parishes? I am not averse to voting for a grouping scheme that could be practically carried out, and I can understand that such grouping might be managed in the case of the larger parishes. I think, however, there would be great difficulty in the case of the smaller ones. For my part I am disposed to give more attention than this House has hitherto done to questions affecting the position of those in the rural districts, but I do not think the rural population will be inclined to think so if all we have to give them is the establishment of reformed Vestries. I should very much prefer to see the attention of the House directed to something of a more practical character by which the condition of things in the rural districts may be improved.

(10.55.) SIR E. GREY (Berwick-on-Tweed): I quite sympathise with the hon. Member who has moved the Resolution in his desire for a certain extension of Municipal Government. But I think he would have had more of our sympathy if, in his wish to reform our Vestry system, he had gone further and said he wished them to be put on a more popular basis by the abolition of the plural vote. The hon. Member expressed regret that Vestry meetings are frequently called at an hour when the labourers are unable to attend. One object of the Motion is to make such a scandal as that impossible. The Amendment before the House contemplates the grouping of parishes as a desirable thing; but while the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham contemplates the grouping of parishes as a system that might be resorted to on exceptional cases—why, I ask, has the Mover of the Amendment thought it necessary to bring forward a proposal to displace the Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham? He has told us that we are putting the cart before the horse; for my part I do not see that we are doing anything of the kind. I do not know whether the Mover of the Amendment desires to present us either with the cart or the horse, but at any rate the object of the Resolution is to ensure that we shall not have one without the other. I suppose the Amendment was brought forward from this side of the House in order that a proposal from this side for the establishment of District Councils might be at once answered by the statement that in view of the Bill promised by Her Majesty's Government, the Resolution of my hon. Friend was an intrusion on their domain, and showed a want of faith in them, which they had done nothing to justify. But the fact is that the Resolution does not touch the question of District Councils. It merely refers to the importance of establishing Parochial Councils. The Mover of the Amendment seemed to be afraid that by the establishment of Parochial Councils we should fail in finding the best 12 or 20 men to conduct parochial affairs; but the supporters of the Resolution assert that it would be the means of arriving, by natural selection, at those 12 or 20 men who are best capable of conducting parochial affairs. At present we have no means of finding out which are the best men for this work, and at present there is a strong feeling in the country that the more capable men are not contented with country life, and are leaving it for wider and more ample spheres. Although, undoubtedly, country life has considerable advantages, there is no doubt that it lacks variety and scope. There are, however, two things which help to compensate those who reside in the country for the want of that variety which they find in towns. First of all there is the interest and enjoyment a man has in larger and more extended private possessions, and, in the next place, the opportunity afforded him by the performance of those public duties which are always opened to him in the rural districts. Of course, the ordinary inhabitants of the villages have little to boast of in the way of private possessions, but, at any rate, they have more opportunity of participating in the performance of public duties. In proportion as his private possessions are narrow, we ought, I think, to give the villager some chance of feeling that he is a member of a living and growing community. As an instance of the way in which the desire for more scope among villagers arises, I may mention the establishment of reading rooms. Those who take charge of a movement are invariably told that if they wish to make it a success the first thing is to put it under the control of the people. What does that show? It shows that in every village it is not necessarily because the villagers are not conscious of the advantages of a reading room—not because they do not want it, or because they are not fit for it—that it often fails, but because it is accompanied by that sense of dependence which prevents them getting the full development of it. Take the question of allotments. Apart from the question of rent it seems to me that the success of the allotment system depends on very small things—on the quality of the soil, the size of the allotment, its situation, and the family circumstances and habits of the man who holds it. A Parish Council would be the only body with the proper knowledge of these small details, and with the capacity to appreciate them and adjust them in the most suitable manner. A Parish Council would set the allotment system going, and would be encouraged by success or warned by failure long before a larger body like the District Council had got under-weight at all. It is time to recognise what is the spirit of the age. Parliament has long been employed in extending municipal enterprise and municipal ownership, and a similar system should be extended to the country villages. It is quite foreign to the spirit of the times that large landowners—sometimes only one or two, or half a dozen in a parish—should continue to exercise as a matter of course a predominant influence over village life. Hon. Members opposite say that landlords and clergymen, the two most influential persons in any village, perform their duties in a thoroughly satisfactory manner, and are the benefactors of their fellow men. On this side of the House there may, perhaps, be some difference of opinion as to the number of their duties, and the degree in which they are performed. Who is to decide that difference of opinion? There is only one possible body to appeal to, namely, the people of the parish. If the influential people in a parish perform their duty in the satisfactory way hon. Members opposite say, they are the guidance of the Parish Council which will fall at once into their hands, and will remain in their hands as long as they prove themselves worthy of retaining it. The result will be that they will have an open recognition of the way in which they perform their duties. If, on the other hand, it is not the case that those duties are universally well performed, it is surely desirable, and the friction would be comparatively small, that we should establish some such body as a Parish Council which may be able to take over the charge of the wage-earning people. There is this further point: There are, no doubt, differences and a certain amount of friction between the various classes in most parishes, and the object of any one who wishes to bring about harmony in country life should be to minimise the interests that are opposed and bring out those that are identical. No better method for achieving this object could be instituted than the creation of a Parish Council, in which farmers, labourers, and others could meet together and come to a fair compromise on points in which their interests are opposed, and at the same time recognise points of union. Some persons say that there is no great demand for Parish Councils, although there is some for District Councils. I think that one of the reasons which has operated hitherto has been the lack of opportunity for villagers to understand what use they may make of Councils when they possess them. The abler spirits have left the villages for wider fields elsewhere, and those who stay behind are so used to the groove that it does not occur to them how much they can do for themselves. What was it that made the best landowners suspicious in recognising and accepting the Local Government Bill? Surely it was the consciousness that the sum of the responsibilities which make up the fullness and worth of life, and make a man able to maintain that dignity without which life can hardly be a happy one, were to be diminished. If that be the case why will they not give people in the villages a chance of exercising such responsibilities? When they know how monotonous country life may be without this scope, why not give people the chance of coming forward and bearing their share of the burden and heat of the day? I think we ought to rid ourselves of the confusion introduced by the Amendment. We ought to consider not only how we may provide an opportunity, but how we may provide the best opportunity, for able and earnest men in every parish to take upon themselves a proper share of the responsibility of performing public duties. If something of the kind be not done, it is impossible for strong characters in any village to continue to stay there, or, if they do stay, it will be inevitable that, instead of developing and using their powers for the advantage of themselves and their neighbours, they will degenerate into a mood of irritation and discontent, and prove a source of danger to the community in proportion as their natures are vigorous and their intellect is strong.

(11.10.) MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): I would point out that no distinction has been made by the Mover of the Resolution between Vestries in London and Vestries in the country. Vestries in London may be almost regarded in the light of County Councils, as they have all the ordinary powers and discharge the ordinary duties of Local Government, but in the country the case is different. A Vestry in the country is a meeting of the inhabitants of the district held ordinarily once a year for the purpose of choosing Churchwardens, Overseers, and Surveyors of Highways. A Vestry in the country, therefore, has very little governing power whatever and there is no basis for Local Government in such a body. To form a body with proper governing power a new constitution would be necessary. How could the affairs of the parish be governed by a body which ordinarily met only once a year? If we are to proceed on the lines of Local Government, we ought not to undo the whole of the work of the last 40 years. In 1848 the incapacity of the Vestry was recognised for all purposes of Local Government, and when the Public Health Act of that year was passed power was given for combining two or more parishes, and so Local Boards were formed for local purposes, such as sewage, lighting, the maintenance of roads, and all the ordinary functions of Local Government. I do not mean to say that Act was perfect by any means. Another Act was passed in 1858 improving upon that Act, and in 1875 a very useful measure was passed for establishing a system of Local Government. Those who study that Act will find that if the powers it confers were put in force we already possess all the advantages that are to be obtained from the system of grouping parishes. An hon. Member has said that what we want is to abolish the parson, the squire, and the Church. I do not recognise any one of these matters as being within the proper province of Local Government, and I am sorry that such a question should have been introduced in a Debate of this kind. It seems to me that we are making a mistake when we seek to improve Local Government by ignoring what has been done during the last 40 years. That may be good or bad, but it seems to me to be out of the question to try to uproot it. For Poor Law purposes the areas of the parishes were too small for effective government. Therefore the areas were enlarged by combining a number of parishes. If that principle is established in District Councils you embody all that is contained in the Resolution. I have no sympathy with the Resolution on the one hand or with the Amendment on the other. It seems to me the best course to pursue would be to leave the matter to be dealt with by the Government in their District Councils Bill so that the defects of the present system—and I do not say that there are none—will be done away with. The true plan is to make the best of what has been done and improve upon it—to pass a District Councils Bill on the lines of previous legislation, merely transferring to another body the power at present exercised by Representatives of the rural districts.

*(11.19.) SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down having made a speech against both the Resolution and the Amendment. Both the Resolution and the Amendment agree in one particular, and that is in passing more or less of censure on the Government for not having fulfilled their pledges with reference to the completion of Local Government. Both say that it is necessary that there should be some further extension of Local Government in rural as well as in other districts. I go further and say it is a matter of urgent necessity. I think Her Majesty's Government are open to censure for not having in this, or last Session, taken any steps to fulfil their promise to give Local Government to the smaller units of rural districts. The great importance of this is present to the mind of every one acquainted with the conditions of life among our rural population. It is a matter of urgent importance, as the natural complement to the newly created system of Local Government, which many of us think was begun at the wrong end, and which ought to have built up from the unit of the parish. The rural districts are practically deprived of Local Government, because the County Councils which have been created are too far removed from the villages to exercise any influence over village life, and the inhabitants of these villages look forward with anxiety to the time which was foreshadowed, and to the scheme which was indicated, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in what I may call his better days, when he spoke strongly, and as I think wisely, on this subject. I may venture to recall his words in 1885, when he said—

"I hold that the smallest village should know who its chief man was. . . . I proposed that in every village there should be some responsible head man. I was extremely anxious that throughout the rural communities we should be able to develop some civic life. I trust that the Liberal Party will go forward on those lines."

Well, the Liberal Party has steadily continued in its desire to go forward on those lines, but I am not so sure that the right hon. Gentleman has been equally constant. Last year, in the Debate on the Address, we had several speeches on this subject, and in that Debate I took part. I quoted from official documents, from the Reports of Medical and Sanitary Inspectors, and showed the deplorable, I may say the revolting, sanitary condition of the life led in some of our rural districts; and the picture I presented made, I think, some impression upon the House at the time. But those conditions still continue. We have done nothing; we can do little or nothing, under the present condition of Local Rural Government, to put the sanitary arrangements in these villages in the state in which they ought to be. The difficulties arise from the fact that the people who feel the pinch of these insanitary conditions, who suffer from the defective system of drainage or bad water supply, are the people who have little or no voice in connection with the management of these matters, and until they have that voice in Parish Councils, these things will never be satisfactorily dealt with. The whole system of sanitation in these small rural communities is rotten; for the reason that the sanitary control is placed in the hands of men elected not primarily to carry out functions for the public health of the locality, but for the administration of the Poor Law, and, therefore, sanitary administration is a secondary matter with them. As such, these matters are put off to the end of their meetings; little time is left for their discussion, and their functions in reference to public health are discharged in a perfunctory fashion, or not at all. The neglect of sanitary conditions in our rural life is a disgrace to our time. In the interest of health and morality it is high time this state of things was altered, and a system of popular Local Government formulated. This condition of things has grown out of the fact, that the people have been gradually deprived of all power and control in local management. What the hon. Member for Ashburton (Mr. Seale-Hayne) has said is perfectly true. During the last century or more there has been growing up a system of patronage, under which all the local control has passed into the hands of a few superior residents who have discharged all administrative functions, and I am sorry to say have done their work very badly. We want to go back to the old system, when every individual had some interest and influence in the management of local affairs. If every dweller in a country district were given a voice in the management of the village affairs, a new interest would be given to the lives of the inhabitants, many of whom have been qualified by the operation of the Education Act of 1870 to undertake the duties of citizenship. They should be given control over sanitary matters and over local charities. Fewer cases would then occur of the filching of public lands from the community and of maladministration of charities. From 20 Officers of Health residing in different agricultural counties I have received deplorable accounts of the way in which the people are housed. In many of these districts the houses are described as unfit for human habitation. One medical officer said, that the houses he had seen would have been a disgrace to the slums of a large city. Others spoke of houses that in some cases had only one bedroom, in many cases only two, and in very few three. In such a house, a man with a wife and a growing family cannot bring up his children under conditions which make decency and morality possible. We want the housing of these poor looked after with greater care and diligence, and if we had Parish Councils that care would be exercised. We believe that in the interests of the morality and well-being of the poor in the country districts one of the best reforms we can make would be the creation of Parochial Councils in which the people would be able to look after their own affairs. Such Councils would do the work more efficiently than is the case at present under the Rural Sanitary Authorities, because they would work under the open and constant criticism of the community; and the result would be to bring about not only a healthier, but a higher condition of life in the rural districts.

(11.32.) COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport): It seems to me that there has been a general consensus of opinion on the part of speakers on both sides of the House as to the desirability of greater development of self-government, and that the main point of difference is as to whether we shall attain this common end better by the creation of District Councils, or whether they should be preceded by Parish Councils. ["No, no!"] I fully understand that some speakers say this is not the point; but from the speeches that have been made this evening, there can be no doubt that the question is practically this: Shall we be wiser in developing the County Council through District Councils as far as Parochial Councils, or in beginning with the latter and building up from them? In my opinion, we shall be decidedly wiser in going downwards from the County Council to the Parish Council. We have been told not to forget that District Councils are to be the next step in the Local Government programme of Her Majesty's Government; and I have no doubt that the call made on the Government in this respect will receive a response from the Treasury Bench to-night. Personally, I sympathise with much that has fallen from speakers on both sides of the House. The Mover of the Resolution has my sympathy in much that he has at heart. He thinks we ought to recognise that our poorer population not only have wants that need satisfying, but have also ambitions and aspirations we ought not to be slow to acknowledge; and in that belief the hon. Member has my complete assent. But I think there has been some disposition on the part of speakers to-night to forget that many of the reforms on which they laid especial stress have had the consistent support of, and in many cases owed their initiation to, that class of landlords of whom they have spoken so cheaply. The Mover of the Resolution and those who supported him would have been wiser and more consistent if they had recognised that the most considerable advantages in the direction in which they desire reform have been the outcome of the sympathy of the landlords with the rural population around them, and that there has been no disposition on the part of the landlords to withhold from the people the advantages of such reforms. The hon. Member who preceded me laid great stress on the question of sanitary dwellings. I am with him in that matter entirely, but I do not think it can be laid to the charge of the modern landlord that he has been slow to recognise the necessity of sanitary dwellings. There is hardly one improvement which is more marked than that which has taken place in the dwellings of rural labourers during the last 10 or 20 years. The improvements that are taking place in that respect might receive some check if there were any premature arrangement made by which such matters might be handed over to Parish Councils as suggested by the Mover of the Resolution. It is said that one of the results of the Resolution, if adopted, would be that the right men would find themselves in the right place, and that those entitled to the confidence of their neighbours would find themselves in the proper position. That is the principle on which I understand the Government acted in bringing in their Local Government measure, and I am fully under the belief that the development of the principle of working from the County Council downwards would be attended with the same result. I am sorry I cannot speak with the same satisfaction of the speech made by the hon. Gentleman representing the Ashburton Division of Devonshire. I certainly had hoped that when we came to discuss this question there would not have been attributed to a class more vitally interested than any other class in the social development of the rural population motives so thoroughly unfair.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE: I attributed no motives.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY: The hon. Gentleman expressed his desire to sweep them away as stumbling blocks to the happiness of the population.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE: I expressed no such desire.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY: If I have misinterpreted the hon. Member, I am willing to apologise, but I think I have expressed the meaning of his words as they reached me across the floor of the House. I would only wish to make this much clearer—that in voting for the Amendment and not for the Resolution I do so because I believe it is more likely to bring about an effectual and useful reform than the Resolution. It is not because I have the slightest desire to stand between the rural population and self-government in parish affairs that I prefer the Amendment to the Resolution, and that I therefore support it.

*(11.42.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I hope that the Debate will not close without some expression from the Government Bench of their attitude upon this question, for their supporters appear to be divided in opinion. The hon. Member for the Harrow Division says he is equally opposed to the Resolution and the Amendment, whereas the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just sat down has expressed his intention of voting for the Amendment. The Amendment is really one of a dilatory nature, and apparently based on the notion that the hon. Member for Rotherham was pitting Parish Councils against District Councils. As a matter of fact, neither he nor those who support him are in any way pitting Parish Councils against District Councils.

What we emphasise is that in the rural districts there should be three distinct stages of Local Government in those matters wherein the people are most interested, and that those in which they are most affected are where they are living in the smallest area. The hon. Member for Somerset has contended that the language of the Resolution does not imply urgency in this matter, but I would remind the House that this question has been declared to be urgent over and over again by the present Parliament. It was so declared by Resolutions more than once brought forward by the hon. Member for Halifax, by an Instruction which I myself moved on the Local Government Bill of 1888, and also by an Amendment moved in 1890, by the hon. Member for the Rugby Division of Warwickshire tending in the same direction, although only referring to the question of allotments. On each of these occasions we emphasised the fact that there was urgent need for a thorough reform of parochial government. Some points of detail have been raised to-night, and one of them is embodied in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Somerset, who has put to the front the necessity for a readjustment of boundaries. No doubt that is very desirable, but this process is going on under the Divided Parishes Act, and the number of very small parishes is not so large as was sometimes supposed. The number of small parishes is very much less than hon. Members imagine. If the hon. Member confined his attention to parishes of less than 100 inhabitants, he would find that they contain not more than 200,000 inhabitants. That is clear from the Census of 1881. In France, with a population of 36,000,000, there are no fewer than 36,000 communes, which have self-government in the fullest sense of the term as far as the machinery of self-government is concerned. In England and Wales, with a population of rather more than 26,000,000, the number of parishes is 15,000, and as we have larger towns compared with France, I think it will be found that there is really not much difference between the parishes of France and the parishes of this country. There are two distinct points raised by the Resolution — one, the reform of the

Mr. F. S. Stevenson

Vestries, and the other the establishment of Parochial Councils. Though these are distinct matters, I think they are capable of being treated at one time. I am strongly of opinion myself that there is really no limit of population below which any reform of the Vestry would be an impossibility. The reform of the Vestry system might be effected on the one vote one man principle, and perhaps for convenience and to meet certain prejudices it might be possible to limit the number of the inhabitants of the parishes to perhaps 70 or 75. But as far as Parochial Councils are concerned they stand on a somewhat different level, and no doubt the population ought to be raised in that case. What the precise limit should be is a matter for subsequent investigation. But that need not be a difficulty in the way of the acceptance of a Motion of this kind. What we desire to emphasise by the Motion is the principle that our parishes ought to have the fullest possible measure of Local Government. We want a reform of the Vestries and the establishment of Parochial Councils elected by the people, to deal with distinctively parochial affairs. In foreign countries, notably in Switzerland, where it has been very much elaborated, there is a distinction made between the larger and smaller parishes, which has been attended with a considerable amount of success. I cannot but think that such a distinction between the parishes in this country would obviate many practical difficulties and facilitate a scheme of Local Government. The question has been raised why this question is being pressed forward at the present time. As far as my own constituents are concerned, and I believe their view is shared by most constituencies throughout the country, they regard Local Government from the point of view of having full, direct, and equal voice in the arrangement of their own affairs. We are asked by the Mover of the Amendment to choose between District and Parochial Councils. But there has been no proposal for District Councils before Parliament since 1888. Are we to assume that any proposal for District Councils will be simply a revival of the Bill of 1888? If so, then the proposal of 1888 conferred powers of no value, and no human being would care to sit on the Boards which they created. If you give them powers worth having, if you transfer the administration of the Poor Law from the existing Board of Guardians to a body sitting in the intermediate area, and directly elected by the people, on the principle of one man one vote, if you conferred powers worth exercising, then you would have the best-fitted men eager and anxious to serve. As a matter of fact, the two schemes of reform, District Councils and reform of the Vestries, could be carried out simultaneously, and in this matter we want to carry out that policy of similarity and simultaneity which has been allowed so long to remain in abeyance, which the Government met in 1888 with a direct negative, and which has been so long, though I trust not for ever, postponed.

*(11.53.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's) : I think that it is no matter of regret to any Member of the Government, or to any Member of the House, that those who feel strongly upon this question of parish administration should have placed their views on the subject before the House; and I think that it is evident that there is a strong feeling in all parts of the House of sympathy with the desire expressed from more than one quarter that we should endeavour, so far as we can, to put vigour into the life of our agricultural parishes and villages. We all feel that if we can enlist the co-operation of all classes of the community in the work of Local Government we shall be doing a great public service, and much to make the system more perfect throughout the country. If there is one thing that I regret, it is that the hon. Member who introduced the Motion, and one or two other speakers on that side of the House, treated the matter rather more from a Party point of view—I might say rather more acrimoniously—than I think is at all necessary in a matter of this kind.

The hon. Member for Rotherham, who usually speaks with a considerable absence of Party spirit, would, I think, have done better to have left out some of the reflections which he made upon the Tory Party in general, and upon the Government in particular, with regard to this question of Local Government. He twitted us with having in three Queen's Speeches promised to deal with the question of District Councils, and with our not having done so. At least he should have remembered that, starting in 1888, when the question first came up, we have had three Sessions, and that a very large portion of two of them have been spent in dealing with Local Government in the counties. We have dealt with England and also with Scotland; and I think that, so far as Local Government reform is concerned, that is not by any means a bad record for the three years. The hon. Gentleman ought also to have remembered that the Party to which he belongs contributed very little indeed to the solution of this great question when in Office; and when he tells us that we made promises in three Queen's Speeches, I must remind him that the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in 1882-3-4, in the Queen's Speeches of those years, made absolute promises that they would introduce measures dealing with the reform of Local Government, and did not introduce a single measure on the subject at all. I think that so far as our action is concerned, it may well compare with the inaction of the Government of the Party to which the hon. Member belongs, and that he should remember what his Party has failed to do. If the Liberal Government had begun to deal with the question when they promised to do so, we might now have arrived at a time when the whole question would have been settled in a manner satisfactory even to the hon. Gentleman himself. We have dealt with the question of County Government, and we are very clearly of opinion that we began rightly. The ratepayers of the counties had really no share in the administration of the rates of the county; but we have organised a system of Local Government which has given to them a share in the administration of county affairs and in the administration and the collection of the local rates, while we have contributed largely to the relief of those rates. When we look at the manner in which the County Councils have been elected, and the manner in which they have done their duty, we see nothing to regret, but, on the contrary, much upon which to congratulate ourselves in having begun by County Councils instead of beginning by Parochial Councils. We believe that the next step in the reform of Local Government is the setting up of District Councils, although we will not deny the importance of many of the points touched upon in this Debate in connection with the administration of the parishes. I am prepared to acknowledge that at present in the rural districts sanitary matters are not dealt with by a body such as ought to control matters of that kind. We attach so much importance to this point that we think a popularly-elected body to deal with sanitary matters and highways ought to be established in the counties as quickly as possible. We believe there is no subject of greater importance to working people than the housing of the working classes. We desire to see that dealt with by a popularly-elected body in the rural districts, and we have given large powers to the County Councils by the Act of last year. We have made it compulsory on the part of the Medical Officer of Health to forward his Report to the County Council. He may make representations upon which the County Council may take action. Therefore, I think the hon. Gentleman will admit we have made a very considerable advance, and we acknowledge that the next step which we ought to take in order to secure the proper administration of the Public Health Law is to set up within the Counties District Councils who would have as their chief duty the administration of that law within the counties. That is why we think the question of District Councils is more urgent than that brought before the House by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Ritchie

We have been twitted with the fact that we have not produced our District Councils Bill, but we have not had sufficient time to deal with such a large question as District Councils. The demands made to-night with regard to the powers to be conferred on the Parish Councils cannot fail to have shewn the extreme importance, difficulty, and complexity of the various powers which different speakers propose should be conferred upon the Parochial Councils. If we had had introduced Bills dealing with District and Parochial Councils, the measures would have been of such importance as to have shut out all other measures of importance during a whole Session. Amongst the various things which the hon. Gentleman thinks should be dealt with by the Parish Councils are Charities, Allotments, Public Libraries, Buildings, Common Lands, certain Sanitary Powers, Fixity of Tenure, and Co-operative Stores, with Trade Unions thrown in, together with the compulsory acquisition of land for small holdings, and the nomination of the clergy and Magistrates for the parish. I think that is a very large budget and a very good order to ask the House of Commons to consider in an offhand way in connection with the other measures which are pressing on its attention. I am sorry the right hon. Member for Newcastle did not speak on seconding the Motion, for I had been looking to him for some interesting suggestions on this question. He made a speech some time ago, I think at Newcastle, in which he advocated the transfer of a certain portion of the Poor Law administration to the parishes.

MR. J. MORLEY: I did not say so.

*MR. RITCHIE: The right hon. Gentleman said that the Parish Councils should have conferred upon them the power of dealing with applications for relief within the parishes.

MR. J. MORLEY: Not on that occasion.

*MR. RITCHIE: The right hon. Gentleman certainly advocated that the Parish Council should have the power of dealing with certain matters of relief.

MR. J. MORLEY: No.

*MR. RITCHIE: I will endeavour to find the passage in the right hon. Gentleman's speech to which I refer. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman safeguarded himself with an appeal to the District or County Councils if it was considered that the relief had been given improperly, in which case the County or District Council might surcharge the parish. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman has very much studied the effect of various modes of administering the Poor Law in times past. If anyone attempted to make the administration of the Poor Law a parochial administration he would incur a grave responsibility. It would be an entire reversal of the system which has been settled after much consideration by Committees in order to meet many abuses which previously existed in connection with the administration of the Poor Law. When one looks at the enormously beneficial results of the Union administration of the Poor Law, I do not think that anyone would lightly attempt to disturb that system. It may be of interest to the House to know in connection with this matter what difference has arisen in this matter. In 1857 the number of paupers was 921,000, now it has fallen to 690,000; and I hold that a system which has worked such a reform as that ought not to be lightly interfered with. Anything which would take away the administration of the Poor Law from a large area like the Union and bring it so close to the persons who receive relief as would be done in parochial administration would tend to bring back many of the evils from which the Union system has freed us. It is conceded that the rates in the country fall upon the landlord. If there were a Parochial Council elected largely by labourers, the relief would probably be administered by the majority of the Council, composed of labourers; but if the relief had been improperly given the surcharge on the parish would be borne by the landlords, and not by the labourers. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, in the speech to which I have referred, did not, I find, commit himself to the view that Parish Councils should administer relief, but he said the idea was worth consideration, and gave a quasi-sanction to the disturbance of the present system under which relief is given by the Guardians of Unions. As to the question of sanitation, I am quite sure that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax at least would not support such a retrograde policy as the breaking up of the sanitary areas which he himself created. I can imagine no course which would be more detrimental to the public health. I am not prepared to take up the position of saying that no reform is desirable in our parochial legislation. I have more than once stated that that reform is desirable. I do not think that it is possible to have a County Council elected upon a popular basis, and a District Council elected upon a popular basis, and to have at the same time the parish Vestry remaining as it is. There must necessarily be reform of the Vestry in its mode of election and its mode of procedure; and when I come to deal with the question again I hope that I shall be able to propose to the House of Commons a mode of retaining certain of the powers conferred on the Vestry, while giving to the District Council powers of delegation to the Parish Authorities. I admit that no scheme of Local Government Reform is complete without dealing with the parishes, and I do not understand the hon. Member for East Somerset to differ from that view. But the contention of the hon. Member for East Somerset is that District Councils should be dealt with first, while the Motion of the hon. Member for Rotherham makes no mention of District Councils. As to the area of parishes, there is no doubt that that is a very important difficulty in the way of reform of parochial administration. With regard to the varying size of the parishes, it may be said that the smaller parishes may be grouped. That cannot be done without difficulty, however. There is as much sentiment in a small parish as in a large parish, and there would be as much sentimental objection to grouping the small parishes as to dividing the large ones. I do not say that this is a bar to reform; but it is a difficulty which must be taken into consideration. The power of grouping and dividing parishes rests with the County Councils, and not with the Local Government Board. When we gave them that power we hoped that they might move tentatively in the matter, and help us to a solution. I trust that I have made the position of the Government clear. I especially desire to complete the work of self-government which we have begun, and I think that the House and the country will admit that we have at least begun well. We have established County Councils on a broad and liberal basis, and we have prepared them for any further powers which may be conferred upon them. By including District Councils in our Bill, we gave evidence that we feel that we ought to deal with these smaller areas. I have to acknowledge to the House that the scheme of Local Government will not be complete until we have dealt with this matter; and we think that there ought to be a link of communication between the three kinds of Councils—between the County Council and the District Council, and between the District Council and the parish organisation. I hope, therefore, that it will be understood that we support the Amendment for the reason I have given, namely, that the hon. Gentleman who moved it desires District Councils to be dealt with first.

(12.25.) MR. STANSFELD (Halifax): Before the right hon. Gentleman spoke I was at a loss to understand how the Government could support the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Somerset; but my difficulty has been increased by the speech to which we have just listened. The Amendment is directed pointedly against the organisation of the parish.

MR. HOBHOUSE: On the contrary. I said I did not object to the reform of the Vestry, but approved of it. What I did object to was the constitution of the Parish Council as proposed by the hon. Member and his friends.

MR. STANSFELD: I will leave the hon. Member to deal with his Amendment, which is purely negative, while the Motion is at least a positive Resolution. It says that no measure of Local Government will be complete without the introduction of organisation and reform in the parish, and in that sentiment the President of the Local Government Board concurs. That certainly cannot be said to be a negative proposition. The Mover of the Amendment complains that undue prominence is given to the parish in the Motion. That is not so, because the parish has its proper place as the unit of Local Government. The right hon. Gentleman agrees with me that the parish is the smallest possible area. The Amendment practically pits the District Councils against the Parish Councils, and therefore the Mover of the Amendment cannot represent the views of the President of the Local Government Board. The fault I find with the President of the Local Government Board is that the right hon. Gentleman seems to think that the District Councils must come first in a separate measure.

MR. RITCHIE: No; I did not say that.

MR. STANSFELD: The right hon. Gentleman then differs in yet another point from the Mover of the Amendment which he proposes to support, for the hon. Member for East Somerset undoubtedly desires to separate the District Councils Bill from the Bill dealing with Parish Councils. The right hon. Gentleman now says he did not mean that. What I say is that the next measure must contain both. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of the possibility of multifarious schemes and proposals for new powers to be given to Parochial Councils, which might occasion considerable trouble and occupy considerable time in discussion. But that is not a proper objection for a Minister to make. He constructs a Bill upon his own responsibility, and upon the responsibility of the Government. It would be for him to put the parish into the Bill, and to confer upon the parish only those powers which he thinks right.

MR. RITCHIE: The right hon. Gentleman rather misunderstands me. I did not mean to imply that we were not fully responsible; but what I said was that if there was an attempt to graft on any Bill we might introduce such proposals as those indicated it might take a whole Session to pass the measure.

MR. STANSFELD: I must remind the right hon. Gentleman how he has been treated by this House. When he introduced the great measure of his, which included District Councils as well as County Councils, he was fairly treated by the Opposition, and he will not deny it. Why should he not expect and look forward to similar treatment again? Why does he now get up and without justification attack my hon. Friend and say he made it a Party question, and twitted the Government with their shortcomings? The right hon. Gentleman himself is the man who has tried to make this a Party question. He has made that mistake before. Let me remind him that during the passing of the Local Government Bill the hon. Member for the Eye Division (Mr. F. Stevenson) proposed an Instruction to the Committee authorising them to introduce clauses to reform the Vestry. I placed on the Paper certain proposals, limited in number and moderate in character, and we assured the right hon. Gentleman that we would be content with the adoption of such proposals. The right hon. Gentleman did not say they were exaggerated or too numerous; he did not commit himself in their favour; but the only ground on which he declined to go into them—and he was followed in that line by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Lord of the Treasury—was that he had as much on his hands as he could manage in that Session. The First Lord of the Treasury, in winding up the Debate on the 7th of June, said the Government felt they had entered on a task of great magnitude, and did not think time would permit of the consideration of the question. He added—

“The Government recognised the desirability, even the necessity, of doing much for the improvement of the parish Vestry, and of giving to village life the strength and power which it once possessed; but they had undertaken as much work as they could carry successfully to an issue, and must ask the House to postpone that portion of the Local Government Bill to another Session, when they would be disposed to give it very favourable consideration.”

The Government, if they vote for the Amendment before the House, will not be acting in accordance with the spirit of that declaration. If the Government intend to deal with District Councils only, their promised Bill will not be satisfactory. I shall certainly vote for the Resolution of my hon. Friend.

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

*(12.50.) MR. RITCHIE: I desire to make clear what the views of the Government are on this question, and with that object I wish to amend the Amendment. I have to propose after the words “district councils” to insert the words “the reform of Parochial Government,” and to leave out the words “similar bodies” in the same line, and put in “district councils.” The Amendment would then read—

“That, in the opinion of this House, no measure of Local Government for the rural districts of England and Wales will be satisfactory which does not provide for the grouping of rural parishes under popularly-elected district councils, the reform of Parochial Government, and the effective control of local affairs by district councils,” and so on.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, after the words “district councils,” to insert the words “the reform of Parochial Government.”—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question proposed, “That those words be inserted in the proposed Amendment.”

*MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I think this is a very extraordinary proceeding. The House has for nearly four hours been discussing a Motion and Amendment which have been on the Paper for some time, and the terms of which are, therefore, familiar to us. It was practically understood that the Government adopted the Amendment, and now the right hon. Gentleman asks the House to adopt words which the House has had no opportunity whatever of considering. In the circumstances, I have no option but to move the Adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. J. E. Ellis.)

*MR. RITCHIE: If the hon. Gentleman persists in his Motion the Government will not oppose him. I desire to say, however, that there is nothing whatever inconsistent with what I said in my speech in the Motion I now make. I only desire to introduce words I think will be acceptable to both sides of the House.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): By reading his Amendment, the right hon. Gentleman certainly failed to convey to our minds what the purport of his Amendment is. Under these circumstances, it is rather hard to ask us to accept the Amendment. I hope my hon. Friend will divide the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I think I can make a suggestion which may be generally acceptable: it is that Her Majesty's Government should provide the House with a day for the discussion of their own Motion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned.

ILLITERATE VOTERS.

(12.55.) MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, N.), who had the following Motion on the Paper—

"That, inasmuch as the provisions of the Ballot Act, 1872, in regard to the votes of illiterate persons, lend themselves to defeat the object of that Act, and owing to the spread of education are now unnecessary, this House is of opinion that the said provisions should be abolished," said: This question appears to me to be—

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): What is it?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. WEBSTER: This question appears to me to be one of such urgent public importance that I ought to raise it now, even though I have only five minutes before me.

Mr. J. E. Ellis

MR. CONYBEARE: On a point of Order, Mr. Speaker. What is the Motion.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Mr. Webster.

MR. WEBSTER: I should like the House to consider what was understood to be the object of the Ballot Act when it was passed. The Attorney General of the then Liberal Government said it was to secure electors from landlord coercion on the one hand, and from intimidation on the other. I venture to say there is practised in many parts of the United Kingdom very great intimidation under cover of the illiterate clauses. In the constituency which I have the honour to represent there are between 4,000 and 5,000 electors, and yet at the last election there were only four illiterates. In South Paddington there were at the last election only two illiterates. But there are districts in Ireland—in Donegal, for instance—where illiterates abound in large numbers. At the General Election of 1886, out of 6,304 persons who voted in County Donegal 3,214 declared themselves illiterate. Let us compare the state of things in the United Kingdom and in Ireland. In 1886 there voted in England 2,400,000. Of these, 38,000 were illiterate. In Scotland there voted 358,000, of whom only 4,800 were illiterate. In Ireland 194,000 voted, and there were 36,722 illiterate. One voter only in 64 in England was illiterate; 1 in 74 in Scotland; but 1 in 5 in Ireland. I think something should be done to put a stop to the indecent scenes which took place at the recent elections in Ireland. I know that very soon my remarks will be put a stop to—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

It being One of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 15th April, 1891.

NEW WRIT.

For Whitehaven, v. the Right Honourable George Augustus Frederick Cavendish Bentinck, deceased. — (Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (IRELAND)
BILL.—(No. 34.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(12.25.) MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I do not propose to detain the House many minutes in moving the Second Reading of this Bill. Two years ago the Irish Chief Secretary told a deputation that the time for argument had passed, and the time for action had come. It does seem rather absurd that a Bill of this sort, which year after year has been passed by a large majority, is not become the law of the land. What is the history of the question? In 1878, Sir Stafford Northcote, the then Leader of the House, knowing the feeling in Ireland, gave a Saturday Sitting in order that the Irish Sunday Closing Bill should be passed through Committee. Unfortunately, a timid sort of feeling seemed to prevail, either in this House or in another place, and the Bill was then limited to four years' working. It thus expired in 1882, and for the last eight or nine years it has been included in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. I think the unanimous opinion of all parties in the House is that that is not a proper state for a question of this kind to occupy. In 1883 and 1884 Bills to make the Act permanent were brought in by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Border Burghs (Sir George Trevelyan), then Chief Secretary for Ireland. In 1877 a question was raised by a member of the trade in Ireland as to the Bill still continuing in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, and the Chief Secretary stated that a Committee would be appointed the next year to consider the question. A Committee was appointed, and in 1888 it sat very patiently, heard a large number of witnesses, and then reported the present Bill to the House. I was asked by that Committee to take charge of the Bill, and in each succeeding year I have endeavoured to pass it into law. In 1888 my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) had a Bill providing for the closing of public houses in Ireland earlier on Saturday nights. The Second Reading of that Bill was passed by a large majority, and the Bill was referred to the same Committee, who reported that it should be included in the Bill now under consideration. The evidence in support of that part of the question was quite as strong, and, in the opinion of a good many people, even stronger than the evidence given in favour of the total closing on Sunday in Ireland. I quoted last year the opinion of a considerable number of witnesses who came before the Select Committee, but I do not propose to do so on the present occasion. I will merely state that amongst those witnesses there were 15 official witnesses—Coroners, Police Inspectors, Magistrates, and others—and, without exception, every one of those official witnesses gave evidence strongly in favour of the Bill. I admit that on one point there was a little diversity of opinion. One or two of the Police Magistrates connected with Dublin did not think it would be expedient that the total closing should apply to Dublin. The Committee reported, and it will be found that the overwhelming opinion of the people of Ireland is strongly in favour of this measure. Those Members who represent constituencies in the North of Ireland are confronted with the assertion that the feeling of Sabbatarianism in the North of Ireland is one of the great reasons for the Bill. I deny the statement. I am quite willing to admit that Sabbath observance in the North of Ireland prompted a feeling in favour of the measure, but if any one will read the evidence given by other witnesses from other parts of Ireland they will see how small a bearing this point has on the question. If they will read the evidence of Canon Sheehan, of the City of Cork, they will see that a very strong Catholic feeling is greatly in favour of the Bill. A deputation from all parts of Ireland came to London last year to pray the Chief Secretary not to admit any Amendment with regard to the five cities. The present Attorney General for Ireland saw the deputation, which was composed of representatives of each of the cities proposed to be omitted. I was very much struck with one of the speeches made to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. There were three parish priests from the City of Waterford, and the chief parish priest told the Attorney General that in his city he was quite sure nineteen-twentieths of the people were greatly in favour of this Bill. The Committee which reported the Bill proposed to amend the law on four points. They said that the Act should be made permanent, that the five cities should be included, and they suggested an Amendment in regard to the bond fide traveller clause; and, in the fourth place, added to the Bill the measure brought in by the hon. Member for South Tyrone for the earlier closing of public houses on Saturday. One word upon the opposition to the measure. Last year a number of Amendments were placed on the Paper; I am glad to see that that form of opposition has ceased, and that now the only Amendment is that the Bill should be read a second time on this day six months. There have been a large number of public open meetings held in all parts of Ireland in favour of the Bill, and the trade has never dared to have a single open public meeting in opposition to the Bill. That seems to me a clear expression of public opinion in Ireland. As to the proceedings in connection with the Bill last year, a Division was taken after a Debate of two or three hours, and rather more than three-fourths of the Members voted for the Second Reading. The Division List showed that only 13 or 14 out of the 102 Representatives of Ireland went into the Lobby against the Second Reading. That in itself shows how hollow is the opposition. In conclusion, I desire to say that if the House is pleased to read the Bill a second time to-day, I would propose to refer it to the Standing Committee on Law, in the hope that it may be passed into law this Session. I trust the House will at least, by as large a majority as was obtained last year, pass the Second Reading and thus consult the wishes and wants of the Irish people.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Lea.)

Mr. Lea

(12.35.) Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.): The hon. Member who has moved the Second Reading of this Bill has, no doubt unconsciously, fallen into an error which he will perhaps allow me to correct before I address myself to the merits of the Bill. He said that two Members of the Committee who reported upon the question represented the trade. As a matter of fact only one of them—the late Mr. M'Donald—represented the trade; the other Irish Member was altogether unconnected with the trade. We complained at the time of the composition of the Committee. We thought then, as we think now, that this legislation is unnecessary and vexatious, and we said that the Committee was composed of gentlemen who were professedly advocates of teetotal and temperance principles, and whose opinions were to be regarded as foregone conclusions. I oppose the Bill on the ground that the people of Ireland have made no demand for it, and that there is no proof whatever that any Irish public opinion is in favour of it. The Mover of the Bill says that the majority of the Irish people support the measure. I traverse that statement at once, and I say that a large proportion of the meetings in favour of the Bill have been got up by professed advocates of the temperance cause, and that they have been promoted—I will not say by agitators—but by gentlemen who have appeared in the capacity of peripatetic advocates of the doctrines of teetotalism. I maintain that such meetings do not reflect public opinion, and that they have been held in halls, and attended by persons who are opposed altogether to the sale of alcoholic liquors. I maintain further, that such meetings form no real test of public opinion. There is only one way of arriving at a test, and that is the election of Parliamentary Representatives. Has this ever yet been made a test question at an election?

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Yes.

Mr. FLYNN: The hon. Gentleman says "Yes." May I ask in how many constituencies? Certainly not in half a dozen; two at the outside; and I regard that fact as a prima facie proof that there is no demand for this legislation; and my contention is that this is pre-eminently a branch of legislation which should be left to the decision of the Irish Members. We have heard a great deal of late in favour of Local Option. It is a principle on which the popular voice ought to be heard, but that principle is directly opposed to this kind of legislation. It was shown before the Select Committee that not only the Trade Societies, but many Corporations in Ireland, were opposed to the Bill. The Corporations of Cork, Dublin, and Limerick, and the Trade Associations of those towns, petitioned against it. I do not know how the matter stands in Belfast; but the mover of the Bill has certainly not convinced the House that the working men of Belfast are in favour of it. People who can afford to keep a stock of liquor in their own houses ought not to legislate on such a point for the working classes unless the working classes ask for it; and my contention is that no popular demand in Ireland in favour of the measure has been shown. Until that is done, no case for the Bill can be made out. At a trades meeting in Limerick two years ago, it was resolved to protest against the Bill on the ground that if it became law the result would be to encourage the illicit sale of drink, and thus to promote vice and intemperance. That resolution emanated from a body which represented every class for which this legislation is intended. Similar resolutions were passed in Cork, Waterford, and Sligo. So far as the official witnesses are concerned, their testimony cannot be regarded as conclusive. Let me refer to the figures in regard to arrests on the Saturday night and Sunday. I have figures down to 1886, which give the number of arrests in all Ireland; and I find that in Dublin, including Kingstown and Dalkey, with a population of 350,000, there was only an average of 21 arrests on the Sunday. Certainly that does not exhibit a very alarming amount of drunkenness. In Cork, with a population of 104,000, the arrests were 7; in Waterford, with a population of 30,000, 2; in Limerick, with a population of 38,000, 2·3; and in Belfast, with a population of 208,000, 7·3. I have obtained Police Returns from the City of Cork a few weeks ago, and I find that the average number of convictions for drunkenness for Saturday drinking at the present time is one in every 1,000 of the population, which includes habitual drunkards; and one in 20,000 for Sunday drinking. Surely that does not indicate a sufficient amount of drunkenness to justify a drastic measure of this sort or to show that there is any necessity for it. I repudiate altogether the idea that the people of these towns or of any part of Ireland are a drunken people, or that they are more given to drunkenness than the people of any other part of Europe. The figures go to prove quite the reverse; and the statistics of drunkenness are annually decreasing in accordance with the spread of comfort and the general progress of the people. We all hope that the percentage may diminish more and more; but I do not think that legislation of this kind will have a tendency to diminish drunkenness. The arrests for Saturday drinking in Dublin in 1878 amounted to 108; in 1885 they were 86, and last year they had fallen to 60. Let it be borne in mind that that is one of the towns where there is no Saturday or Sunday closing. In Cork the figures show that drunkenness does not prevail to any considerable extent at all; but in Sligo, where the Closing Act prevails, the arrests for Sunday drinking increased from 37 in 1880 to 41 in 1881 and 51 in 1885, showing an increase in 1885 over 1880 of more than 33 per cent. In 1887—the latest Return I have been able to obtain—the figure stood at 70, which shows that in a town where Sunday closing prevails drunkenness has increased, and that there can be no necessity for a Bill of this kind. There are other points connected with the Bill which are objectionable. I may instance the clause which relates to bond fide travellers, and which proposes to increase the limit from three to six miles. There are a good many honest and respectable working men who will walk three or four miles into the country for the purpose of getting fresh air and recreation, but who are unable to walk six or seven, and by raising the limit in the manner proposed you are simply interfering with the rational recreation of the working man. A man who walks three or four miles into the country is fairly entitled to obtain refreshment, and if, instead of mild soda and milk, or innocent lemonade, or unexciting ginger beer he prefers ale, or a drop of Irish whisky, he is entitled to get it. The hon. Member proposes, if the Bill is read a second time, to refer it to the Standing Committee on Law, and he suggests that if it is desired to amend it, the Amendments can be introduced there. But why is the extraordinary course to be taken of removing the Bill from the cognisance of a Committee of the Whole House? Although I am not over sanguine upon the point, I hope the Bill will not pass a Second Reading to-day, but if it does, and you are really in earnest, you ought to improve the Bill in the House itself, and not in the Standing Committee on Law. That Committee consists of 68 Members, only eight of whom are Irish Representatives, and seven out of the eight are professedly strong advocates of teetotalism. If that is so, you would not be treating the Bill fairly, or give those who desire to amend it any chance whatever. It ought, if it passes a Second Reading, to be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, where the Amendments brought forward would receive reasonable consideration. Take the bond fide travellers clause. It may be thought an arbitrary act to fix the limit at six miles. Why not substitute five, four, or three and a half? The question is one which ought to be decided by the House itself, and not by a Committee upstairs which may extend the limit to 10 miles instead of six. Personally I am in favour of the reduction of the present hours on Saturday. I think it would be a great advantage to close one hour earlier, but I think that is a matter to be fixed by a Committee in which the Representatives of Ireland would be able to express the feeling of their constituents. Then, again, it may be possible to arrive at a compromise, and to shorten the hours in the cities which have hitherto been exempted, without imposing total closing. The Attorney General for Ireland is, I believe, in favour of a compromise, and he would be able to put forward the view of the Government more completely in a Committee of the Whole House than in the Standing Committee on Law. I believe that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is in favour of shortening the hours by one hour.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The hon. Member is mistaken. I never made any suggestion of the kind as regards Saturdays.

Mr. Flynn

Mr. FLYNN: I should be sorry to misrepresent the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but I believe he is in favour of a compromise of some kind; and I think that a decision would be better arrived at in the House itself than in a Committee, where the majority of Members are distinctly opposed to any reasonable concession. I move the rejection of the Bill chiefly and broadly on the ground that it is not demanded by the public opinion of Ireland; that there has been no expression of public opinion in favour of the Bill, and that in passing a social measure of this kind dealing with the habits and customs of the people, our first care ought to be to consult the tastes and feelings of the Irish people. Upon these grounds I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time on this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Flynn.)

(12.55.) Mr. J. NOLAN (Louth, N.): I beg to second the Amendment. The hon. Member for Londonderry seems to assume that because a similar Bill has been read a second time in this House it is unnecessary to discuss it in Committee. But I think no one will venture to dispute the proposition that there have been Bills discussed in this House time after time which have even become Acts of Parliament, but which it has been found necessary to amend, and in some cases even to repeal altogether. The hon. Member spoke of the overwhelming mass of evidence in favour of the Bill, but he carefully abstained from referring to the evidence given by gentlemen in Ireland, of wide and varied experience, against the Bill. I listened to some of the evidence given before the Committee upstairs, and I have read most of the evidence which, together with their Report, the Committee on the Sunday Closing Act for Ireland presented to this House, and I find that a large number of witnesses were of opinion—an opinion which they expressed in very clear terms indeed—that the passing of such a Bill as this would lead to the development of shebeening in Ireland to a very great extent, as well as to the development of bogus clubs, and of course cause a considerable increase in the amount of home drinking, and that, with these changes, would follow the use of poisonous drinks instead of the comparatively wholesome beverages at the present time sold in licensed houses in Ireland. Of course I do not contend that all drink sold in public houses is wholesome, but I think that people who have had practical experience will say that when difficulties and restrictions are increased in the way of the sale of drink openly the quality of liquor that can be procured will be bad, and vile compounds will be sold as teetotal drinks. The hon. Member who moved the Second Reading of the Bill commented on the fact that no Amendments had been placed upon the Paper, but this simply arises from the fact that Members of the House generally did not anticipate this Bill coming on to-day, and doubtless the promoters of the Bill think they have executed a clever piece of Parliamentary strategy. Many Irish Members are absent from the House of Commons just now, and in their absence the hon. Member in charge of the Bill thinks this is a fit and proper time to proceed with the Bill. I may, however, remind him that supporters of the Bill are also absent, even one of those whose names appear on the back of the Bill. I certainly consider this surprise which has been sprung upon Irish Members is no credit to those who planned it, and I think they might have taken into account the fact that very large interests indeed are involved in this proposal. In the City of Dublin alone there are 800 licensed houses which will be affected should this Bill unfortunately become law. Taking these at a valuation of £2,000 each, we by easy calculation arrive at the fact that more than £1,500,000 is invested in these houses, and it is now proposed in the absence of the Dublin Members, and other Members for Ireland—the majority of Irish Members—that this £1,500,000 of capital is to be dealt with in this House without due consideration. Then, if we add the interests in the other towns to be affected by the Bill—Cork, Belfast, Waterford, and Limerick—the total will be a large one. I hope that at a later stage some Representative of the Irish Government will put this part of the case more forcibly before the House than I can possibly do. For my part, I consider that for a matter of this kind, involving the interests and property of so many people, the action of the Government is required for effectually dealing with it, and it should not be left to such free lances as the hon. Members for South Derry and South Tyrone. If public houses are an evil in Ireland, then they are a much greater evil in England, since here they exist in far larger numbers. But there is this distinction: that in England the trade is strong, and consequently the gentlemen who are interested in the promotion of legislation of this kind have felt the expediency of dropping their Bill for England, and, in the absence of Irish Members, they have concentrated their attack upon the trade in Ireland. For many reasons I protest against this. The question of intemperance and the means of checking it is purely a national question; and, so far as Ireland is concerned, it should be dealt with by an Irish Representative Body appointed for that purpose, and popularly elected by the people of Ireland. I contend, with all due respect for English Members, the overwhelming majority of whom are wholly ignorant of the conditions of Irish life, that they are not in a position to pronounce upon and deal with a question like this. I can fancy that some impression will have been made upon the minds of English Members by statements I have heard on a cognate subject from the hon. Member for South Tyrone. He has spoken of the large number of public houses in certain towns in the South of Ireland, and he has made a comparison of populations in those towns. I can imagine an English Member being fairly appalled at the idea of there being so many public houses to so few inhabitants. But the hon. Member for South Tyrone, who is acquainted with some of the conditions of Irish life, did not explain to English and Scotch Members that these public houses, as he termed them, are not public houses in the English sense; they are simply shops where a general trade is carried on, and where occasionally drink is sold, and in some of which, perhaps, a gallon of whisky is not sold in a month. These are not public houses as we understand the term in England or Scotland—nothing of the sort. Drink in many of these places is simply kept as an accommodation for customers when they come in from long distances from the surrounding country—and, for the matter of that, and I think in England as well as in Ireland, traders are in the habit of supplying refreshment free of charge to customers who travel into the town from a long distance, and that without licence of any kind. Now, there are not two opinions as to the proposition that intemperance is a great evil; but when we come to the cure for this evil, then serious differences of opinion arise. Intemperance is not an evil of yesterday; people got drunk before there were any public houses at all; and if public houses were abolished through the length and breadth of the land to-morrow, people would manage to get drunk still. Through many centuries we have had the promoters of three great religious systems grappling with the evil of intemperance. The Hebrew, the Christian, the Mahomedan religions have attempted to deal with it, with more or less success. But the promoters of this Bill, I suppose, claim more wisdom than Moses or Mahomet, not to mention more sacred names, and hope to wipe out drunkenness simply by an Act of the British Parliament. The cause of drunkenness, they say, is the public house—destroy the cause, and the effect will cease. Well, I remember reading of other causes being assigned for drunkenness, and, amongst others, climate has been assigned. We have been told by some great authorities that if the northern nations of Europe have the habit of drinking to excess, it is because they live in a cold climate, and that southward to the sunny South of France, Spain, and Italy people become more temperate. But this theory has become exploded by wider experience, and we find that people in Central Africa were ready fairly to wallow in drink when they got the opportunity of doing so. Not only has the habit of taking drink to excess been attributed to climate, but race and religion have also been assigned as causes. For my own part, I am not inclined to accept as gospel any of the theories propounded on the subject, and least of all am I prepared to admit, with the volume of testimony to the contrary, that intemperance is caused by the number of licensed public houses. In the Report presented by the Committee which sat upstairs, we find that the majority of its Members, as might have been expected from the composition of that body, reported in favour of closing public houses in Ireland on Sunday, and that the minority also presented a Report against that Sunday closing. Between the opinions of the majority and minority it is not, perhaps, easy to arrive at a solution of this very difficult problem, and so we fall back on the evidence given before that Committee. Now, I do not want to inflict upon the House any lengthened quotations from this evidence, but I do think that some of the evidence given is worthy of the attention of the House, particularly in view of the fact that the hon. Member who proposed the Second Reading of this Bill chose to ignore the evidence given before that Committee, which tells against the case he tried to make out. I think it will be generally admitted that Mr. O'Donel, the Chief Police Magistrate of Dublin, should be recognised as a fairly good authority on a question of this kind, not merely from his training and his great experience, but also on account of his undoubted ability. On being questioned on some evidence he had given on a former occasion as to the desirability of absolutely closing public houses on Sunday Mr. O'Donel said—

"The strong opinion that I then gave against a total closing on Sunday, or to the early closing upon Saturday, was founded on the danger of increasing the number of shebeens, and encouraging illicit drinking, my opinion being that, apart from drunkenness arising from the facility of getting drink at those shebeens, there was a greater social demoralisation in frequenting them than in getting drunk at a public house. I stated my reasons for that to the Committee at the time, and my view remains the same as regards that."

I wish to call the attention of the House particularly to this expression of opinion—

"I think the total closing of public houses on Sunday would inevitably result in an enormous increase in the number of the shebeen houses, and therefore would bring about a far more demoralising result and injury than leaving matters as they now are."

I hope that the hon. Member who may follow me will note this expression of opinion by Mr. O'Donel, and tell us what he thinks about it. Then Mr. O'Donel went on to refer to the number of shebeen cases brought before him. In the year 1876-77, before the introduction of the Act, which was to have brought about a reformation in the habits of the people who were accustomed to take drink, the total number of shebeen offences for the year was 155. In the year 1886-87, 10 years after the Act had come into operation, the number rose to 206. And then he goes on to say—

"It is a very curious thing which has appeared in evidence with regard to illicit drinking before 2 o'clock; that, directly 2 o'clock arrived, immediately the whole trade of shebeening ceased, and, of course, the after consumption in the city was in the public house."

Now, I think there is no advocate of temperance, however strong his views, however ardent a teetotaler he may be, but will grant that if people will take drink at all, it is better that they should drink in a public house than in low shebeens, many of which are dens of drunkenness, gambling, and immorality. And now I turn to the evidence of Mr. Cameron, the Town Inspector of Belfast. He, speaking of a deputation of gentlemen engaged in the public house trade who waited upon him to express their views, says—

"I may say that they were a most respectable body of men, and they told me that they would have no objection to curtailing the hours of Sunday or Saturday drinking a little; but that what they did object to was, by shutting up the houses on Sunday, throwing the drinking trade into the hands of shebeens, who would give bad liquor to the people, and demoralise them far more than the respectable trade; and, no doubt, that would be the case, unless you could, by some means, counteract the evil that would come."

Of course, it is open to hon. Gentlemen who are in favour of this Bill to point to the means by which the evil of the shebeens may be met; but, up to the present, none of them have been able to say there is any plan save the adoption of further coercive regulations, and several of the gentlemen who have suggested these further coercive regulations candidly confess that they are not at all sanguine that they would produce the desired effect. Well, the hon. Member who moved the Second Reading spoke of the opinion of the Catholic Bishops and clergy, and we find that Mr. Cameron, the Town Inspector of Belfast, has something to say upon this point. He is asked—

"Did the publicans give that as their opinion?—Yes; and it is an opinion that agrees with that of every sound person."

"Do you know that it is the opinion of the Roman Catholic Bishop also?—I do."

So the Town Inspector, the traders, and the Bishop in Belfast unite in the opinion that the proposed restriction in the hours of opening public houses in that city would lead to the extension of shebeen drinking. Then we have the District Inspector of the Royal Irish Constabulary in Waterford, Mr. Bull, giving this evidence—

"If you close the public houses altogether on Sundays, I would expect that you would have considerably more shebeens than you would if you opened them from 2 to 5, because the publican would lose all interest in his trade, and, consequently, we should get no information whatever from the publican; at present if there is a shebeen started, the publicans give us information about it."

Evidence in the same direction is given by Mr. Jennings, District Inspector R.I.C. at Limerick. He confirms and endorses a resolution which was passed by the traders of Limerick, and to which my hon. Friend has referred—

"That this meeting of the congregated trades of Limerick emphatically protest against the present Bill before Parliament for the total closing of public houses on Sunday, or any curtailment of the existing hours on Saturdays and Sundays. We are strongly of opinion that, if such Bill becomes law, its results would be to encourage illicit trade, and lead to the system of introducing drink into the houses of the people, and spread very extensively the contaminating vice of intemperance."

Then I go to another part of Ireland and cite the evidence of the Mayor of Sligo. He says—

"There is as much drink sold in Sligo at present on Sundays as there would be sold if all the public houses in the town were open. More drink is given to frequenters of low public houses and shebeens than would be given to them in respectable houses; besides, the drink supplied in these places is extremely bad."

Then he goes on to give the result of some very interesting observations of his own which he had been able to make during the course of the exercise of his profession as a journalist—

"The arguments urged against the sale of drink on Sundays might be urged with equal justice against the sale of drink on any other day. By leaving the public houses open for a few hours on Sunday you do not curtail any man's liberty; you do not interfere with anyone's right, as you do not compel Sunday closers to enter the public houses. The early closing on Saturday night and the Sunday closing would increase the consumption of whisky in Sligo, and diminish the consumption of ale and porter."

It is obvious that it is easier to carry on an illicit trade in whisky than in the more bulky drinks of ale and porter. The witness goes on—

"Whisky is much more injurious to the health and more expensive than ale or porter. Sunday closing, in my opinion, increases the quantity of spirits illicitly distilled in the country around Sligo."

He proceeds to prove his case, and says—

"Large quantities of illicit spirits are distilled from molasses; there are houses in Sligo in which tons of this commodity are sold in each year for the purposes of illicit distillation. Spirit thus made is most injurious to health, and the production and sale of it in the country districts is most demoralising. Any law tending to make the lawful purchase of drink more restricted must increase the quantity of spirits illicitly distilled. The statistics given by Mr. Hickson show that the convictions for drunkenness on Sunday in Sligo have increased almost 100 per cent. during the last few years. Mr. Hickson attributes the increase in the cases of drunkenness to the increase in the number of police and of the public houses. In my opinion, the increase is due to the Sunday Closing Act."

That Act it is now proposed to extend to the large cities, in which, as everyone must admit, it will be more difficult to put its drastic provisions into operation. It is comparatively easy to do without public houses in a small town like Sligo, but it is a very different matter in Dublin and Belfast.

"The fact that the sale of drink is prohibited creates an incentive to procure it, as many men take a pleasure in breaking a law which they consider to be an unjust infringement of their personal liberty. Besides, persons who would be turned out of a respectably-conducted house have their intemperate habits pandered to by shebeens and illicit traffickers. The majority of the people of Sligo are not in any way affected by Sunday closing. Those of them who favour Sunday closing do so on the ground that the less drink consumed the better. This Sunday closing law is hateful, inasmuch as it is founded on a calumny that the Irish are a drunken people. Mr. Alderman Kidd, a Justice of the Peace for the borough, and not interested in any way in the drink traffic, told me that he was in favour of Sunday opening. In reference to small country public houses near chapels, which were referred to by Mr. Hickson in his evidence, a prohibition by the parish priest, if deemed necessary, would be far more effective than an Act of Parliament."

Then the question put was this—

"Then your evidence, which has been given very fully, is this: that practically for that class of persons you think there is no real Sunday closing, but they are driven to deal in illicit houses?"

Mr. J. Nolan

And the answer was—

"Yes, and that they are demoralised by having to go to places where disorderly conduct is carried on, and where they are allowed to get drunk, and where bad drink of all kinds is given to them."

It is the experience of every man who is in the habit of travelling in Ireland, that there is not the slightest difficulty experienced in obtaining intoxicating liquors at any hour of the day, or any day in the week, in any place where this Sunday closing is supposed to be in full operation. Mr. Egan, the Mayor of Kilkenny, also gave some interesting experiences of his own. He said—

"I will take last Sunday. I was out in the grounds of a park having tea, and a man came down singing a song; he was drunk in my presence; one of the clergy, who was living opposite, came out to inquire where could he have got the drink. That occurred last Sunday. But I have frequently, myself, seen the same men coming out of houses drunk at 11 on Sunday; and at 2 o'clock I have frequently seen men drunk on Sunday in the street."

And this was in a town where the provisions of the Act were in full operation. But we are not confined as regards evidence on this matter to Mayors of Irish towns or cities or to Police Inspectors. We have the popular and able President of the Dublin United Trades' Council and Labour League, Mr. Mannetti, giving this evidence—

"I believe if you shorten the hours, or interfere with them in any way, the men will go to those beerhouses, which, in fact, are merely brothels, which will be open on Sunday, and they can get drink there, which will lead to immorality as well as drunkenness, and to other great evils of all kinds."

These men, it must be remembered, are not drawing fancy pictures, but give their opinions as based on practical experience, and they give the reasons for the judgment they have arrived at on this important question. Then we have the opinion of the Rev. P. T. Tynan, D.D., of Dublin. He says—

"I was always myself in favour of earlier closing on Saturday, but after seeing the evidence given by Mr. Harrell with regard to the shebeens, for he said there were 188 shebeens in the centre of Dublin, and that their principal time for working was Saturday evening and Sunday night, I must confess that I regard it now as rather a doubtful matter."

Some gentlemen who are in favour of this Bill are such robust advocates of it that nothing could possibly change them; but here is the evidence of this gentleman—a gentleman of great ex perience and living in Dublin—which shows that he had preconceived notions in favour of Sunday and Saturday night closing, but was obliged to renounce them. He went on to say—

“If the police are unable to interfere with the shebeens, and prevent it, the result of closing the public houses at 10 o'clock or at 9 o'clock on the Saturday night would be to throw open the shebeens to people who would otherwise drink in the public houses. It is quite clear from Mr. Harrell's evidence that the police are not able to cope with the shebeens.”

Later on he says—

“Wherever there is a demand for drink, there will be a shebeen to supply the drink, if the legitimate house is closed, unless, of course, the police have full power to prevent shebeening, but they cannot prevent shebeening; shebeening will go on whenever the legitimate houses are closed.”

With reference to the City of Belfast, the Very Rev. Patrick Convery says—

“I have had recourse to all means and ways to stamp out the sale of drink at prohibited hours, not merely in licensed public houses, but in shebeens. I have called personally upon those individuals, and brought the charges right home to their own teeth. I have stated to them the day and the hour when I witnessed such scenes, and I have told them that I have lodged my complaint with the Inspector of police, and with the head constable of the district, and have given the names and urged them to oppose them at the next Recorder's Licensing Sessions, and to have the same recorded upon their licences. I have even gone further; I have even incurred the odium of the people, but I was bound to do so in connection with the morals of the district. I told them that my observations should go beyond individuals, that I looked to the general good of the community at large, and I have stated to them that I would go in person to the next Licensing Sessions before the Recorder and oppose the renewal of the licence to those individuals.”

He speaks there of the occupiers of houses of a low class, who were in the habit of violating the conditions of their licences. Then he goes on to say—

“There was a partial cessation for the time of the drinking at prohibited hours, but as soon as they thought that there was an opening again they took to selling it again.”

Further on he says—

“No amount of legislation through the hands of the police or through Parliament will ever check the onward progress of drink.”

He is asked—

“Have you seen the statement concerning Glasgow and concerning Cardiff?”

and he replies—

“I have seen it. It is in a letter of my Bishop, who during his course of being a parish priest in Ballycastle, in the erection of a new church, was engaged in all the large towns, in fact in the three Kingdoms, collecting money. He gives the details, in that letter which he wrote to the licensed vintners in Dublin, of his experience of the Sunday Closing Act in Glasgow. He said, so far as I can recollect (and I recollect reading it in a newspaper), that the streets might be quiet, and that order and regularity might be said to prevail; and that the police, so far as their duties outside the public thoroughfares were concerned, seemed to have very little to do; but if he went into the lanes and closes, and into the homes of the poor, drunkenness seemed to prevail to an alarming extent everywhere he went. He said that if the Legislature thought it wise to frame their laws for the purpose of making people sober by Sunday closing, it was altogether misleading. I have heard of a statement made by some of the clergymen connected with Cardiff, and certainly from the statements that I have read in the public prints, I would be very sorry, either by word or by any means in my power, to bring about Sunday closing in the town of Belfast.”

My own experience of Glasgow and Cardiff is very limited, but I have visited those places and have conversed with respectable residents, and have been assured that the closing of public houses on Sundays has not put a stop to drunkenness on those days. I remember one Monday morning standing talking to a Catholic clergyman in the street at Cardiff. I saw a brewer's dray go past with a large number of empty beer barrels piled on it. The priest pointed this out to me, and asked me if I knew what it meant. Of course I did not, being a stranger, and then he informed me that the beer in the barrels had been consumed on Saturday night and Sunday in the workmen's houses. The gentleman who drew my attention to this has challenged public contradiction. I believe no one will attempt to dispute the fact that in the workmen's quarters in Cardiff the men are in the habit of clubbing together on Friday and buying a small cask of beer which they bring to the house of one of the members of the drinking club, and not only do the men drink the beer as long as they are able to sit or stand, but even the women and children take a hand at the beer drinking. Then Mr. Charles Dawson, one of the most prominent citizens in Dublin, who was well known in this House at one time, gave evidence as follows:—

“The probable result of the Act, in my opinion, would be this: While the conditions that I stated still exist, and while the incentives, and not only the incentives, but the provocatives, to drink exist, as they do now, remain unchanged and unaltered, I am sorry to say, if that remains as it does now, the withdrawal of public opportunities will make the people resort to others more secret and more dangerous. I have that opinion. I am not an advocate for always keeping up this thing, but until you provide a substitute for the public house, and a substitute in decent homes, I am afraid if you close early that they will drink at home, and they will drink in places less under the light of observation."

He went on to quote the following very interesting figures:—

"In 1851, before they had the Sunday closing in Glasgow, the arrests for drunkenness were 4.5 per cent. of the population. The Act was passed in 1853, and the figures as to the arrests for drunkenness in 1861, when the Sunday Closing Bill was in operation, was 9.4 per cent. of the population; in 1871, it reached 10.4 per cent.; and in 1887, which was the last year, it was 6.5 per cent."

Mr. Commissioner Harrell says—

"The opinion that I have on the question of home drinking is that I should not like to see that developed at all. I think that the habit of self-control amongst the poorer classes does not at present exist to such an extent, as to encourage the adoption of any social change which might lead them to bring drink into their own houses."

He is asked—

"In your opinion, would closing on Sunday have that effect?"

and he says—

"I think it would. I think the laying in of a provision on Saturday night would be very dangerous. If you could rely on their self-control, you would get rid of many difficulties which now exist in connection with many other things as well as the traffic in drink; but I would be very much afraid that laying in a supply of drink on Saturday night would lead, in all probability, to that drink being consumed on the Saturday night; it would never see the Sunday, or only the early Sunday morning."

Mr. Mannetti, himself a working man, is asked—"What is the view of the working classes with regard to home drinking?"

and he replies—

"I believe if you introduced the question of home drinking that men will bring home drink overnight, and when the drink is there it is rather a temptation to them, and the men will take to drinking it. It has come under my own observation that bottles are lying on the table when men are found drinking at home, and you will find a child coming and taking a bottle and putting it to its head very often; I have seen that, and I would not wish to see that practice come into our homes."

I am sure hon. Gentlemen who are promoting this Bill agree with Mr Mannetti that it would not be desirable to introduce this kind of drinking into the homes of the people of Ireland; and I ask those who are honestly desirous of checking the evils of intemperance to pause, and to take into account and give full consideration to the opinions and experiences of these gentlemen, who are entirely independent and unbiased witnesses. Mr. Mannetti is asked—

"And it is club drinking and home drinking which, in your opinion, would lead to family dissension and discomfort?"

He says, in reply—

"I believe it would. If you introduced home drinking, it would be an invitation to the wives and the children of our families to join in it; and from being sober wives, as we wish them to be, they would possibly become drunkards, and we object to that."

There are a large number of people in this country who drink, and drink to excess, who have never in all their lives been inside a public house. One of the most eloquent advocates of temperance that I have ever listened to, and one of the most influential, stated on a public platform, and in my hearing, that he was sorry to have to say that there were many people in this country who never enter a public house at all—men of high birth, of high social standing and great wealth—who would be ashamed to be seen entering a public house at all, but yet who blast their prospects in this world and in the next by the excessive use of alcohol. If that is the case in the higher circles, where people are surrounded by everything wealth can purchase, what is to be expected in the case of those people who have an unfortunate craving for drink without possessing any of those great advantages? Another gentleman (Mr. Crean) was asked his opinion of home drinking, and he said—

"I think my opinion is this: That I would very much regret that it should creep into any section of the community, because it would just be ruinous to the families; the children of necessity would see the bad example of their fathers, and the mothers would sometimes probably indulge in liquor too, and the result would be that it would be an all-round debauch, as I have seen it. I have seen children of tender years drinking."

He was then asked—

"You have seen children drink, and you think that is caused by home drinking?"

His reply was—

"Yes; by home drinking, certainly; and wives and husbands have not been able to refrain from drinking until they have fallen asleep over their booze."

The Rev. D. Tynan also gave some interesting evidence on the subject of home drinking. He said—

"I consider it a worse phase of drunkenness than the drunkenness resulting from drinking in public houses, because the home drinking which leads to that drunkenness demoralises the wives and the families of the people who drink at home; whereas if a man goes to get a drink in a public house he may get drunk, but his family is not demoralised by the drunkenness."

Asked whether the drunkenness in Dublin existed among men and women, Dr. Tynan said—

"Yes; but, at the same time, the drunkenness amongst women does not come under the observation of the police so much as it comes under the observation of the clergy. With regard to that, I might mention that in the cases which come before me of the drunkenness of women, in nine-tenths at least of those cases the drunkenness results from home drinking, and not from drinking in public houses."

I would ask those gentlemen who are promoting this Bill to bear in mind that some of us who are opposed to the passage of the measure are quite as great friends of temperance as they are. I, myself, approached the subject with an open mind; and if I believed that the closing of public houses would put an end to drunkenness, and would very sensibly check intemperance in Ireland, I should be one of the first to vote for it. In fact, I should adopt even more drastic measures if it were possible to carry them into operation and put a stop to the manufacture of intoxicating drinks altogether. Of course, however, it would be idle to propose such a thing as that, and I dare say even the most sanguine advocates of temperance recognise that. If I am opposed to this Bill, it is because, in the first place, it strikes against the interests of a number of respectable men who have invested their capital and their time in the public house business. I believe it will not advance the cause of temperance; but after destroying the property of thousands of respectable men throughout the length and breadth of Ireland, it will turn the drinking habits of the people into a direction which will be more injurious to them than if they are allowed to take drink in properly licensed and respectable houses. The respectable men who are engaged in the trade in different parts of Ireland are not by any means in favour of intemperance. On the contrary, I suppose that the respectable publican, both in Ireland and England, looks upon a drunkard on his premises as an unmitigated nuisance, and would be glad if he stopped away altogether. In fact, some of them take extra precautions to exclude drunkards from their premises, and to prevent them indulging in the use of alcohol on their premises. Those gentlemen whom, without meaning any offence to them, I call teetotallers, have not a monopoly of the desire to see intemperance checked. I believe, however, they are on the wrong tack altogether when they seek to check drunkenness by closing respectable public-houses and driving those who wish to get drink into places where they can get a bad quality of liquor at any hour of the night or day. This Bill is one of a very drastic character. It proposes to close the public houses in the four leading cities of Ireland during the whole of Sunday. I think the hon. Member for South Tyrone will himself admit that if you close the house of a respectable licensed trader entirely you ought to compensate him. What, then, have you to say of closing without compensation a public-house for one day in the week, and that, in some cases perhaps, the day on which the largest trade is done? One of the provisions of the Bill is that the distance for a bona fide traveller shall be extended from three to six miles. Do gentlemen take into account that that will inflict a very considerable amount of injury on a number of deserving men? I can give it as my own experience that in some of the watering places in Ireland, where Sunday closing is enforced, people, owing to the closing of public houses, now keep considerable quantities of drink in their apartments for the entertainment of visitors. Besides, in Ireland, in many of the places where drink is sold other articles are also sold, and either one branch of the business would have to be given up in order that miscellaneous goods might be sold, or the public would be deprived of their opportunity of making the usual purchases. Certain hon. Members would prefer, doubtless, that these men should give up their trade; perhaps they think that would be a great advantage. I, on the contrary, think that it would be an advantage that if people will take drink, the trade ought to be in the hands of respectable men. It is for this reason, amongst others, that I shall, to the best of my ability, oppose the Bill. (2.3.)

*(2.20.) SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): The hon. Member for North Cork complained of the composition of the Committee which passed the Report on which this Bill is founded. The hon. Member may complain of the composition of the Committee, but he has no reason whatever to complain of the composition of the House of Commons. And he will not be able in the future to find a House more favourable to his view than the present House of Commons. Taking the whole House, three Members to one, and taking the Irish Members, two Members to one, have already declared themselves in favour of this Bill. The hon. Member for North Cork tells us that we have no right to legislate in this matter for Ireland, but that we ought to leave the whole question to be discussed by her own Parliament. But I do not think you are doing any injury to Ireland, even if she obtained a Home Rule Parliament, to establish a system of Sunday closing of which that Parliament would be able to judge by experience. Of what the result of that experience will be, we, at any rate, have no doubt whatever. No, Sir, the true province of Local Option is to decide whether there shall be a liquor traffic or not. If there is a liquor traffic, its regulation is not a matter for the collective plébiscitary vote of the ratepayers, but for the custodians of public order, and its highest custodian of all—Parliament. The hon. Member for North Cork adduced statistics to show that the system of Sunday closing had not succeeded in Ireland. I will say that his statistics were rather old, and I now propose to give the House some statistics of a more recent date, which absolutely and entirely prove the contrary. I will quote from the most recent Returns to the House of Commons that I can find, namely, those presented in 1889; and what do I there see? Why, that the population of the exempted cities in which there is no Sunday closing is 700,000, the entire population of the country at large being 4,200,000, according to the Census figures, and that the number of arrests in the exempted cities was 2,350, while in the country at large they number less than 3,400. That is to say, that while the population of the exempted cities was as one to six of the whole, the number of arrests on the other hand was as four to six, or in other words, that the operation of the existing law has improved the sobriety of the people affected in the proportion of four to one, which, I say, is quite sufficient to make it worth while for us to pass this Bill. The law works well in Ireland—that is to say, it works well in that part of Ireland where it is in force. Let us see whether it works well in our great cities elsewhere. I will take an example from Scotland. In the City of Aberdeen there were in one year 403 arrests between Saturday morning and Sunday morning, or during the period people who had been drinking in the public houses were out in the streets; but during the next 24 hours there were only 32 arrests; that is to say the Sunday was more sober than the weekday in the proportion of 12 to one. In Edinburgh there were 975 Saturday arrests against 68 Sunday arrests during the year; but the hon. Member for North Louth, quoting figures, the origin of which I am unable to explain, takes the case of the city, a part of which I have the honour to represent, namely, the City of Glasgow, and tells us there were, in the course of a year, arrests for drunkenness in the proportion of 6 per cent. of the population. Sir, the population of Glasgow, according to the Government Return I have before me, including Govan, Partick, and the other suburbs, is 750,000, among whom the arrests for drunkenness during the year, were under 15,000 which is about 2 per cent. of the population, and of these, 5,900 were made on Saturday, while only 427 took place on Sunday. But it may be said, "That is all very well for a great Scotch town; how would it be in the case of a great Irish town?" Now, the Secretary to the Lord Advocate was questioned on this subject by a Select Committee on the Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill in 1877. He was asked—

"When you were asked as to the facility of applying the Forbes-Mackenzie Act in Scotland, you said the Scotch were a law-abiding people. Are you aware"— and here I may say that perhaps the question was rather rudely put—

“that in Glasgow there is a large Irish population?—I am quite aware of that. Do you know what is the number of the Irish population in Glasgow?—I should suppose 100,000, very likely.”

Then there arose a discussion, with which I will not trouble the House, as to whether the Irish are equally law-abiding with the Scotch, after which the questioning went on—

“Have those 100,000 Irish given much difficulty in the way of administering the Forbes-Mackenzie Act?—I cannot say; but I never heard that they have. I never heard the suggestion that they increased the difficulty, and in one part, where there is a large population of 30,000 Irish, chiefly workpeople, there is no difficulty.”

Well, Sir, I say that if in the large cities of Scotland this is the case, it would also be the case in the large cities of Ireland, and there will be no more difficulty, and no less popularity attached to this Bill when it becomes law in the large districts of Ireland than is at present the case in the large districts of Scotland. The hon. Member also brings before us the case of the shebeen, and complains there will be more illicit drinking if the Bill is passed. We do not care very much whether it leads to illicit drinking or not so long as it leads to less drinking. But the statistics show Sunday closing does not lead to increased shebeening. When I was Secretary for Ireland I made a most minute examination of an enormous mass of evidence, for the purpose of satisfying myself on that matter. The evidence was confidential, and I could not give it to the House. I think, however, I shall be justified in stating the general result. I asked the Resident Magistrates whether Sunday closing had led to an increase of shebeening—a question on which, whatever their political opinions, they are well qualified to judge—and by a majority of more than ten to one they said it had not. I also asked whether it led to illicit distillation, and 71 Magistrates out of 74 said it had not. The experience of Ireland, as shown by figures, absolutely bears that out. It has been said there was a rise in the number of shebeens when the Sunday Closing Act came into force in 1878. In the whole 12 months following, the arrests for Sunday drunkenness were 2,000, as compared with 4,000 in the previous year. And, as regards shebeening, in 1878 there were 178 evictions for shebeening, or an increase of 20, but two years afterwards they had fallen to 150, and they have gone on falling ever since. There is absolutely overwhelming proof that Sunday closing in Ireland has not led to an increase of shebeening. In the last two years in the exempted cities the convictions for illicit drinking were equal on Sunday to the rest of the week; but in the cities, where there was Sunday closing, the number of convictions for drinking in shebeens was considerably less on Sundays than on any of the other days in the week. The experience of Scotland shows that if legal drinking on Sundays were put down illicit drinking could be traced to its illegal source, but that if Sunday drinking is legalised it helps to conceal illicit drinking. I think I have answered by unanswerable figures all the points which have been rested on statistics. As to the first change made by the Bill, I think it would be a very great thing for the working population that the public houses should be closed at 9 o'clock on Saturdays. It would not only stop drunkenness, but it would enable the wife to get her husband home at an earlier hour, and with a very much larger proportion of his wages in his pocket. The other change insures that bona fide travellers shall have bona fides, and not go from one part of a town to what is practically another part of the same town. He will have to travel six miles instead of three to get a drink. There was overwhelming evidence laid before the Committee on Welsh Sunday closing to show that the three mile limit only meant that a man should walk from one end of the town in which he lived to the other end in order to get a drink. There is a public house in the neighbourhood of Phoenix Park on which on one Sunday 600 persons entered, in order to obtain drink, and yet not one of them was, in any sense probably a bona fide traveller. The meaning of the clause is that a man living in an hotel shall have practically the same facilities for getting drink as he would if he were at home, but that he shall have no greater facilities. I do not agree that this is making one law for the rich and another for the poor, for it has been found that in places where the liquor traffic has no existence—and there are several such places in Ireland—the working man is soon able to purchase a couple of barrels of beer to drink at home if he desires to do so. It is a question of home; it is a question of encouraging men to spend their money upon those who depend upon them for the necessities of life, and for its comfort and happiness. The only question remaining is whether we shall consider the details of the Bill in Committee of the Whole House or upstairs. The fears that Irish Members will not have their fair share in the discussion are absolutely illusory; it will be within the competence of the Committee of Selection to nominate any number of Irish Members on the Committee, and I have no doubt that any Irish Member who shows he has a real interest in the question, on one side or the other, will find no difficulty in getting appointed; but in any case there is the Report stage, when the House can correct any mistake the Committee may make. The real reason for sending the Bill to a Committee upstairs is that we want to pass it. It has not been passed before, because of want of time, and now the best chance of enabling it to become law is to refer it to a Committee. A question will then be set at rest, I believe for ever, on which public opinion in Ireland is very nearly unanimous.

(2.42.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I do not propose to follow the preceding speakers in an abstract discussion of the drink question, or the propriety or impropriety of interference by Parliament with the liquor traffic, nor do I propose to discuss the bearing and effect of the statistics which have been put forward. The right hon. Gentleman has reminded the House that the original Sunday Closing (Ireland) Act was passed by the aid of the Conservative Government in 1878. In that year Sir S. Northcote, who was then leader of the House, gave facilities for the passing of the Bill, without which it could not have become law, and by so doing he enabled a most valuable and important experiment to be tried in Ireland. It was passed avowedly as an experiment, and was to continue in force for four years, at the end of which time it was for Parliament to determine whether it should continue. In the result, almost everybody in the

Sir George Trevelyan

House felt it was quite impossible to drop the Bill, and it has been put in the Expiring Laws Continuance Act every year from that time to this. Thus three successive Governments have declared their distinct opinion, with the assent of the majority of the House, that Sunday closing is an experiment which has been tried in Ireland and has succeeded, and should be renewed. Every one must feel that to continue renewing an Act of this kind annually is an unsatisfactory way of legislating. The matter was brought under the notice of the Government by various hon. Gentlemen in 1887, and a Committee was appointed of which my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland was Chairman. Exhaustive evidence was taken on the whole subject, and, in spite of what has fallen from the hon. Members who have moved and seconded the rejection of the Bill, it is not unfair to say that the whole weight of the evidence, with comparatively insignificant exceptions, was in favour of the continuance of Sunday closing in Ireland, and of the adoption of Saturday closing after 9 o'clock. The people who gave that evidence were not drawn from one class of the community, but they represented every class and every section of opinion. The witnesses included Magistrates, police, priests and ministers of all denominations, and all were unanimous, and their unanimity was unshaken on cross examination, that Sunday closing had succeeded in Ireland and ought to be continued. That being the state of the case, the House has to decide not whether there shall be Sunday closing or not in Ireland—I regard that as a question quite amply decided—but whether Sunday closing shall be enforced in the unsatisfactory way it now is by means of an Act that has to be continued annually, or whether the legislation shall be put on a permanent basis, with such modifications as may be suggested by the Committee to which the Bill may be referred when it has been read a second time. These being the alternatives before the House, I can not doubt that they will decide in favour of the more permanent form of legislative enactment. I trust, therefore, that the House will without any undue delay pass the Second Reading of the Bill. Then will follow a Motion, which I shall support, to refer the Bill to the Grand Committee on Law. The Motion for the Second Reading is not directly a Government Motion; but when it is recollected that the measure was originally passed by the aid of the Government, and that it must be continued annually by the aid of successive Governments, it cannot but be concluded that this Bill ought not to be considered in the ordinary category of Private Members' Bills, but it partakes, in a modified sense, of the character of a Government measure. If the Bill leaves the Grand Committee in a form in which the Government can accept it, I shall hope we may be able to aid its further passage through the House. With regard to the special provisions of the Bill, the form in which the Government will desire to see it pass is the form it would have taken if the Committee had adopted the original Report of the Chairman of the Committee, which recommended an amended Bill for Sunday closing and a Bill for Saturday closing. As a Bill for both objects I hope it will finally receive the assent of the Legislature.

(2.50.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I am sure the House will have heard with great satisfaction the statement of the right hon. Member, that the Government accept the responsibility for carrying this measure into law, a statement at which many in the House and thousands out of it will rejoice. This question has made and is making from day to day the greatest and most satisfactory progress. We began many years ago with Scotland, proceeded next to Ireland, and finally adopted similar legislation for Wales. I do not know that there has been any attempt in Scotland to overthrow the system of Sunday closing. In Wales we know that last year, or the year before, an attack was made on the principle of Sunday closing, but after careful examination of the facts, it totally failed, and the principle of Sunday closing in Wales has been approved of. We now hear from the right hon. Gentleman that the attacks on Sunday closing in Ireland are not sustained by the facts, and that opinion and evidence in favour of Sunday closing in Ireland are almost universal. The English people will naturally ask why, if Sunday closing is found to be beneficial in Scotland and advantageous in Ireland and in Wales, it should not be adopted in England. What is the difference between the populations of these different sections of the United Kingdom that each should be subject to a different kind of legislation? Although the point may not be quite germane to the Bill, still it is one that must occur to all who think upon the subject. There is, however, great satisfaction in the position in which the question stands in Scotland, Ireland, and Wales.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman has a little stretched the statement I made with regard to the action of the Government; and I wish to put the matter on a basis which cannot lead to misunderstanding. I have not made the Government responsible for every stage of the Bill; that would be a pledge of too wide a character; but I do say we do not regard it as simply a Private Members' Bill, and that we hope to be able to facilitate its progress.

(2.55.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Although I am consistently opposed to excessive drinking, I feel bound to oppose legislation on which the sense of the constituencies has not been taken, and which I believe is objected to by a majority of the people of Ireland, and I must say I shall do all I can to circumvent the attempts of hon. Members to smuggle this measure through the House. I have heard of no expression of opinion from Ireland in favour of the Bill; on the contrary, I know that in every Irish constituency the majority of the people are dead against it. I cannot support legislation which does not apply equally to the rich and the poor. I am against coercion in every form, and this Bill is but one form of coercion. The object of it is defeated by the drinking clubs it brings into existence. I do not think we can do much good by coercive legislation. As a medical man I have had plenty of opportunity of seeing that the effect of the operation of the Sunday Closing Act was not by any means to stop Sunday drinking. In the City of Cork bogus clubs were established and a new bottle for the conveyance of drink was made. You never can accomplish very much by coercive legislation. On the Continent—in Berlin for instance—you find that public houses are kept open from year's end to year's end, and yet there is no excessive drinking. Restriction after restriction is proposed. First of all, you started with Sunday closing, then you proposed Saturday closing, and we all know that the hon. Member for Cocker-mouth (Sir W. Lawson), has declared he will not be satisfied until public houses are closed altogether. You are going from step to step, and I ask you to pause and inquire whether you are on the right track. I believe that instead of doing good you are really doing harm by these restrictions. This Bill ought not to be passed without a clear expression of opinion in Ireland in its favour. Up to the present there has not been such an expression of opinion. I have ample means of knowing what the wishes of the people in Cork, my native city, are, and I emphatically assert that the moderate portion of the inhabitants of Cork are opposed to this measure. As I am anxious, as an elected Representative, to discharge my duty conscientiously, I feel obliged to vote against the Second Reading.

(3.8.) MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I recognise that the right Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow is anxious to improve the condition of the Irish people, and I realise also that it is through the methods he proposes that the condition of our people is to be elevated. But I must dissent strongly from one phrase he used in the speech he has just delivered. I repudiate the idea that we who are against the passing of this Bill advocate and believe in the gospel of drink: that was the right hon. Gentleman's phrase. I and those who think with me in this matter are quite as anxious for the improvement and elevation of our people, for the cultivation of habits of thrift amongst our people, as the right hon. Gentleman is. If I thought that the passing of this Bill would improve to any great extent the condition of those unfortunate people in Ireland who give way to drinking habits, I certainly would be found to-day on the side of the right hon. Gentleman, but it is because I believe otherwise that I oppose the Second Reading of this Bill. I oppose this Bill, in the first place, because I believe there is no great or overwhelming demand for it on the part of the Irish people, and I oppose it because, as far as I can gather, the operation of the Sunday Closing Act of 1878 has not been the conspicuous success the supporters of the Bill try to make out. I deny that any Member or any section of the Irish

Members have received any commission or mandate from their constituents to support the Bill. I believe that the Bill deals with social questions which would be much better and more adequately dealt with by some authority in Ireland. I cannot say that my constituents have at any time expressed any strong opinion in regard to this matter, and I search the names given in the Lists of Divisions in the House of Commons in vain to find that amongst the Representatives of Ireland there is any overwhelming conviction that the Bill should be passed in its entirety. Last year, of the 33 hon. Gentlemen representing Irish constituencies, and who sit opposite, only 10 voted in the Division; and of the 86 Members who sit around me, only 38 took part in the Division. It is therefore absurd for any hon. Gentleman to put forward the plea that this Bill has behind it the strong and passionate endorsement of the Irish Members. This is not a burning question; and I certainly think that in view of the frequent promises of the Government that they are going to bestow some Local Government upon Ireland, this question ought to be left to the disposal and decision of the Irish people themselves. The Chief Secretary, in the few remarks he thought it worth while to address to the House, declared that the original Act was an experiment; and he went on to express his conviction that the present continuous state of experimentalising should not be continued after this year, that there should be some permanency given to a Bill of this character. But I am rather inclined to think that the Government are only inclined to experimentalise still. They are not willing to follow, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton is willing to do, their ideas to the full logical conclusion. They are not prepared to abolish public houses altogether. The Chief Secretary protests against experimentalising, but the Attorney General for Ireland is not so deadly opposed to that position. I remember being in the House last year when this measure was discussed; and the Attorney General for Ireland was in favour of the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. He was not in favour of accepting the Bill as submitted to the House, but in favour of pruning the hours as it were. I gather from the remarks of the Chief Secretary to-day that in the same way he is only in favour of cutting down the time of opening on Sunday by a couple of hours, and of curtailing the hours on Saturday by a similar number. The second position I take up is that the boast [that the closing of public houses in Ireland has been a success is not one based on the actual facts. Take the Committee over which the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General presided. He and those who argue from his point of view agree in asserting that there was almost a unanimous opinion on the part of the witnesses who gave evidence before that Committee; but I deny the assertion in toto. There was a large and wholesome opinion on the part of representative men in Ireland that the Sunday Closing Act of 1878 had by no means been the success it was claimed to be. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division said that shebeening and illicit drinking had not increased as a result of the Sunday Closing Act, and he went on to say that certain gentlemen who made Reports to him when he was Chief Secretary bore him out in that statement. I do not desire to import any political matter into this discussion; but I cannot accept as authorities on any matter relating to social or political life in Ireland the gentlemen to whom the right hon. Gentleman referred. The Resident Magistrates of Ireland, like many other officials in Ireland, cut their coat according to their cloth. They found the right hon. Gentleman wished to have certain information, and they gave it to him. The right hon. Gentleman is glad that information coincided with his view. As a Representative of the Irish people, I assert that no trust or confidence should be placed on the words of or the statistics compiled by the Resident Magistrates of Ireland. I assert that shebeening has increased under the Act of 1878, and I can appeal for support of my contention to the evidence given before the Committee over which the Attorney General for Ireland presided. I find that in the Metropolitan District of Dublin the number of convictions for illicit drinking in 1876, before the passing of the Sunday Closing Act, was 245, whereas in 1883, after the passing of the Act, the number was 370. In the matter of illicit drinking Dublin may be taken as typical of the condition of the other towns in Ireland. The Chief Commissioner in Dublin presented to the Committee a Return of the number of persons who entered 30 public houses during each hour from 6 p.m. to 11 p.m. on Saturday the 10th of March, and from 2 p.m. to 7 p.m. on Sunday the 18th of March, 1888. That was after the passing of the Act. The number of persons who visited the public houses on the Sunday was 13,426. There are in the city of Dublin 943 retail licences, and therefore, if 13,426 visited 30 houses we can easily calculate how many visited the 943 houses. The point I push is this, that the statistics go to show that the people go to get refreshment, not to get drunk. If the thousands of people who visit these 943 houses on Sunday are debarred from the refreshment that they can have during six days of the week, where will they go when the houses are closed? I have given the figures in reference to illicit drinking, and if you deprive these people of the ordinary facilities, the outcome of which is not drunkenness, can any man of ordinary experience doubt the result? The Bill being brought up year after year, of course, the same facts and figures are given time after time. These go to show that the Sunday Closing Act of 1878 has led to an increase in shebeening, and is likely to lead to an increase of that illegal traffic if you extend the Act by this Bill. I hold that the Act has led to an increase in drunkenness. If you take the five exempted towns, and the evidence given before the Committee to which reference has been so frequently made, you will find that in Cork, Belfast, Limerick, and Dublin, there has been, as the result of the restriction upon Sunday trade, an enormous increase in drunkenness. The reason to my mind is this, as you close the legal channels from which refreshment may be obtained, you increase the temptation to illicit drinking, and unfortunately with this drinking vice of other kinds follows. There is a great difference in the fact of a man going for his refreshment to a well-conducted public house, and having only the means of getting the refreshment he desires at a shebeen. It is no mere assertion on my part, evidence before the Committee proves that in these five exempted towns there has been an increase of drunkenness, if you compare the statistics collected before and after the Sunday Closing Act of 1878 took its place upon the Statute Book. The Chief Commissioner of Belfast handed in a Return which shows the state of things as regards that city. In the four years before the passing of the Sunday Closing Act, and when in Belfast licensed houses were open from 2 to 9 on Sundays, the annual arrests for drunkenness on Sunday were 396, but in the four years after the passing of the Act which reduced the hours of sale by two hours, the number of arrests had risen to 512. By easy calculation, we may find, if in four years of the operation of the Act the numbers had thus increased, what the increase probably is in this year of grace, 1891. Belfast may be taken as a representative town for the North of Ireland, as Cork is of the South. In Cork the result is shown thus: Four years before the passing of the Act, with the houses open from 2 to 9, Sunday arrests, 319; in 1879, the first year that the restriction of hours came into effect, arrests for drunkenness on Sunday, 488; and in 1884 after six years' operation of the Act, 499. In Limerick the results shown are: in 1877, 143 arrests; in 1887, after nine years' working of the Act, 204. I maintain that the Sunday Closing Act, so far as the five exempted towns are concerned, has been shown in its restriction upon the hours to have been a striking failure, and I say if you attempt to extend the operation of this Act, it is reasonable to suppose that the same results will follow, and the state of these towns be worse. I cannot see why if hon. Gentlemen wish to try this social experiment they should not begin with London. I cannot understand why Ireland should be selected as the field for the experiment. Why not leave this question to the intelligence and capacity of the Irish people? Why attempt here with but slight knowledge of the conditions of Irish life to settle the paltry question of how many hours public houses shall be opened in Irish towns on Saturday or Sunday? If we had an assurance that this question is about to be dealt with in a whole-hearted fashion it would be some satisfaction, but we have no guarantee of the kind. The Attorney General for Ireland last year and the Chief Secretary this year have declared at that table that while they are in favour of the Second Reading of this Bill they will not commit themselves to details in Committee, but we want to know what the Government are going to do. The Irish people have given us no mandate on this subject, the majority of the people are anxious that this and other Irish local matters should be dealt with by their own Representatives. There is no strong expression of opinion of Irish Members in favour of the passing of this Bill, and in view of these facts the Bill should be held over and left to the Irish people for decision with other matters affecting the social and moral life of the people, through the means of the tribunal best fitted to give a decision—a tribunal sitting in Dublin. So I support the Amendment of my hon. Friend that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

(3.43.) COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has informed the House that no full and distinct opinion has been expressed on the part of the people of Ireland in regard to this Bill; but if hon. Members will read the names on the back of the Bill it will be found that, at any rate among the Irish Members of all classes, creeds, and shades of opinion, there is unity in trying to curtail the supply of whisky to the Irish people. The hon. Member has used a very remarkable argument; he has proved that in certain cities in Ireland, and particularly in Belfast, there has been a great increase in drunkenness, and that may possibly be, I do not contest his figures, but I say it is to these cities we want to apply the Act, and, therefore, the argument of the hon. Member supports our case that, because of the increase of drunkenness there, the Act should be extended to the five cities now exempted.

MR. CRILLY: The hon. and gallant Gentleman has misapprehended my point. My object in putting forward the figures was to show that, whereas before the passing of the Act by which the hours were restricted, the arrests in Belfast on Sunday for drunkenness were comparatively few, after the curtailment of the hours the number of these arrests largely increased. The Act then failed in the effect intended, and the same result may be expected to follow a still further extension of the restriction.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I do not altogether follow that reasoning. Something is due to increase in population, and the argument of the hon. Member practically amounts to this—that the more public houses there are and the longer they are open, the more sober the people will be. The hon. Member for North Cork said that no ordinary Irishman could walk more than six miles without a glass of whisky; that he came to a dead standstill at the end of five miles; and that, therefore, this Bill was an unrighteous attempt on the part of the British Legislature to interfere with the prerogatives of Irish locomotion. If you could only establish a public house at intervals of five miles on Irish roads and start an Irishman at one end there is no knowing where he would get to. But I do not think the hon. Member puts these things forward as serious argument. Then the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Nolan) made a speech which shows that he has devoted much time to his subject, and he elaborated it with considerable skill. The hon. Member informed us that the effect of Sunday closing in Glasgow was that drunkenness had disappeared from the streets and taken refuge in the back slums and in the houses. That is a great improvement, and any measure which tends to remove the hideous, melancholy spectacle of drunken men staggering about the streets deserves our support. If the effect of this Bill in Ireland goes no further than that, it will effect a great improvement. The arguments used have been similar to those with which we are familiar, in reference to the Coercion Act, an argument that may be employed against any coercive legislation that the effect will be to drive crime beneath the surface. Well, the Coercion Act passed, and crime, I am happy to say, against which it was directed has been in a great measure prevented above and below the surface. If this Bill is passed, it will have the effect of striking a blow at drunkenness in cities, and of getting rid of that disgrace to a Christian land and civilised community—drunken people staggering about the streets.

Among my own constituents there is perfect unanimity in favour of the Bill. That opinion extends throughout the North of Ireland. Never has a Bill for Ireland been introduced which has enlisted so much public opinion in its favour as this Bill we are now considering, and which I hope the House will pass.

(3.50.) MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): We have reason to complain, I think, of the manoeuvre by which this Bill has taken first place on the Orders of the Day, and in the interest of fair discussion I think due notice should have been given of the arrangement. Though the promoters of the Bill may take credit to themselves for a clever move, I may remind them that such action is apt to provoke reprisal, and may operate to the disadvantage of the Bill in its later stages. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has expressed doubts as to the serious nature of our arguments, but certainly I cannot say that seriousness is a feature in his characteristic humour. The hon. and gallant Gentleman points to the names on the back of the Bill, but these only show that there are certain Members of each Party supporting the Bill, but these Debates show conclusively that Members of all Parties oppose the Bill. Certainly there is no evidence of unanimity of opinion in favour of the Bill. Legislation of this drastic character would be intolerable in any country were it not carried out, not only with the consent, but at the instance of the overwhelming majority of the population. Such an interference with liberty cannot be defended on any ground except that the vast majority of the population demand it. I believe that there is a demand for this kind of legislation in Scotland, Wales, and in certain small districts in the North of Ireland; but I assert that outside Ulster there is no demand made for this legislation by the overwhelming majority of the population. I do not believe that any Nationalist Member can say that at the last election he was pledged one way or the other on this question. The question has not been before the electors, and no Public Body in my constituency has asked me to support this Bill. Not a single Public Body elected by the people under any franchise in North Dublin, so far as I can recollect, ever asked me to support the Bill, and in the City of Dublin I am bound to say such evidence as there is is against the proposals in the Bill. Mr. Harrell, the Chief Commissioner of the Dublin Police, gave his evidence before the Committee and expressed his concurrence in the view put forward in the Resolution carried by the Corporation against this Bill, a body which he said he was sure had the welfare of the people at heart. Yet, in the face of testimony such as this from a man who stands apart from all Political Parties, who belongs neither to a temperance nor to a publican party, the House is assured by the Chief Secretary and others that the whole weight of evidence is in favour of the Bill. Mr. Harrell is a man of great experience. Before assuming his post in Dublin he was employed in Belfast, and prior to that he was employed in Ballina and other parts of the West, and his evidence can be relied on. I challenge anyone to show equally strong evidence on the other side. In the face of such evidence as this of Mr. Harrell and other witnesses before the Committee—in the face of the fact that no public demand, by meetings or in the ordinary way, has been expressed, I assert that to say that public opinion in Ireland has shown itself in favour of this Bill is to state what is not the fact. I know very well that there are in the County and City of Dublin honest and enthusiastic men who really believe that measures of this description are absolutely necessary in the interest of the people. I acknowledge that they have shown great capacity and great industry in mastering the details of this question, and great enthusiasm in calling meetings and getting up Petitions in favour of their views. But I beg the House to be on its guard against assuming for one moment that these excellent men, good-intentioned as they are, represent any but the smallest fraction of the population amidst which they live. I shall not make any protestations of my own sincerity in the matter. I believe I am correct in stating that I have never seen manifested in the usual way any overwhelming demand for this legislation in the County or City of Dublin, and, that being so, I do not feel justified in giving a silent vote or in refraining from expressing my conviction that, if you pass this Bill in the present state of opinion, you will be doing it without the sanction of the overwhelming majority of the people in the City and County of Dublin, and, I believe I may say, in direct defiance of their wishes. I think it is too much taken for granted that the opponents of the Bill have formed their conclusions on insufficient evidence. I have read some evidence on the subject which I consider of great value. The evidence of Mr. Harrell proves that our contention that this Bill would lead to drinking habits among the people, from which they are now to a great extent free, is founded on experience. Then there is the evidence of Mr. O'Donel, the Chief Police Magistrate of Dublin, who stated in his evidence that the strong opinion he expressed in 1877 against total closing on Sunday, or early closing on Saturday, was founded on the danger of increasing the number of shebeens and encouraging illicit drinking. He went on to say that his view remained the same on that subject; and he thought the total closing of public houses on Sunday would inevitably result in enormously increasing the number of shebeens, and would, therefore, have a very demoralising effect. Here we have the evidence of a gentleman of undoubted intelligence and great experience; and I say that when such an opinion is expressed by a man in Mr. O'Donel's position, it becomes a serious matter for social reformers to fly in the face of it. I most strongly protest, in the name of my constituents, against the adoption of this Bill. I have received no mandate from them to support it. I have never been asked a single question on the hustings about it, and I was elected without giving any pledge on the subject. I believe that all those who were elected with me in 1885 are in a similar position. The question was not before the constituencies in 1885 or 1886.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): Because it was law.

MR. CLANCY: It was only temporarily law. Every one knew it was a temporary Act, and that after the election the question would arise whether it was to be renewed or not. Nevertheless, the question was never raised, and not a single man in Leinster, Munster, or Connaught was asked whether he would support or oppose the renewal of the legislation. I know my hon. Friend the Member for West Clare has been for years a supporter of legislation of this description; and if he speaks to-day in favour of the Bill, he will speak his own convictions and not those of the men of the County of Clare, who send him to Parliament. I challenge him to say whether he said a single word about it to his constituents in 1885. I think there is every reason for refusing the Second Reading of the Bill.

(4.9.) MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I regret that I am unable to follow the course taken by the Government and to vote for the Second Reading. Two reasons actuate me in the action I intend to take. One is, that I am strongly of opinion that the Bill involves an attack on temperance, of which I am an advocate; and the other is, that it involves an attack upon the principles of liberty. I cannot believe that it is possible to promote temperance by restrictive legislation. I believe such legislation is much more likely to promote than to discourage the consumption of intoxicating drinks. I believe that the common-sense of the individual and the existing law are generally sufficient to restrict the use of stimulants. The majority of us who use stimulants do so, I believe, under proper safeguards of self-respect, and the ordinary requirements of nature. Those who are a minority, who use stimulants to excess, do so at their peril and defiance of the law. Statistics have been invoked by both sides in this Debate. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow says that there is an overwhelming preponderance of statistics in favour of the Bill. The opponents of the measure urge that the vast preponderance of statistics is against it. The right hon. Gentleman seems to have forgotten that statistics with regard to open convictions for drunkenness are easily obtained, but statistics as to private drunkenness are not to be obtained so easily. The right hon. Gentleman drew a picture of the gratification of the wife of a working man when her husband returns on Saturday night with his wages in his pocket. But he might just as likely return with a bottle of beer in one pocket and a bottle of whisky in another. I am inclined to think that Sunday closing has no deterrent effect; but that is not the main ground of my opposition to the Bill. Public opinion may or may not be in favour of the measure. I do not care how it goes, and I do not care for the statistics. I do not see why a majority, any more than a minority, should dictate to others what they are to eat or drink, so long as they do not break the law and cause inconvenience to the public. Measures of this kind partake of what I cannot call by any other name than grandmotherly legislation. I am sorry to see that it finds favour as much on one side of the House as on the other. Women Suffrage, Payment of Members, Compulsory Education, are all of this class. For these reasons I shall vote against the Second Reading.

*(4.45.) MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): Complaint has been made by the hon. Member for Dublin that the opponents of this Bill have been taken by surprise, but I do not think the complaint is legitimate. It was on the Paper, and, therefore, hon. Gentlemen should have been prepared to meet it. Moreover, a statement was made in Ireland by the Primate a week ago that the measure would be taken to-day, and I myself at a meeting in London on Friday last declared that it would come on to-day, and my declaration appeared in Saturday's papers. If hon. Members do not read the Irish newspapers or the English newspapers, or the Orders of this House, they have no right to protest in this House against the change which has taken place in the Orders of the Day.

(4.52.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I see no reason whatever—and I have listened attentively to this Debate—to alter the position I took up on this question when it was last before the House. I then stated that it appeared to me that the question of the further development of the restriction on the sale of liquor in Ireland ought to be reserved for treatment by an Irish Assembly; in fact, that it was a question which only such an Assembly could successfully deal with. I say "the further development of restriction," because the House must remember that we are not dealing with a question of the foundation of restriction; there is already a very effective law in this respect in force in Ireland. Hon. Members should bear in mind that, except in five cities, public houses are now altogether closed on Sunday in Ireland, and on week-days they are closed in the large cities at 11 o'clock, and in the smaller towns at 10 o'clock. When I compare those regulations with the regulations which elsewhere generally prevail in civilised countries, I find that the restriction in Ireland is already of such a kind that it throws upon the promoters of the Bill the onus of showing that there is special need of further restriction. Now, I say that this is a question that ought to be raised in an Irish Assembly, and that leads me to ask whether there is any probability of the establishment of such an Assembly in Ireland? We know the present Government are pledged to deal with the question of Local Government in Ireland, and I am, therefore, inclined to wait to see whether their proposals will include the establishment in Ireland of such an authority as can properly deal with this question. The doubt will probably be resolved next year, that being the last year of the administration of the present Government previous to the General Election, and the Government being under a pledge to deal with the question. Furthermore, the question of the right of the Irish people to manage their own affairs will be a leading question at the coming General Election, and until that question is settled I am unwilling to assent to the proposition that further restrictions shall be imposed by the House of Commons. It must be remembered that we are here to-day legislating for another country. This Assembly is substantially and potentially an Assembly representative not of the people of Ireland—for we have no decisive voice—but of the people of Great Britain, and I should advise you to be cautious in proceeding further in what I venture to think is open to the imputation of being an odious process of inventing and forging restrictive sumptuary laws for a people other than your own. I am of opinion that, as a rule, moral energy such as is now being developed ought to radiate from a centre, and if this is a good Bill for Ireland it is a good Bill for England. I wish to know whether English Members generally would be willing to commit themselves to the principle that public houses in London and in the other great cities in Great Britain should be closed all day on Sunday? If you are ready to pass a Bill in that sense, and apply it to England, and if that Bill, being applied to England proves by experience to have beneficial effects, I think you would be in a far better position for asking that such a Bill be applied to Ireland. But until you show your moral sincerity by applying your moral theories to your own case, I deny your moral right to proceed further in the case of Ireland. I think the principle I lay down is not an unfair one. I say that if the principle of the Bill is a good one you ought to prove your sincerity by first applying it to yourselves. Moreover, in the attempt to push this restriction to such an extreme there is an offensive assumption of superiority on the part of Englishmen to which they are not entitled. There is in the social life of the great cities of England as much need of the hand of the social reformer in this respect as in any city in Ireland. And not only is there an offensive assumption of superiority, but there is also, I think, an undeserved assumption of the inferiority of the Irish people, and I, for one, as an Irishman, refuse to accept the assumption that the Irish people are in greater need of restriction of this kind than the subjects of the Queen in any other portion of the Empire. I would say to some of my friends on this side of the House, who are in favour of the principle of Home Rule for Ireland, and of confiding to Irishmen the unfettered care of their own affairs, that when they consider themselves justified in asking for other reforms to be postponed until an Irish Parliament is established, they give me a very strong and conclusive case for asking also for the postponement of the question now before the House. Take the question of education, for instance, for I desire to be quite frank. I saw, or thought I saw, a couple of years ago, a disposition on the part of the Government to deal with certain branches of the Irish education question in a sense satisfactory to the people of Ireland as a whole. I found, however, that amongst our Liberal friends who desire to give us Home Rule there was a feeling that it would be better to postpone dealing with that question until an Irish Parliament was established. I deferred to that view because I thought the question of the greatest importance was the establishment of a supreme authority in Ireland. Well, if our Liberal friends thought it right to urge, and if I thought it right to agree that an Irish reform, on which all Irish Members were of one opinion, might fairly be postponed in consequence of the imminence of Home Rule, until it was established, may I not plead with greater force that a reform upon which there is considerable difference of opinion amongst Irish Members should be postponed until Ireland has an opportunity of dealing with it herself? I think that argument is unanswerable. On the merits of the question I take no dogmatic stand. There never has been a specific presentation of this question at a General Election, nor any declaration of the people in favour of it. I would ask any fair-minded man who has listened to the Debate, and bears in mind the conflict of testimony and opinion, whether there is any such singular and exceptional social condition in reference to drunkenness, in consequence of Sunday opening in Ireland, as entitles the House to proceed to this extreme measure? Coercion may be offensive, and may be injurious in the moral as well as in the political scale, and I think that before you proceed to deal so drastically with the habits of the people, as you would do by the present Bill, you are bound to satisfy yourself whether there is an exceptional state of things existing. I say that no such thing has been proved or anything approaching it. There is nothing peculiar in Ireland on this question of social indulgence, and there is no more reason for it than in the case of England or Scotland. Statistics show that the prevalence of Sunday drunkenness in Ireland is extremely trivial. The next question is this—is this reform desired? Reference has been made to meetings. I need not suggest how extremely easy it is to get meetings together on any subject. You can get them up to affirm that there shall be a total closing of public houses or to affirm that the sale of drink shall be freed from all restrictions. But there is no such public opinion on this subject in Ireland as entitles the promoters of the Bill to declare that public opinion is on their side. As to Belfast, which city is dealt with in the Bill, I am in a position to say that the Catholic Bishop is of opinion that a further shortening of the hours of opening on Sunday is not required. Many people are of opinion that this further extension is not required by the class affected by it, and it is a cogent argument, in legislating for a free people, that legislation should be desired by the class affected by it. Moreover, there is an opinion that entire closing in the five cities would not produce the beneficial social effects anticipated, but would lead to the spread of illicit indulgence and to the deterioration of home life. I think there is considerable doubt whether this Bill would lead to the results which the promoters claim. With every desire to be impartial, I shall reserve my views on this question until it is dealt with by an Irish Assembly. I say, upon the facts we have before us, it is not conclusive that this Bill is required, that there is any wish for it on the part of the particular class affected by it, that there is a preponderating majority of the Irish people in its favour, and that if adopted it would have the desired effect. As to referring this Bill to a Grand Committee, I join in opposing that step. The Bill is one of details, and not of principle, and it is one that ought to be dealt with by a Committee of the Whole House. If it were removed to a Grand Committee upstairs, Irish Members, beyond the 7 or 8 of them out of the 100 Members who are upon that Committee, would have no opportunity of dealing with it except on the Report stage, when a Member can only speak once. This proposal to refer the Bill to a Grand Committee is a novel one, and I warn the Government that the Report stage, if they carry out the proposal, will have to be used in such a way as to serve both the Committee and Report stages. I have heard it broached in this House that Scotch questions should be referred to Scotch Members, and I have heartily supported that view. But here is a proposal to withdraw a subject from the consideration of Irish Members which specially affects their constituents. If it is supposed that we will tamely submit to that insult, I can assure hon. Members they are mistaken. I hope the Government will re-consider their decision with regard to sending the Bill upstairs; that they will allow it to go to a Committee of the Whole House and not take the novel step of withdrawing from the purview of the Irish Members a subject which so closely interests them.

(4.35.) MR. PARNELL (Cork): I am glad to have an opportunity of joining my voice to the very able and eloquent protest which has just been delivered against this Bill, and the method proposed to be taken on the Second Reading on the part of its supporters, by the hon. Member for West Belfast, who represents an important Division of one of the five cities affected by this Bill. I wish to direct the attention of the House to a very important incident which has accompanied this Debate on the Second Reading. The Second Reading has been moved and seconded by Irish Members, but without waiting to hear the views or opinions of any single one of the Members representing at least four out of the five cities affected, or the opinion of the hon. Member for West Belfast, the two Front Benches have vied with each other in their alacrity to support the Second Reading of the measure. I am not surprised at the Chief Secretary taking that course; I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman has shown any inconsistency in supporting the Second Reading against the opinions of the Irish Members, because the right hon. Gentleman has throughout his tenure of office always firmly maintained that it is for the whole Imperial Parliament and the body of English Members to decide questions relating to any portion of Ireland, and that it is not for him to ascertain the opinions of Irish Members or of the Representatives of different interests in Ireland with reference to legislation that may be brought before the Imperial Parliament from time to time. But the two right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton—cannot plead the same excuse. They have always announced, at least in recent years, that they desire to hand over the duty of deciding on Irish questions to Irish

Members and an Irish Assembly. On a question of how much Irishmen should eat or drink, the right hon. Gentlemen surely might have shown their attachment to the principles they have so loudly proclaimed on so many English platforms, by waiting until they had heard the opinions of Irish Members, and especially the opinions of those who represent the cities affected by the Bill, before they rushed forward with that charming display of Liberal pharisaism in their attempts to make the Irish people sober by Act of Parliament. With regard to this question of sobriety, I waited to hear what is to be said for the shutting up of public houses on Sunday in Cork, and I have waited in vain; no statistics have been brought forward to show that there is any exceptional intemperance. On the contrary, the statistics show that the City of Cork is an unusually sober one; I understand that not one in 20,000 of the population are arrested for drunkenness on Sunday. No one would dare to propose such a measure as this for any English city, and surely English Liberals and Radicals, who have pledged themselves to the principle of Home Rule, and who denounce all English legislation for Ireland on the ground that it comes in a foreign garb, might have waited for some cases to be set up of exceptional intemperance before they support this Coercion Bill, for it is one. Is any case made out for doing for these Irish cities what would not be done in the case of any large English city? No attempt has ever been made to show in the case of these Irish towns that there is any exceptional drunkenness or crime arising out of intemperance. Therefore, it is fair to complain of the course taken by the two Front Benches in accepting the principle of the measure without waiting to hear a word from those Members representing the five cities most intimately concerned, and without waiting to hear the opinion of Irish Members generally. That Irish opinion has never been expressed upon the question except in a negative sense. I have searched the Divisions which have been taken during the present Parliament upon similar Bills. I searched the Division Lists of the present Parliament in connection with similar Bills, and I find that only an insignificant minority of the 105 Irish

Representatives ever voted in favour of the Second Readings, while only a very small fraction ever spoke in favour of those measures. My constituents have not instructed me on the question, but I am firmly persuaded that they are opposed to the Second Reading of the Bill. The Bill is one which will affect important trading interests in the cities concerned; and it will largely affect the habits and the comfort of the poorer classes; and before this Second Reading is jumped at by both the Front Benches, the Liberal Party should pause to ascertain the views of those concerned. Taking the Bill on its merits, I doubt very much whether it will effect its object. The Sunday Closing Act which was passed for Ireland in years gone by has not in the slightest degree diminished intemperance or the consumption of alcohol in Ireland. The Returns show an increase of intemperance since the Sunday Closing Act was passed, so that instead of diminishing it has increased drunkenness. This Bill is one of the many ways for meeting the evils of intemperance—one of the many nostrums brought forward by both Parties for dealing with intemperance in Ireland. One day it is a Bill for closing public houses every day in the week; another day it is a Bill for closing them on Saturday, and on the third occasion it is a Bill for Sunday closing, and yet again it is a Bill to set up what is called local option. This is one of the many proposals that have been made for the purpose of checking what is undoubtedly a great evil—the evil of intemperance. But I deny that the experience of the measure already in existence throughout the counties of Ireland has shown that it has tended to check the intemperance which undoubtedly does prevail in Ireland, and, perhaps, in a corresponding degree in England and Wales. Until it has been shown that any measure of success has attended the working of the existing measure throughout the rural districts, your case for extending such an exceptional Act of Parliament to the five large cities included in this Bill falls utterly to the ground. But if the Bill were ever so good, and under ordinary circumstances ever so likely to effect its object, yet, in all probability, you would find that you would be disappointed with the results, and painfully so. The measure would come to Ireland as one which has not been sought for by her Representatives in the first instance, and which certainly has not been sought for by her people. There has been almost an entire absence of Petitions with reference to it, and no pledges or declarations were sought for or obtained from Members on the subject at the General Elections of 1885 and 1886, or at any subsequent by-election. The Bill will come to Ireland as a patronising attempt on the part of the majority of the English Members in the House of Commons to make the Irish people sober. The Irish people will naturally say, "Make yourselves sober first." Why should this experiment be made upon the body of the Irish people? Perhaps on the principle of fiat experimentum in corpore vili. Anything is good enough for Ireland, no matter how doubtful its character. No doubt that is the view of the great majority of the Liberal Party in the House, but a measure conceived under such auspices is foredoomed to failure. The Irish people will naturally say this is a part of the insolent system to which we have been accustomed for so many years on the part of the English nation; and we decline to believe in our excessive drunkenness in comparison with our kind English friends. The Irish people will doubt the bona fides of this measure, and will do their best to circumvent it, as the measures in existence have already been circumvented. In some parts of Ireland there are people who obey the provisions of the Act by walking the requisite number of miles to constitute themselves bona fide travellers, merely for the purpose of defeating the law, and people thereby cultivate a taste for strong drink who would naturally shrink from entering the public houses of their own villages. Now, Sir, I wish to ask whether the House thinks that this is a Bill in reference to which Irish feeling should not be consulted? If this measure does not involve one of those questions on which Irish opinion ought to be heard what question could possibly come within that category? On what possible subject have Irish local claims and wishes a better right to be regarded than on the question before the House? It is all very well for hon. Members above the Opposition Gangway to pledge themselves to Home Rule and to the right of Ireland to make her own laws; but they seem to think that they absolve their consciences by cheering the hon. Member for West Belfast when he urges that the Bill should be referred to a purely Irish Committee. I cannot accept this as enough from men who know perfectly well that the proposal of the hon. Member for West Belfast has not the slightest chance of being accepted. If they wish to be consistent they should leave to Irishmen the settlement of this delicate question, which is surrounded by difficulties, and the solution of which would demand all that is best and most experienced in Irish public life, when the time comes for the Irish people to make their own laws in an Elective Assembly in Dublin. If hon. Members do not wish to prejudice this question beforehand by their meddlesome interference and bungling attempts to legislate in reference to the wants of people whom they cannot possibly understand, and in reference to a matter of which they are profoundly ignorant, then they will vote against the Second Reading of the Bill. If they believe that the time is near when Ireland will decide these questions for herself, if they believe their own platform declarations, they will vote against the Bill, knowing that no time will be lost by leaving the consideration and settlement of the question to the Parliament which we all hope to see soon established in Dublin.

(4.59.) MR. M. HEALY (Cork): I do not intend to assist the opponents of this Bill, and to prevent the House from coming to a decision upon it. I only rise for the purpose of assuring the House that neither on this nor on any other public question does the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down represent the City of Cork. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to test the truth of my words let him keep the promise which he made to his constituents.

*(5.0.) SIR J. M'KENNA (Monaghan, S.): I wish to point out with regard to what has been said, and in reference to the relative sobriety of the Irish and Scotch people, that it has been shown by the published Returns that although the population of Scotland is 1,000,000 less than that of Ireland, the consumption of whisky in Scotland exceeds that of Ireland by 1,000,000 gallons. I believe the weight of evidence goes to show that most of the people of Ireland are opposed to the increased restrictions proposed by this legislation.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): No.

*SIR J. M'KENNA: I refer to the proposed closing of public houses in the five large cities where now several hours trade is permitted on Sundays. Those residing in large communities wish to have an opportunity of meeting one another in social intercourse for a few hours on Sundays, as well as, or perhaps more than, on other days. If you are going to force Sunday closing on the large towns in Ireland, why do you not enforce it on the large cities and towns in England? I think the votes of the Metropolitan Members on this question will be very closely watched by their constituents. I believe that if this drastic legislation is carried it will actually tend to defeat the object aimed at, and that the consumption of ardent spirits will be increased instead of being diminished, as in the case of Scotland, to which I have referred.

(5.4.) MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): In the earlier days of this movement I was in favour of a Bill such as this, and I allowed Mr. Biggar to put my name on the back of one. I am one of those who can distinguish between drink and drunkenness. There are many classes of intemperance, and some of the language I listened to a few minutes ago did not impress me as being temperate. I hold that this is a matter which might very well be left to an Irish Parliament for decision. If the Radicals and Liberals above the Gangway are so anxious to give us Home Rule let them leave this question to the Irish. It is purely an Irish question, and I do not see why the people of England should be so desperately solicitous about the welfare of the Irish, or about the amount of drinking that goes on there. Their anxiety altogether surpasses my comprehension. I know one thing, and that is, that there is more drinking in the City of London than in all Ireland. Why do not you start this machinery for Sunday closing in your own enlightened city? Why do you not set us the example? How can you expect us to accept it unless you do? Again, in London there is more crime resulting from drink than there would be in Ireland even if its population were twice as large as it is. Some of those who are in favour of passing this Bill are Coercionists in more senses than one. They always vote for coercion of every description. They say that drunkenness ought to be abated. But this Bill will not abate it. I will tell you what it will do. It will lead to a larger amount of illicit distillation. To that I have no objection. In my own constituency we make our own whisky sometimes, despite the gaugers and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We look upon that as a method of shutting off, to some extent, some of that English tribute, every halfpenny of which we grudge. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was perfectly right in his Home Rule Bill to make a net through which this money should pass. I am not in favour of any money getting through the net. I think we have sent a larger amount of money to England through the Customs and Excise than we ought to have done. I am not in favour of the Bill, because it restricts the already restricted liberties of the Irish people, and I shall vote against it. I hope the Bill will not be carried by the votes of English and Scotch Members. I am entirely ignorant on many English and Scotch affairs, and I do not vote upon them unless I know the feeling of the majority of the people in the district. I see that not one-half of the Irish Representatives are here to-day. Can it, then, be said that this is a burning Irish question? Surely if it were it would have been possible to secure a larger attendance. I shall go into the Lobby against this measure. I say that in a dying Parliament such as this—a Parliament bereft of authority from the country—there is no right to legislate on a matter of this kind. It ought to be left to a future Parliament—English, if you will; but Irish, as I hope it will be. If Radicals and Liberals believe in an Irish Parliament, then this is one of the first measures which might be submitted by temperance reformers to such an Assembly. I am in favour of so submitting it. I am not in favour of legislating here for Ireland against the interest of the only trade you have not destroyed. You have destroyed our industries; this is the only trade which survives, and it does so, I suppose, because it is a spirit. Men who earn large salaries of course would not be affected by the Bill, but it is the poor man who will suffer.

*(5.14.) SIR C. RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): The hon. Member who last spoke began by informing the House he had endorsed the principle of a former Bill of this nature by allowing his name to be placed on the back of it, and I do not gather that he has stated any clear reason for having changed his attitude on the subject. The hon. Member for Cork, who first addressed the House as the Representative of that constituency, spoke of what he designated the hasty, inconsiderate course adopted by the two Front Benches in supporting this Bill, without first taking care to ascertain the opinion of the Irish Representatives. He levelled the reproach particularly at the Front Opposition Bench. But he appears to have made those observations in some temper, and in entire forgetfulness of the whole history of this question. The hon. Member spoke as if this question had not been discussed in past years and in previous Parliaments. He appears to have forgotten that this is a question which has almost an ancient history, and that the progress of the discussion of this question has shown not only that there was at the outset a strong body of Irish opinion in favour of a measure of this kind, but that the volume of that opinion has been increasing as the discussion has gone on. The Committee appointed in 1888 consisted altogether of 15 Members, and the majority (eight) were Irish Representatives. That Committee arrived at the conclusions embodied in the Bill before the House, that the Act of 1878 should be made perpetual, and extended to the five cities now exempted from its operation. When the question came up in Parliament last year, what was the state of the Irish representation on this point? Altogether there were 42 Irish Members who voted on that occasion, 28 for the Bill, and 14 against. In those circumstances, what warrant has the hon. Member for Cork for saying that that was not a fair proportional representation of the opinion in Ireland on the subject, or that there will be a larger proportional adverse vote on the present occasion? I have, of course, no authority to speak for right hon. 'Gentlemen opposite; but I am empowered to say, on behalf of the Front Opposition Bench, that it is in view of the growth of Irish opinion on the question that my right hon. Friends have taken the part in the Debate of which the hon. Member for Cork complained.

Mr. LEA rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put," but Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

(5.20.) MR. J. G. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I am always glad to listen to recommendations by the hon. and learned Member who has just sat down, because ever since I have known anything about him I have regarded him as what, indeed, he is—a friend of Ireland. But I think that even he in his calmer moments would not assert that 28 out of 105 Irish Members showed a fair representation of Irish opinion in favour of this Bill, or such a representation as to justify this House in carrying a Bill on an exclusively Irish topic. From the speeches to which we have listened for the last two hours one would infer that the future destinies of Ireland were in a very short time indeed to be confided to the dozen water drinkers of Cork who assemble in the back rooms of that City to listen to the orations of the junior Member. The hon. Member certainly does represent the views to an exceedingly limited extent, as I know personally, of the citizens generally of the City of Cork. I have a good deal of knowledge of the city, and I never heard yet that its trade and commerce were confided to the tender care of the junior Member for Cork. Besides, Sir, this is not a matter merely affecting Cork; it relates to Ireland generally. There is little trade or commerce in Ireland, and I am at a loss to know why a certain section of politicians in the House should introduce a Bill to restrict the only prosperous trade that the country has. Although I am an advocate for temperance, I am not desirous that the people of this country should attempt to "soberise" the people of Ireland before they have "soberised" themselves. Again, I do not believe the effect of the Bill would be to soberise the people. There is another objection to which I attach great importance. If the Bill were passed its operation would be confided to people who are particularly obnoxious to some of my political friends—to the police of Ireland. It would be used as a political weapon against political opponents; it would be used to persecute objectionable persons. I think the question should be left to that Legislative Assembly which will soon be created in Dublin to manage the internal affairs of Ireland.

(5.26.) MR. PINKERTON (Galway): It seems, from the course of the Debate, that the hon. Member for Cork and his supporters think that "the English wolves" are suffering from hydrophobia.

(5.27.) Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 248; Noes 94.—(Div. List, No. 132.)

(5.45.) The House divided:—Ayes 276; Noes 31.—(Div. List, No. 133.)

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 16th April, 1891.

REPRESENTATIVE PEERS FOR IRELAND.

Lord Teignmouth (Claim to vote for Representative Peers for Ireland)—Ordered and directed, That a Certificate be sent by the Clerk of the Parliaments to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland, stating that the Lord Chancellor of the United Kingdom has reported to the House of Lords that the right of the Lord Teignmouth to vote at the elections of Representative Peers for Ireland has been established to the satisfaction of him the said Lord Chancellor; and that the House of Lords has ordered such Report to be sent to the said Clerk of the Crown in Ireland: And it is hereby also Ordered, That the said Report of the said Lord Chancellor be sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland.

The Lord Ebury—took the Oath.

PROTECTION OF MARRIED WOMEN.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*THE EARL OF WINCHILSEA: I beg to ask the Lord Chancellor a question, of which I have given him private notice—whether his attention has been called to statements by certain Magistrates that, in consequence of the decision in what is known as the Clitheroe abduction case, they will no longer make Separation Orders, or otherwise interfere for the protection of married women; whether the law as laid down in that case has really such an effect as those statements seem to import; and, if so, whether the Government will propose legislation on the subject?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: In reply to the noble Lord's questions, I beg to say that I have not myself seen the statements of Magistrates which he mentions; and I should be very unwilling to think any such reports could be accurate, and that any Magistrates could have given utterance to the statements attributed to them. Nothing, to my mind, could be more inappropriate or inconsistent with the demeanour which becomes persons in judicial positions than to make general statements beforehand as to their views on classes of cases which may come before them; and I should be reluctant to attribute to any Magistrate, on the authority of a newspaper only, a view of the law laid down in the case referred to so erroneous as almost to appear perverse. The Court of Appeal released, by their order, a person whom they held to be in unlawful custody. As to legislation, therefore, as the noble Lord sees, there is only one point to be dealt with—whether or not a man may imprison his wife. I am sure that the Government will not propose a Bill to enable a man to imprison his wife, and I should not myself personally be able to give such a measure my support. If they did bring in such a Bill, the facts published in the recent application for a habeas corpus would not, I think, be likely to assist them in passing it.

LORD ESHER: My Lords, as I was a party to the judgment, which seems to have been more misunderstood than any judgment I recollect, I, perhaps, may be excused from making an observation. It was urged before the Court of Appeal that by the law of England a husband may beat his wife with a stick no bigger than his thumb if she refuses to obey him, and that if a wife refused her husband conjugal rights, whatever that phrase may mean, which I have never been able to make out, he may imprison her until she restores him conjugal rights, or satisfies him that she will. All that the Court of Appeal decided was that a husband cannot by the law of England, if the wife objects, lawfully do either of those things. Those intelligent people who have declared that the judgment is wrong must be prepared to maintain the converse, namely, that if a wife disobeys her husband he may lawfully beat her; and if she refuses him a restitution of conjugal rights he may imprison her, as it was urged, in the cellar or in the cupboard, or, if the house is large, in the house by locking her in it and blocking the windows. I thought, and still think, that the law does not allow these things. The intelligent objectors say that by so holding we made a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights a farce, so that it is a farce to grant it; and that a Magistrate ought not, or even cannot, give a protection order to a wife. They may rest assured that the Court did not hold any such nonsense. If there is a difficulty in enforcing a decree of restitution of conjugal rights it is caused by the Legislature, which lately took from the Divorce Court the power of imprisoning a wife for contempt for refusing to obey such a decree. But—perhaps it may appear absurd to the intelligent critics—we did not think that, by taking away from the Court a power which the Legislature thought was oppressive and unnecessary, the Legislature meant to give to the husband the power of perpetual imprisonment which it took away from the Court. We thought, and I still think, that the Judge of the Divorce Court may grant a decree, and the Magistrates may make an order, and that they need not attribute to the Court of Appeal decisions which, if they had read the Judgment, they would probably have seen that the Court of Appeal did not arrive at. I cannot see that the critics have reason to find fault with the decision of the Court of Appeal, which, begging their pardon, I venture to think was perfectly right.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: My Lords, this Bill has been introduced after a great deal of consideration for the purpose of dealing with certain troubles and difficulties in the working of the present law of marriage. The complaints which I get in very great numbers from the clergy of this diocese, and which I have heard also from the clergy of other dioceses, are that they are put into great difficulties by the rules which they have to obey. They are obliged, in many cases, to make inquiries, which in the present state of things it is practically almost impossible for them to make, and they are subject to exceedingly severe penalties under the Acts bearing upon the subject if they cannot prove that they have made sufficient inquiry in any case where the law has been broken. It is quite true that the Courts in their interpretation of the Acts have always, as they naturally would, done their best to protect the clergy where there has been no intention to disobey the law; but still, for all that, the clergy are placed in a very difficult position; and in certain cases of breach of the law, in consequence of the difficulties that they find in obeying its provisions, are liable to 14 years' transportation for celebrating marriages where, as far as they could see, everything was quite right, but where, in reality, some serious impediment existed. The banns are now put in three Sundays before the marriage, and those who put them in are required to state their residence to be in the clergyman's parish. In the vast number of cases the residence is merely nominal, and the clergy have very little chance of being able to ascertain whether it is real or not. Practically the law is evaded in hundreds and hundreds of cases, and, meanwhile, as matters stand, the clergy are often involved in serious trouble and perplexity. Besides this, there is constant discontent on the part of the laity at the restraints which are put upon them at present in the matter of choosing in what churches they shall be married. They very often feel that those restraints are very unreasonable indeed. A man, for instance, living in a district parish in London, and probably not knowing exactly what is the boundary of his own parish, but worshipping at some church in the district near him, not within his own parish, finds to his great surprise that he is not allowed to marry in the church where he has always worshipped. As far as he can see there is no reason whatever why he should not be married in the church where he usually worships and where he is generally known, or why he should be compelled to be married in some church where he does not usually attend, and where nobody knows anything about him. The laity further complain that their right of being married in the Mother Church of a large parish which has been divided has now been taken away, and they cannot get married in the Mother Church where their fathers and mothers have been married before them. They look upon these things as great hardships, and the hardships are felt the more because they see no particular public good that is done by insisting upon, and no necessity for, such restraints. Though the matters which are the subject of those complaints may not seem to some persons to be of any very great consequence, yet they do cause a great deal of friction, and much annoyance to the clergy. Undoubtedly these restraints cause exceeding discomfort, because it is very hard for any clergyman when he really desires to obey the law to be quite sure that he sees exactly how the law is to be obeyed. Besides those, there are cases which need special provision, namely, those where persons are not living in any parish at all, but in boats upon canals and rivers, or on board ship; and it is desirable that their cases should be dealt with upon some regular system. It is also felt to be a great evil that the marriage fees at present required in the churches should be so much larger than those which are charged in a Registrar's office. The result of that is that there is a growing tendency towards giving up marriage in the church, and substituting marriage at a Registrar's office for the solemn ceremony which Christians ought certainly to undergo upon the celebration of their marriage. The Bill proposes to deal with all these matters. It has been very carefully considered, and it is hoped that the provisions of the Bill will remove a great deal of the present trouble, and make the law of marriage, as far as marriage in church is concerned, very much clearer than it was before. I need not say anything about Sections 1, 2, and 3, which practically only repeat the present law; but the 4th section empowers parties to be married in any church of the diocese in which the banns have been published, and does not confine the marriage to the precise church in which the publication of the banns has been made. It thus gives a very large extension of liberty. There does not appear in these days of rapid communication to be any reason for restricting the marriage to the place where the banns have been published, and certainly anything which allows greater freedom in this respect will be a boon to the laity, and will I think tend to encourage marriages taking place in church very much more than hitherto. In the 5th clause it is proposed to deal with seamen by recognising for this purpose a church or chapel in the parish in which the man usually lives, that it shall be treated as if he was there living, even though he may not be residing in the place at the time when the banns are published. But it is the 6th clause which most effectually protects the clergyman, because he will have the power of requiring from the parties desiring to be married a declaration as to various particulars similar to that which is now required at the Registrar's office. There does not seem to be any reason why the Registrar should, and the clergyman should not, be allowed to ask questions which have to be answered on pain of punishment. If a man is to be married at a Registrar's office he is required to answer those questions, and there seems to be no reason why, if he is to be married in a church, it should be left to the clergyman to find out, if he possibly can, what the law requires. In a large number of cases it is simply impossible for him to do so, and this section provides that he shall be put on the same footing as a Registrar. Sections 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 provide for marriages by licence instead of by banns. There is nothing very peculiar in them. They confer the same liberty upon the persons desiring to be married as is given when the marriage is to be by banns. In the case of seamen the fact that a man is on board his ship is to be recognised as if he were residing in the diocese where he gets the licence; and if he comes on shore to be married he can get the licence exactly as if he had been all the time living in the parish. There does not seem to be any reason why he should not have that liberty granted to him. There are special provisions in Clauses 11 and 12 which I do not think I need speak further about, with regard to the sending of notices of the marriage of persons residing in canal or river boats. By Clause 13 it is proposed to effect great changes in the fees for performing marriages by making them the same for marriages in church as in the Registrar's office. This is, of course, a considerable change, and it is likely that in many cases the clergy may lose something by it. The 14th is a mere protective clause. The 15th is more important, inasmuch as it puts a false statement made to a clergyman on the same level as a false statement or declaration made in the Registrar's office.

The other clauses are nothing more than formal or consequential. This Bill, it will be seen at once, seriously affects the clergy, and therefore it is right to say that it has been very carefully considered, both by the clergy in the Diocese of London generally, who are the most seriously affected by it, and also by the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury. It has also been considered by the Convocation of the Province of York. In the diocese of London the clergy—the vast majority, about nine to one—are strongly in favour of fixing the marriage fees at the same rate throughout for marriages in church as in the Registrar's office, and the Lower House of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury have accepted the proposal, though not unanimously, yet by a very large majority indeed. So that I think I may assure the House that I am representing the wishes of the clergy in proposing that such a change as this should be made. The whole Bill, I may say, has the approval of both Houses of Convocation of the Province, and I submit it therefore to the House, not merely as a Bill of my own, but as one which is, speaking generally, backed up by all the authority of the Church. I do not question that the measure may not require very careful consideration, and perhaps a good deal of amendment in Committee. A Bill of this sort is sure to require very careful revision, especially by lawyers, to put it in proper form, and it has not yet received perhaps that full consideration by lawyers which it ought to have before it is passed into an Act. Therefore I expect that in the Standing Committee, if it is referred to the Standing Committee, as I rather hope it will be, there will be a good deal of criticism on details, which, for my part, I shall very heartily welcome, because I think it is of the greatest importance that a measure of this sort should be made thoroughly workable. So far as it can be considered outside the House I think it has been fairly considered. It has been before the clergy, as I have explained, both in Convocation and generally all over England, and I may say that I have particularly brought it before the clergy of the diocese of London. It has been before them for two years, and therefore there can be no question that those who are most particularly concerned in the matter have had the fullest opportunity of considering the effect of it. I now ask your Lordships to give the Bill a Second Reading.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: My Lords, I quite agree with the main object of the Bill, and I have very little to say in the way of criticism of it here. As the right rev. Prelate says, there are details which will have to be attended to, and in Committee the lawyers may, as he says, be able to point out certain matters for which provision will have to be made, which even the two Convocations have not discovered. One of the objects aimed at by the Bill, which, indeed, the right rev. Prelate very properly put first, it is certainly desirable should be effected, and he might, I think, have gone a little further than he did when he said that people are unable to see the necessity for the present restriction or that any public good is done by it in regard to people being married in any church of the place where they live, because that difficulty was really never intended. The difficulty in people being married in any such church is generally considered to have arisen from a mistake in the Act of 18 & 19 Vict., commonly called Lord Blandford's Act, in which there was a provision that where a new parish was created it was to be an ecclesiastical one for all purposes; and that has been decided to cut off the connection with the old parish church completely. I have always heard that the authors of the Bill, and those who supported it, had no intention of so cutting off the new districts, and the people living within them, entirely from their old parish church. I happen to know that people do resent that very much, and that, whether they are in the habit of going to that parish church or not, they are very angry at it. I merely wished to add that as a supplement to what the right rev. Prelate has said. With regard to the publishing of banns, I may mention at once that the Bill seems to me very imperfect in that respect, unless it is intended that new Parliamentary rubrics should never be followed by those who have the printing of them. Looking at the Prayer Book, and the rubrics in it, one at the end of the Nicene Creed, and two others in the marriage service itself, they seem to have become very wrong. The original ones were entirely supplanted by the Act of George IV., which is referred to here, and somehow or other the Queen's [printers, or somebody else, whoever may be responsible, took upon themselves to make new rubrics. And they were, at any rate, understood wrongly by the clergy for a long time, until a judicial decision was given upon them. Baron Alderson had to try a case in which those points were involved, and after he had pointed out where the clergy were wrong the practice became different. The old rubric after the Nicene Creed, which is referred to here, said that notices of banns and sundry other things were to be published then, and there was no provision for there being no morning service with that creed. Thereupon provision was made in the Act of George IV. that where there was no morning service banns should be published at the evening service after the Second Lesson, but the Universities and the Queen's Printer printed the new rubrics so ambiguously that that was not generally understood. Besides that, nobody had a legal right to alter them at all, even to accord with the Act. The question is whether we ought to allow the Bill to remain in the form in which it is now, leaving the same kind of practice to be gone through again. I cannot help thinking that we had better make the Bill complete, or at any rate give to the proper persons authority to make the rules correct. Of course we might make them so ourselves, but I think it would be better to give the proper authorities power to authorise new rubrics to be printed. When I mentioned that, I was answered as I knew I should be, that the Convocation would insist that they only had a right to alter the rubrics. It is quite true that in 1662, when the whole Prayer Book was modified a very little from the previous one, the matter was referred to the Convocations to give their opinions upon it, but Parliament was not the least bound to accept them even as to doctrine or ritual, and a fortiori not on marriages. Nor did they make any material alteration from those rubrics of the second Prayer Book of Edward VI., until 1824. This claim of Convocation is an entirely new one. Parliament has never regarded it as right, and Parliament has altered every marriage rubric and canon that has existed. But now, 60 years very nearly after the great Act of George IV., Convocations are waking up on the point, and putting in a claim to meddle with rubrics not affecting matters of Church ritual or anything of that kind, but about the purely lay matter of marriage. I call it a purely lay matter for this reason: Long ago, no less a person than Lord Hardwicke said in one of his decisions, that, although the laws affecting marriage are, in a sense, ecclesiastical, Convocations have never been allowed to meddle with them. In 1874 both Lord Salisbury and Lord Selborne on the Public Worship Regulation Bill laid down the same thing very emphatically, that Convocation has never been allowed to meddle with any matter of jurisdiction. Therefore, I say at once now, this is not a mere matter of detail to be dealt with in Committee. Assuming, then, that these rubrics are to be referred to somebody to amend, the question is who it should be. We are making the law, not the Convocations, who have nothing to do with it. But I think both your Lordships and the clergy will think that may well be left to the two Archbishops to do, with, of course, the consent of the Crown. Having said that, I turn to another object of the Bill. It is quite true, as the right rev. Prelate has said, and as great Judges have said, that clergymen might be subjected to very considerable penalties if they did not happen to have made inquiries which every sensible man knows must be utterly futile and impossible; and if it is intended that clergymen should know whom they marry, it is of course desirable to give them the proper means of making the necessary inquiries. As the law stands at the present, less inquiry is required to be made in putting up banns than either for granting licences or for solemnising marriage at or from a Registrar's office. That is a matter which should be attended to. Certainly, I am in favour of modifying the declaration so as not to tempt persons to go and be married for the sake of cheapness in a Registrar's office, but there are two ways of doing that. Assuming it is right that the clergy should know that the persons they are going to marry have a right to be married by them, it does not at all follow that inquisitorial powers should be given to ask questions of no legal importance whatever. I think the man who drafted this Bill and its schedules must have been thinking of his catechism, for it directs the clergyman to begin with "What is your name?" Then the next is—not "Who gave you this name?" but—"Where do you reside in this parish?" It is not even "Do you reside in this parish?" That has been omitted. Why that omission was made I do not know; but if the thing is to be made homogenous the first question ought to be, "Do you reside in this parish; and if so, where?" I quite agree that if the clergy really are responsible for the residence of the parties, no doubt they ought to have the means of ascertaining it, or, at least, that the responsibility should be thrown on the parties themselves; but this Bill goes far beyond that. They are to ask, "How long have you resided there?" What business is that of the clergy? And it is not necessary because a man cannot get either a licence granted or banns put up without making a false declaration. Then the next question is—"What is your age?" Well, we have just been answering that question all of us for the Census, and I do not know why a lady should be obliged, under penalties for a misdemeanour, to put down a different age to that which she has put down in her Census paper. The Act of George IV., after a great deal of experience had been gained, entirely altered the canon upon that subject: the canon prohibited the clergy from marrying anybody under age; the Act of George IV., for reasons which I cannot investigate now, threw the onus the other way, and left parents to forbid the banns, I suppose because it was recognised that the old law was unsatisfactory. If the father and mother of a person under age choose to forbid the banns they can do so, though what follows in that case I do not know. People know that they can go to the parish clerk, and put down in the book "A. B" and "C. D." as they please, and if the banns are to be made a reality they ought to be made consistent. If you do not desire to frighten the people into the Registrar's offices for the purpose of getting married you ought not to put inquisitorial questions to them, such as

"What is your age?" It must be remembered, too, that after a few years the reading of what may be called the Registrar's banns at a meeting of the Guardians of the poor was abolished, and so the Registrar's Office is a far more secret place than the Church, where banns are published before a large congregation. Then the next question is a very queer one to address to people—"Are you a blood relation?" What is that to the clergyman? And it is absurd, because everybody is a blood relation of everybody else. Assuming the clergy to be anxious to carry out the law, it is quite sufficient for them to ascertain that the persons coming to them to be married are not within the prohibited degrees, and I quite agree with the right rev. Prelate that the law ought to prescribe the means of ascertaining that. Curiously enough, there is provision made for it in almost every case except that of banns. When a person goes to the Registrar's office he is warned that if he declares falsely he is liable to a penalty, and if he gets a licence from a surrogate he must swear it. The fact is, all this is an attempt of the clergy to edge in inquiries about matters which they have nothing whatever to do with. Lately, many of us, no doubt, have been reading Newman's Letters, and there we find that the clerical attempt to make laws of their own as to whom they should allow to be married was started by Newman nearly 60 years ago, when he refused to marry a couple because one of them had not been baptised! They were poor people, and could not fight the case, and Newman had his way. Another case is recorded in the law books, within quite modern times, of a clergyman refusing to marry a couple because one of them had not been confirmed. Unluckily, the prosecution of the clergyman was defeated by a technicality; but there are sufficient warnings against our allowing any such clerical inquisition. So long as clergymen are acting entirely as the officers of the State in these matters they are within their rights, but the moment they go beyond that and claim to put the inquisitorial questions which the Bill proposes, I am sure that two things will follow; in the first place they will wreck the Bill, and in the next if they do not they will frighten people from the churches into the Registry offices. John Stokes goes to a clergyman and asks to have banns of marriage put up; and he is at once asked, "What is your age?" Naturally he will reply, "Why should I tell you my age?" Then "Are you a blood relation of your intended wife?" He will say, "What is that to you, so long as we are not within the unlawful degrees?" Then he is asked sundry other things, and presently says—"I am not going to be bothered in this way; I shall go to the Registry office and get married there." People have a right to resent inquisitiveness of this kind. Therefore, I say, these are not mere matters of detail which can be dealt with in Committee, but matters of principle. If I wait until the Bill goes to the Grand Committee I shall be told that they are matters which the Grand Committee cannot consider. There are other minor matters to which attention might be called. I do not know whether it is intended to introduce a new, or an American, clerical aggression on the English language for the word "licence," but all through this Bill it is spelled with an "s," and in all my experience the noun has been spelled with "c," and the verb with an "s." I will trouble your Lordships no further at the present stage beyond saying that I shall be most happy to give the right rev. Prelate all the assistance I can in making the Bill a really good one, and in putting it in a form in which it will not be likely to suffer through anything objectionable in the way I have suggested.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday, the 24th instant.

MIDDLESEX REGISTRY BILL—(No. 87.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: This is a Bill which comes from the Commons. It is understood that arrangements have been made for vacancies occurring in the Middlesex Registry. Practically the Bill is to drive into the coffers of the State certain revenue received at the Registry. It has come up from the Commons without Amendment, and the question I have to ask your Lordships is simply whether it should now be read a second time.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

CENTRAL LONDON RAILWAY BILL (by Order.)

As amended, considered.

(3.10.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I have to apologise for the absence of the hon. Member for North St. Pancras (Mr. T. H. Bolton), who is prevented by illness from being present, and I beg to move the Amendments to this Bill which stand on the Paper in my hon. Friend's name. They all relate to Clause 91, and they refer to the workmen's trains which this company proposes to run by electricity from Shepherd's Bush to the City. The circumstances of the case are referred to in a written statement which was sent out yesterday by the promoters of the Bill in support of the decision of the Committee to which the Bill was referred. As the scheme was introduced, it was at first intended that there should be only one working men's train in the morning and another in the evening, but it was afterwards proposed that there should be two before 7 o'clock in the morning. The Committee have altered that arrangement, and have inserted a clause making statutable the running of three workmen's trains each morning before 7 o'clock, and the same number every evening after 6 o'clock, at a charge of 1d. for each journey, for artisans, mechanics, and dock labourers. I have no objection to offer to the amount of the fare; but I have to propose that the term "daily labourer" shall be altered to "weekly labourer," so that it may include porters, messengers, and persons engaged in similar occupations. I further propose that the hour in the morning shall be extended from 7 to 8 o'clock. People of this class are essentially working men, although they do not commence work as early as 6 or 7 o'clock in the morning. They are messengers and underclerks in the City warehouses, who commence work after 8 o'clock, and book the arrival and sending out of goods. They receive weekly, and not daily, wages, but they are equally necessitous with the persons provided for by the present clause. The first Amendment I have to move is that, instead of only three workmen's trains being run each day, there shall be six. At first sight it may seem that this would be a statutable imposition upon the company, which is not imposed upon any other company, and the company in their statement say that the clause already inserted in the Bill by the Committee goes far beyond any similar obligation imposed upon any other railway by Parliament. I beg to dispute that statement, because the trains which the company propose to provide are very short trains, and are incapable of holding anything like the number of persons who can travel in a train of the Great

Mr. J. Stuart

Eastern Railway. According to Returns now before the House, a workman's train on various London railways is capable of carrying from 500 to 600 passengers, whereas the trains of this company will only carry 120 or 150 third-class passengers at the most. The consequence is, that the carrying obligation imposed on them is nothing like that which is imposed upon other railways. The statement of the promoters says that with the single exception of the Great Eastern trains between Liverpool Street and Edmonton, which cover a distance of nine miles, there is no case in which Parliament has imposed upon a Railway Company the obligation of carrying a third-class passenger for so long a distance as six miles for a penny. That is scarcely accurate, because I believe that on the South London lines statutory obligations exist which cover more than six miles. It is said that in compelling the company to run six trains instead of three, we should impose obligations upon the company for which they would have no compensating advantage; but I wish to point out that the company are paying to the inhabitants of London, either individually or collectively, nothing whatever for the tunnelling rights they are to enjoy. I am aware that the clause has been struck out which permitted them to tunnel without paying compensation, but the question of compensation is left to be raised by individual owners under the clauses of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. That Act will be wholly inoperative because, as the tunnelling will be under Oxford Street, there can be no documents in existence, seeing that it is one of the oldest streets in England, or probably in the world, which confer upon individuals the ownership of the soil. The result is, that that clause will confer no advantage upon the public either individually or collectively. It is said that the company will have to pay rates, but all other railways are in the same position. Mr. Pearson, the City Solicitor, was the first person to propose an underground railway in London—the Metropolitan—and it was distinctly urged as an inducement in favour of legislation that the public were to get the benefit of the street improvements, which were to be associated with the construction of the railway as a compensation for the use of the soil. About £250,000 was, I believe, paid for the right of tunnelling under the Thames Embankment.

*MR. ISAACS (Newington, Walworth): £200,000.

MR. J. STUART: I am obliged for the correction of the hon. Member. The present railway is absolved from any such contribution to the public benefit, although other railways have had to pay it. On these grounds I think the company are fairly called upon to give more extended advantages to the public than have been decided by the Select Committee, and I beg to move the first of the Amendments which stand in the name of my hon. Friend.

Amendment proposed, in page 72, line 25, to leave out the word "three," in order to insert the word "six."—(Mr. James Stuart.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'three' stand part of the Bill."

(3.20.) MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to second the Amendment, which I look upon as a very reasonable extension. I am sorry that the Committee upstairs have seen fit to draw a distinction between working men who are paid by daily and by weekly wages. A great number of the clerks, messengers, and others in London who are paid weekly are in the same position as the artisans and labourers who work for a daily wage, but it would be impossible for them to take advantage of trains which run before 7 o'clock in the morning. Many of the warehouses and offices in the City are not open until 10, and every facility for cheap travelling should be afforded to these men, whose wages, or salaries as they are sometimes called, are scarcely equal to those of an artisan. If they are required to go to the City by a very early train, the only result will be that they will reach there before the offices or warehouses are open. I therefore think that the number of trains should be extended, and that they should run at a later hour.

(3.22.) MR. BARRAN (York, W.R., Otley): I am sorry that the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury), who acted as Chairman of the Select Committee, is not here to explain the circumstances under which the Committee decided to grant these workmen's trains. The Committee had the advice of Mr.

Courtenay Boyle, who has had large experience in connection with the Metropolitan Railways, and it was at his suggestion that the Committee imposed on the company the necessity of running three trains every morning and every night. The hon. Member for Hoxton (Mr. Stuart) has stated that the trains on this line will be limited in their carrying power in consequence of the line being worked by electricity; but if that argument is to weigh at all, it must necessarily tell in favour of the company in the consideration of this Amendment, because if they are only able to carry a very small number of passengers, seeing the enormous expense they will be put to in making the line, it will be much more difficult for them to realise a profit in consequence of their limited carrying power. The Committee, in dealing with the Bill, had to consider the enormous cost the company will be put to in carrying out their project. Even if they get the land without cost, and have no compensation to pay, the cost of constructing the line will be enormously heavy. So far as the granting of workmen's trains is concerned, this company has agreed to grant more than any existing Railway Company. There can be no doubt that the construction of the railway will materially reduce the congestion of traffic in Oxford Street and the City; but if we are to load the company with obligations and restrictions which are unbearable, the probability is, that the line will never be made at all. I hope the House will support the decision of the Select Committee.

*(3.25.) MR. ISAACS: I wish to explain what was done in the case of the District Railway with reference to contributions from public sources. A sum of £200,000 was paid by the company for the right to tunnel under the Embankment, while in the case of the City lines a grant of £800,000 was made to the company by the public. It is easy to get the reputation of being a friend of the working classes by dipping your hand into other people's pockets. That is what the hon. Gentleman proposes in effect to do. The obligation to send three workmen's trains each way per day over the line is as much as the company can be reasonably expected to undertake. It must not be forgotten that the trains which will travel one way full will invariably return empty. I hope the House will support the Committee, especially after what has been said by the hon. Gentleman opposite, who was one of the Members of that Committee.

(3.30.) MR. GILES (Southampton): Assuming that each train has to run six miles for fares of 1d., a full load of 500 passengers would only bring in a little over £2, while the cost of running the train would be quite as great, without any other expense whatever. I think that if the working classes of London get the privilege of three trains in the morning and three at night they will get all that they can reasonably expect from the company. I hope, therefore, that the House will reject the proposal to increase the number of trains.

(3.32.) MR. GANE (Leeds, E.): I think that before the House adds to what is already an extraordinary burden some good reason should be shown. I have every sympathy with the motive of the hon. Member, but I hope the House will not accept the proposal. If the Committee upstairs, in considering the matter, had fallen short of the real requirements of the working classes the House might be fairly asked to interpose, but I believe that what they have done is really in excess of anything that has been previously done. If the House is to compel the company to run six workmen's trains daily, I see no reason why they should not make it 20 or 50.

(3.35.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I do not propose to enter into the details of this Bill, but I would only suggest that it is impossible for the House with any self-respect to come to a decision in this matter which is at variance with the decision of the Committee. The question has been carefully considered by the Committee with all the evidence before them, and with the assistance of an eminent and experienced official of the Board of Trade. Why, then, should we depart from the decision of the Committee merely upon a statement that cannot be submitted to cross-examination? I hope the House will reject the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. J. STUART: I now move, in line 28, to leave out "seven" and insert

Mr. Isaacs

"eight." The object of the Amendment is to change, from 7 to 8, the hour at which working men's trains shall run. I believe that this change would be for the convenience of the workpeople who are not required at their places of business before 8 o'clock. There are a very large number of persons who are in this position, and whose wages do not exceed those of the daily labourer and the artisan. My only desire is to make the clause useful to all these persons. It is desirable for the health and comfort of London that persons of this class should live in the suburbs, and a provision of this kind will assist them in doing so.

Amendment proposed, in page 72, line 28, to leave out the word "seven," in order to insert the word "eight."—(Mr. James Stuart.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'seven' stand part of the Bill."

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I agree with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney) that the Bill has been fully inquired into by a Select Committee, and I trust in the interest and safety of the public that the House will not make this alteration.

(3.37.) MR. BARRAN: I hope the House will not attempt to alter the hour, which is the same as that which is fixed in other Acts of Parliament. Not a word was said before the Committee as to the injustice or otherwise of the proposal. The Committee were anxious to meet, as far as possible, the necessities of the working classes; but if we are to extend the advantages already conceded to other classes, where are we to draw the line? How far and how often are we to enable general passengers to travel on a railway at little cost to themselves, but at very great cost to the Railway Company? There can be very little question that the Railway Company can make only a small profit out of trains of this kind, and in all probability they will sustain a loss. If we are to offer the privileges of the bond fide working man to other classes, I am afraid that Parliament will be taking upon itself a task which may entail very great responsibilities upon railways in future.

(3.39.) MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea): The question is one which appears not to have been considered by the Committee. I believe that if they had considered it they would have substituted 8 for 7 o'clock, and I fail to see that such an alteration would entail any additional expense upon the company. I am quite satisfied, however, that it would be an immense boon to the persons who will make use of this railway.

(3.40.) MR. HOWELL: I wish to point out that the persons in whose favour this concession is asked are as much bond fide working men as the man who carries a hod, the only difference being that they go to their work at a later hour, not for their own convenience, but for the convenience of their employers. It is of no use running trains at 6 or 7 o'clock in the morning if they do not embrace the class of working men who are to have the benefit of the Act. I cannot see how it would be an imposition upon the Railway Company, because the more trains they run the more likely they will be to recoup themselves for the expense. It is by keeping the line idle that they will lose. It is not the fact that these trains are full one way only. Many of them return fully loaded, and it must be borne in mind that many of the working classes who live in the West are employed in the East, as well as those who live in the East being employed in the West. I certainly believe that it will be of great advantage to the bond fide working man to extend this privilege to 8 o'clock in the morning.

(3.43.) MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne): I feel bound to protest against the introduction of Amendments of this kind after a Private Bill has been fully considered by a Select Committee. It is impossible that we could give a conscientious vote upon such questions, because we have no knowledge upon the subject, and we are not cognisant of the evidence which induced the Committee to arrive at their decision. How can we possibly know what the traffic is likely to be, how it is to be obtained, and the different places that are proposed to be accommodated? If we are to undertake to deal with questions of this kind I am afraid we shall impose on ourselves a hopeless and impossible task. I certainly protest against the notion that when the details of a Private Bill have been carefully settled by a Select Committee we are to interfere and upset their decision.

(4.45.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): The hon. Member who has just sat down is probably not aware that this matter did not come before the Committee at all. [Cries of "Why not?"] I regard it as a matter of public importance, largely affecting the working classes of London—not only their comfort, but their sanitary condition. The porters and warehousemen who would use the trains at 8 o'clock are bond fide working men, and receive smaller wages than artisans. It is for that class of men, who are very badly paid and who can only afford to live in the suburbs, that this concession is asked. I think their case deserves full consideration at our hands.

Question put, "That 'seven' stand part of the Clause."

The House divided:—Ayes 148; Noes 68.—(Div. List, No. 134.)

(4.55.) MR. J. STUART: As the other Amendments which stand in the name of the hon. Member for North St. Pancras are consequent on that which has just been disposed of, I shall not press them.

Bill ordered to be read a third time.

QUESTIONS.

IRISH CHURCH ACT—PURCHASES.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many of the 2,591 purchasers under the Irish Church Act, who are said to have derived benefit under Section 25 of the Land Act of 1887, were permitted to extend their period of repayment to 49 years under that Act; and how many of the 787 purchasers under the Act of 1870, and the 726 purchasers under the Act of 1881, were allowed to extend their repayment to 49 years under Section 27 of the Act of 1887?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Irish Land Commissioners report that of the 2,591 purchasers under the Irish Church Act who received the benefit of the Acts of 1885 and 1887, 2,263 obtained the full term of 49 years. The Board of Works report that in the case of the 787 purchasers under the Acts of 1870 and 1872 who received the benefit of Section 24 of the Act of 1887, the effect was to extend the period of repayment from 35 years to periods varying from 40½ to 47½ years. In the case of the 726 purchasers under the Act of 1881 who received the benefit of Section 27 of the Act of 1887, the effect was to extend the period of repayment from 35 years to about 45 years in each case.

IRISH FISHERIES.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it was by order of the Inspectors of Fisheries that a document, headed "Notice to Millowners," "Turbines," signed "(By Order), M. P. Dowling, Secretary," and "dated at the Fisheries' Office, Dublin Castle, the 14th day of April, 1890," was served on Mr. C. J. Webb, of Randalstown, on the 18th of February, 1891; and, if not, by whose order; is he aware that at the date of this notice, or thereabouts (namely, April, 1890), proceedings were taken against other millowners under Acts of 5 & 6 Vic. and 26 & 27 Vic., and whether the local Board of Conservators instituted these proceedings of their own accord, and whether the Inspectors of Fisheries approved of them; will he explain why no inspection has been made, as promised to Mr. Webb on the 6th March; is he aware that, on or about the 20th March, Mr. Webb was served with two further summonses; whether any inspection had been made subsequent to his letter of the 2nd March and previous to the service of these summonses; whether, since the passing of 32 & 33 Vic. cap. 9, any similar prosecutions have been undertaken; whether any of the defendants in the recent prosecutions have been summoned for similar offences previous to the year 1890; whether the Inspectors of Fisheries have had any expert evidence as to the injury supposed to be caused by the hydraulic machines at these mills; and, if so, who were the expert witnesses; whether he is aware that, for over 20 years, no similar requirements have been demanded by the Inspectors of Fisheries; and whether he will ask the local Board of Conservators and the Inspectors of Fisheries to furnish the evidence upon which they have taken these proceedings, and their reasons for doing so?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries report that the notice referred to was sent by them to the clerks of the Letterkenny and Coleraine districts for distribution, as the occasion arose, among millowners, in order to warn them of the provisions of the law regarding turbines, in regard to which the Inspectors have no power under the statute to grant exemptions. Before the date of this notice the Inspectors learned incidentally that prosecutions of this nature had taken place in certain cases then under consideration, and they pointed out to the Conservators that they thought it would have been better to have awaited the Inspectors' final decision. The Inspectors made no inspection of Mr. Webb's premises for the reasons (a) that Mr. Webb did not furnish, as he promised, the grounds of his application for exemption; and (b) that the Inspector had only returned from the district immediately previous to the application, and has since been engaged on other duties. The Inspectors are not aware that Mr. Webb has been since served with summonses. On the 16th of March they wrote to the Local Board that an inspection in the case would be made as soon as possible. The Inspectors report that prosecutions have been instituted since the passing of the 32 & 33 Vic, c. 92. The Inspectors have no information as to paragraph 7, as such prosecutions are instituted by the Local Boards. The Inspectors have not had evidence as to injury by hydraulic machines, &c. They themselves inspect mill premises, and hear anything the mill-owners or the local officers of the Conservators have to say in those cases where they have power to grant exemptions. The Inspectors state that the circumstances mentioned in the ninth paragraph, assuming it to be a fact, would not alter the law in the matter. Millowners have the opportunity of applying to them for exemption from compliance with Section 76 of 5 & 6 Vic., c. 106, which exemption would be granted if any injury were likely to arise to the working power of mills by the erection of gratings; but from the necessity of erecting sufficient means to prevent the passage of salmon, or any young of salmon, into turbines, the Inspectors have no power to exempt. Prosecutions are undertaken not by Inspectors, or at their instance, but by the Conservators.

DONAGHADEE HARBOUR.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any progress has yet been made in removing the silting from Donaghadee Harbour; and, if not, whether he can say when the work is likely to be commenced?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): No progress has been made in removing the silting from Donaghadee Harbour. A demand was made locally, but the authorities are unwilling to sanction the commencement of new works at present.

PIER AT HOLYWOOD.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state about what date the plans of the proposed new pier at Holywood, County Down, will be exhibited for inspection at the Harbour Office, Belfast; and whether he will consider the desirability of having a copy of the plans left at some public place in Holywood before the Board of Trade approves of the same?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SIR M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I would refer the hon. Member to the reply I made to him on the 17th February last year, when I said that, whenever plans of new works at Holywood are submitted to the Board of Trade for approval, the Belfast

- Harbour Commissioners will be consulted, and notice of the application for approval will be given in the locality. No application has, as yet, been received, and I am unable to say when the persons interested will apply.

THE KANTURK UNION, CORK.

MR. FLYN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in April, 1890, the labourers who occupy cottages under the Guardians of the Kanturk Union (County Cork) presented a Memorial praying the Guardians to reduce the rent of these cottages, which Memorial was largely signed by the ratepayers of the Union; and that in May, 1890, the Board of Guardians at a general meeting passed a resolution making a general reduction of 3d. per week in the rent of the cottages; and did the Local Government Board refuse to sanction this resolution of the Guardians; if so, for what reasons and under what authority has the Local Government Board acted in overruling the action of the Guardians?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; it appears to be the fact that the Guardians of Kanturk Union passed a resolution to the effect mentioned, but subject to the sanction of the Local Government Board. The Board having been thus asked to approve the Guardians proposal, and it appearing that the rents already charged in the Union were less than the rents at which such cottages are usually let, the Board informed the Guardians that they could not see any reason which would justify them in further reducing the rents and thereby increasing the tax upon the ratepayers in respect of these cottages. The effect of the reduction would have been to throw a charge of £2 13s. 2d. for each house, per year, upon the ratepayers until the loan is repaid, without taking into account the costs of repairs, insurance, and other existing expenses.

ARMY CHAPLAINS.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that the General Protestant Synod in Ireland has unanimously passed a resolution claiming that the Irish Protestant clergy should have equal privileges with the Irish Roman

Sir M. Hicks Beach

Catholic clergy in holding the appointment of chaplains to Her Majesty's forces in Ireland; and whether the Government will take any steps to give effect to that resolution?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The question should be addressed to the Secretary of State for War.

In reply to a further question by Mr. MAC NEILL,

MR. MADDEN said: It is the fact that more than three years ago, as Member for the University of Dublin, I entered into a correspondence with the Chaplain General on this subject. The question refers now to the action of the Government in the matter, and as I have not the honour of being Secretary of State I cannot give any official information. The question should be addressed to my right hon. Friend.

POST OFFICE TELEGRAPHISTS.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he can explain the remarkable disproportions between the numbers of first and second-class telegraphists at different postal telegraph offices in the United Kingdom, and whether there is any principle regulating the maximum salaries; and particularly why Bradford has 21 first-class to 46 second-class, Plymouth 24 and Sheffield 23 to 46, and Cork 22 to 43, while Dundee has only 12 to 43; why the maximum salary is only 50s. at Dundee, while it is 52s. at Nottingham, and 54s. at Sheffield; and why, in Dundee, there are 10 first-class to 24 second-class clerks in the postal department, and some men of only six years' service have been promoted in that department, while there are efficient and well-conducted telegraphists, who have been 14 years in the service, still in the second-class of the telegraph department?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The number of first-class telegraphists at an office is regulated by the number of first-class duties to be performed at that office. The maximum salaries are regulated by the importance and position of each office, and the cost of living in the different towns. The hon. Member gives certain figures showing the numbers of the classes at five towns. The reason why the numbers were so fixed at the last revision was because the figures represented the number of duties at that date. A continual process of adjustment is necessary as business develops, and several of these towns will come under review. Nottingham and Sheffield are much more important offices than Dundee, and this is the reason why the maxima are greater there. I am advised that the duties on the postal side at Dundee require the higher appointments, and that the vacancies occurred on the postal side.

SOLDIERS' UNCLAIMED PRIZE MONEY.

MR. LENG: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can now state if it has been decided to appropriate the interest of the large sum of soldiers' unclaimed prize money for the relief of sick and infirm but unpensioned veterans who served in the Crimean War?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The number of troops in the Crimea before the close of the war (excluding large numbers wounded and invalided) was 52,000. A large proportion of these had enlisted for only three years' service, and returned to civil life upwards of 30 years ago. If the claims of all men who served in the Crimea and are now infirm were recognised by the State—and it would be difficult to draw any distinctions—the charge would be an exceedingly heavy one, and would amount in one year to more than the whole amount of Army prize money. It would, moreover, be impossible to exclude men who served in the Indian Mutiny. Consequently, I do not at present see my way clear to a scheme for specially pensioning Crimean soldiers.

MURDER OF A BRITISH SUBJECT IN VENEZUELA.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if it is a fact that a British subject has been recently murdered by Venezuelan officials?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (SIR J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): Information has reached Her Majesty's Government that a British subject named William

Campbell had died from a gunshot wound inflicted by a Venezuelan policeman on the Venezuelan side of the Amakooroo River. The Venezuelan Government have telegraphed to state that the President of the Republic has ordered an inquiry into the circumstances, with a view to the exemplary punishment of any persons who may be found guilty of wilful violence. The evidence taken by the British Colonial Authorities on the subject of the incident has only recently been received, and is under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

MANIPUR.

MR. WEBSTER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is in a position to give any information as to the alleged statement that the troops employed in the Manipur expedition were at the time of the recent disaster without an adequate or suitable supply of reserve ammunition to fit their rifles?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (SIR J. GORST, Chatham): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to answer this question. The Secretary of State has no information as to the truth or otherwise of these statements.

MR. WEBSTER: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the subject on the Army Estimates.

FOREST REGULATIONS.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the inquiry forwarded to the Government of Bombay in August last respecting the Forest Regulations in the districts of Colaba and Thana has yet been answered; and whether he will grant, as an Unopposed Return, a Copy of the new Regulations which have been issued for the districts named?

*SIR J. GORST: No, Sir; the answer has not yet been received. The matter was under discussion in Bombay last month. As soon as the Report is received the Secretary of State will consider what Papers can be laid upon the Table.

RIOTS AMONG BENGAL INDIGO CULTIVATORS.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the inquiry into the alleged riots among the indigo cultivators in Bengal, promised in April 1890, has been made; and, if so, whether he will lay the result of such inquiry, with all Papers, if any, upon the Table; and whether a Report from the Government of India, as to the circumstances in, and conditions under which indigo is cultivated, has been received; and, if so, whether he will lay it upon the Table?

*SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir; the Papers in this case were presented last month. I understand that they are now being printed, and will be shortly circulated.

THE PERMANENT LAND SETTLEMENT PROPOSALS OF 1862.

MR. MAC NEIL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, with regard to the fact that, under the Court Fees Act in the North-West Provinces, the valuation of land in permanently settled districts is fixed at ten times the annual rental, whereas in districts not permanently settled the valuation is only five times the annual rental; whether, in view of this official testimony, and the greater value of permanently settled land, and in view also of the conditions laid down in the correspondence on the subject, the Secretary of State will redeem the pledge given in 1862, and proceed to permanently settle the land still held on a 30 years' settlement in Madras, Bombay, parts of Bengal, the North-West Provinces, the Punjab, and the Central Provinces; and whether he will state why there has been so great a delay in carrying out the arrangements decided upon nearly 30 years ago?

*SIR J. GORST: I think the hon. Member has fallen into a little error. There is no delay to explain. The proposals made in 1862 were re-considered, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee of 1871, and a final order, formally abandoning them, was issued in 1883.

MR. MAC NEIL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a resolution was passed urging on the Government the extension of the permanent land system?

*SIR J. GORST: The proposals of 1862 were finally abandoned some years ago, and the resolution referred to by the hon. Member is an entirely new matter.

Mr. Mac Neill

DISCONTENT IN THE MADRAS REGISTRATION DEPARTMENT.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the attention of the Secretary of State has been drawn to the serious discontent prevailing among the registering officers, chiefly among the sub-Registrars, and among their clerks, of the Registration Department of the Madras Presidency, due to the reduced scale of remuneration sanctioned by the Madras Government in 1882 and 1885, respectively; (2) whether the Secretary of State is aware of the large amount of surplus that is being accumulated and absorbed into the general revenues from the registration fees, intended, originally, an intention recently re-affirmed by the Government of India, for the sole maintenance of the Department and the pensionary charges of its officers, and not as a source of profit to Government; (3) whether the Secretary of State is aware that the Government of India have, in their review of the Triennial Reports for the period ending 1889-90 of the several Local Governments and Administrations on the working of the Administration Department, expressed their opinion condemning the large surplus that has been accumulated year by year from registration fees, and have, accordingly, directed Local Authorities to take steps to reduce the surplus; and (4) whether he will take the present opportunity to press upon the Madras Government the urgent necessity that has arisen to sanction increased expenditure in order to allay the discontent of a Department composed of Indians by a re-organisation of the grades of sub-Registrars and Registrars, and of their clerks?

*SIR J. GORST: The answer to the first paragraph of the question of the hon. Member is in the negative. The answer to the second and third paragraphs is that the view taken by the Government of India as to the surplus is that it shall be devoted to providing facilities for registration wherever experience shows them to be necessary. This policy was re-affirmed in the review of the Triennial Reports referred to by the hon. Member. The answer to the fourth paragraph of the question is that the Secretary of State, as at present advised, would not urge the Government of India to raise the salaries or increase expenditure in the Registration or any other Department.

ABDUL RASOUL.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camberne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he has yet received the information from the Authorities in India respecting the case of Sheikh Abdul Rasoul, promised on 16th February; (2) if so, on what date was such information received, and what is its purport; if not, will he explain the delay which has taken place in the obtaining of this information; (3) whether he can now state what number of Her Majesty's Indian subjects have been imprisoned under the provisions of Regulation III. of 1818, or deprived of their property since that date to the present time; (4) whether he is aware that Regulation III. of 1818, to which he recently referred, applies only to Bengal, and not to Bombay; (5) would he state to the House what were the reasons of State, and upon what facts or evidence they were based, which necessitated the detention of Abdul Rasoul for nine months in gaol without trial; and (6) whether the Government still refuse to make any compensation to Abdul Rasoul for the treatment he has received? As the Under Secretary for India is in his place, perhaps he will answer the question.

*SIR J. GORST: No information was promised on the 16th of February. It was then stated that—

"The communications addressed by the Sheikh to the Secretary of State have been forwarded to India, and the Secretary of State will await a reply from the Government of India before taking any action thereon."

(2) The Government of India on the 18th of February stated that Abdul Rasoul, on release from confinement, had applied to be sent to Cashmere, and, failing that, to England. On receiving this information the Secretary of State offered Abdul Rasoul the terms which have been already explained to the House. (3) As already stated, the Secretary of State must decline in the public interest to give this information. (4) The provisions of Regulation III. of 1818, which applied to the Bengal Presidency, were re-enacted in almost identical terms in Regulation XXV. of 1827, which applied to the Bombay Presidency, and is still in force.

(5) The Secretary of State has reason to believe that the Government of India were satisfied that Abdul Rasoul was employed as an emissary of Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, who, the House will remember, was at that time issuing treasonable Proclamations against the Queen. On the Maharajah receiving Her Majesty's pardon, Abdul Rasoul applied for his own release, which was granted.

(6) The Government has not refused to make compensation to Abdul Rasoul; but, as already stated more than once, Abdul Rasoul, if he demands compensation, must address himself to the Government of India in the first instance.

MR. CONYBEARE: I have had cause to trouble the right hon. Gentleman so frequently without obtaining a satisfactory assurance from him that I shall ask leave to move the adjournment of the House in order to raise the question.

THE BLACK MOUNTAIN EXPEDITION.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether it is the case, as has been stated in the newspapers, that some of the reserve forces of the Black Mountain Expedition have been ordered to the front; and, if so, whether he is in a position to inform the House what regiments have been thus moved forward?

*SIR J. GORST: The Reserve Forces of the Black Mountain Expedition have been ordered up not to the front in that direction, but to Kohat for the Miranzai Expedition. The full detail of the forces ordered up has not been received from India; but the following are either there or on the way:—3rd British Mountain Battery, 1st Battalion King's Royal Rifles, 19th Bengal Cavalry, 1st Punjab Infantry, 6th Punjab Infantry, 1st Battalion 5th Goorkhas, 15th Sikhs, and 29th Punjab Infantry.

SCHOOL BOARD STANDARDS.

MR. ELLIOTT LEES (Oldham): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he can give the House any information as to the percentage of passes in the School Board Standards obtained by children attending school under the half-time system, between the ages of 10 and 12, as compared with those obtained by other children of the same age?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): A comparison in the Oldham and Rochdale district for 1890 shows that the general percentage of passes was 90, against 77·4 in the case of half timers. In seven Board Schools in Rochdale the difference was 9·5 per cent. against the half timers, and in 10 Board Schools in Oldham 6·7 per cent. In Blackburn, during the year 1888, the difference against the half timers was 12 per cent., and in Darwen 11·5 per cent. I should add that this difference occurs principally in arithmetic and writing (including spelling), and that the results in reading, which offers more scope for the display of general intelligence, are much more even.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): Do the figures include the whole of the half-timers?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: Yes, Sir; I believe they do.

SHEERNESS DOCKYARD.

MR. HERBERT KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether there are men at Sheerness Dockyard, on the books as smiths, who are really doing fitters' work; and, if so, whether they should be classed as fitters; and whether arrangements can be entered into for the forgings of engines which are fitted at Sheerness being made in that Dockyard, instead of, as at present, in private yards?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Faling): The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. It is not considered desirable to class them as fitters, as they are, as a rule, smiths by trade, and have been intermittently employed during the last two years upon smiths and fitting work, and are shifted from one class of work to the other to meet the requirements of the Service. The only forgings obtained by contract for engines made at Sheerness are propeller and crank shafts, connecting rods, and slide rods, and it is not considered desirable as a rule to depart from this arrangement unless the smithery should be in want of work. In that case the connecting rods and slide rods might be made in the yard.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): Is there any difference in the pay of one class and the other?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: When these men are employed on the same class of work they receive the same pay.

THE FACTORIES AND WORKSHOPS BILL.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the passage in the last Report of the Committee of Council on Education in which they express regret to find, on examining the School Returns, that the education of so many children of 10 years of age and upwards is discontinued as soon as, by passing the prescribed standard, they are freed from the obligation to attend school and become entitled to go to work; and whether he will take the facts cited in the Report into consideration in connection with any proposals that may be made to amend the Factories and Workshops Bill?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): My attention has been called to the passage in question. The hon. Member is doubtless aware that the effect of the Factories Act is that children between 10 and 13, if they are employed in a factory, are obliged to continue half-time attendance at school; whereas outside a factory a child of 10, as soon as he has passed the prescribed standard, is free from the obligation to attend school, and may enter upon full-time employment. The raising of the age at which a child can be employed in a factory from 10 to 12 will have the effect (in factory districts) of increasing the number of cases deplored by the Committee of Council, because every child between 10 and 12 who can pass the prescribed standards will betake himself to other employment; whereas if those children were employed in a factory between 10 and 12 they would probably continue that employment, and also their attendance at school, up to 13.

SECOND-CLASS SORTERS.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received a Memorial from the second-class sorters of the circulation department; and, if so, whether he has been able to give it his consideration, and can inform the Memorialists of his decision at an early date?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that the answer to the Memorial referred to was sent yesterday (Wednesday).

TRADE UNIONS REPORT, 1889.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Report on Trade Unions for 1889, by the Labour Correspondent to the Board of Trade, is not yet issued; whether he can give some explanation of this exceedingly long delay in issuing such Report; and whether he can inform the House when the Report will be ready for the use of Members?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Delay was caused in giving the Report for 1889 in order to fulfil a promise made to Mr. Bradlaugh to include Returns from the great majority, if not the whole, of the Trades Unions in the United Kingdom, instead of the limited number dealt with in previous Reports. This has involved great labour, which falls peculiarly on Mr. Burnett, as much of it cannot be delegated. The delay having been so great, it is believed that it will be most convenient not to issue the Returns until the figures for 1890 can be included. The next issue will accordingly take place towards the end of the present year, and it will be a much more complete Return than any yet made. It will also include the figures for 1890 as well as 1889.

MR. HOWELL: Is it not possible to obtain the Returns earlier? Most of them are published in the month of May. Is it not possible for Members to have them in their hands before the Votes are taken?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I will try what I can do to have them published earlier.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is possible for the Registrar of Friendly Societies to give the whole particulars of the Returns made by registered Trade Unions in his Annual Report; and, if not, will he explain for what reason?

MR. JACKSON: The answer just given by my right hon. Friend seems to dispose of the question which the hon. Member has addressed to me; but if he wishes further information I shall be glad if he will speak to me, and I will suggest what I consider the best course for dealing with the question.

MR. HOWELL: The question is not exactly the same as that which I put to the President of the Board of Trade. I ask whether, when a certain form is filled up by the Registrar of Friendly Societies as to Returns of registered Trade Unions, it could not be included in the Annual Report?

MR. JACKSON: My desire is to avoid giving portions of the Returns by one Department and other portions by another Department. My object in suggesting that the hon. Member should speak to me is to try and find out whether some plan may not be decided upon by which we can improve the Returns.

THE CHARGES AGAINST MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is true that warrants have been issued against two Members of this House for criminal offences; and whether it is also true that both Members have left this country, and are now out of the jurisdiction of our Law Courts?

MR. MATTHEWS: The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. So far as my information goes, both Members are now out of the jurisdiction. I am permitted to read a telegram addressed by the hon. Member for North Bucks (Captain Verney) from Paris to Mr. Speaker in these terms—

“Seeing a question is to be asked about me in the House, it is my duty to inform you that as soon as I heard in Italy that a warrant had been issued for my arrest, I started at once and expect to reach London to-morrow —VERNEY.”

MR. MORTON: Arising out of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, may I ask whether, if an application is made for the Chiltern Hundreds by either of the two hon. Members, the Government will undertake not to grant it?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member must give notice of that question.

BERMUDA DOCKYARD.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that a shipwright has recently been placed in charge of the engines and machinery in the Bermuda Dockyard, and that the Inspector of Machinery at Bermuda recommended that an engineer should be appointed to the post; and, if so, whether he will cause an inquiry to be made into the circumstances which led to the appointment of a person who can have but little practical knowledge of the duties involved?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: It is not the case, as suggested by the hon. Member, that a shipwright has been placed in charge of the engines and machinery in Bermuda Dockyard. An established shipwright who has been employed continuously at Bermuda since 1878, and is now employed on electrical and other fitting work, will be appointed fitter to perform shipfitting work on docks and caissons and also electrical work as required.

BRITISH SOUTH AFRICA COMPANY.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) postponed until Monday a question—To ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that a Chartered Company is not under the obligation to make Returns to Somerset House in regard to the Act of its shareholders and other matters connected with it, which are obligatory on all Limited Liability Companies not being Chartered Companies; whether, in view of this fact, and that by the 25th Article of the Charter of the South Africa Company it is stated that—

"Within one year after the date of this Our Charter, or such extended period as may be certified by Our Secretary of State, there shall be executed by the Members of the Company for the time being a Deed of Settlement providing, so far as is necessary for,"

amongst other things,

"the regulation of Members of the Company, and the transfer of shares in the capital of the Company; the division and distribution of profits,"

Mr. Morton

he will cause such a Deed of Settlement to be executed, and lay it, when executed, upon the Table of the House, in order that the public may have the same opportunity to know matters in connection with the transfer of shares in this Company, and with the division and distribution of profits which are available in respect to companies that are not chartered; and whether, in connection with this Return, he will see that it is fully set forth, and that, whilst the Company has to pay all costs and expenditure in regard to carrying out the objects of the concession from Lobengula, one-half of the profits (if any) are retained by the Promoters of the Company, should it appear that this is the case?

MR. LABOUCHERE also postponed until Monday a question—To ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether an Imperial Proclamation has been published in the Gazette of the Cape Colony, declaring that any attempt to occupy Baryarland, or to establish autonomous government in that country, will be regarded as an infringement of the rights of the British South Africa Company, and an aggression against British suzerainty, and will be resisted; whether it is to be understood that no British subject is to be allowed in Baryarland without the permission of the British South Africa Company; and, if so, from whence this exclusive right of the Company to occupy this territory is derived; whether he can state how many British subjects there are now in Baryarland, and what is the area of that country; whether he is aware that persons wishing to pass through Mashonaland in order to go northwards are impeded by agents of the South Africa Company; whether he is aware that the Company does not permit any of Her Majesty's subjects to trade in Mashonaland, and that the monopoly of opening stores has been granted to two Kimberley firms, notwithstanding that it is set forth in the Charter granted to the Company, that it is conferred upon it because it will tend "To the opening up of the said territories to the immigration of Europeans, and to the lawful trade and commerce of Her Majesty's subjects and of other nations;"

and that it is stated in the 20th Paragraph of the said Charter that "Nothing in this Our Charter shall be deemed to authorise the Company to set up or grant any monopoly in trade ;"

whether he is aware that the concession from Lobengula in regard to which the Charter was granted is only a concession granting many rights to the Company, and that it conferred on it no land, and that promises are being held out by advertisements of the Company in the South African newspapers offering to intending settlers land in Mashonaland (which forms part of the territory included in the mining concession of Lobengula); and whether, in order to prevent Her Majesty's subjects from being deluded into going into Mashonaland by the promise of grants of land from the Company, Her Majesty's Government will take steps to make it known that the Company can make no grants of land, as it has no land to grant?

THE CENSUS AND THE PRESS.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the instructions laid down by the Registrar General are intended to prevent Registrars from giving to newspapers the number of inhabitants in their districts; whether he is aware that in some cases Registrars are declining to give the information, on the ground that they are not certain whether it is allowable for them to do so; and whether, in view of the interest taken in the numbers, and considering that it is well understood that such numbers as the Registrar supply are subject to correction after final revision in the Census Department, he will make it clear that no such prohibition exists?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have communicated with the Registrar General, and I learn from him that the Census officers are forbidden to give any information concerning the unrevised results of the enumeration in anticipation of their official publication. The Registrar General considers that it would be unwise to withdraw the prohibition; and I agree with him that it would be inadvisable to give general permission to Registrars to furnish information to the local Press and others which may prove incorrect.

COUNSEL AND SELECT COMMITTEES.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the hon. Baronet the Member for Somersetshire (Wells Division) whether the General Committee on Railway and Canal Bills has arrived at any conclusion with respect to the cross-examination of witnesses by counsel before Committees which he can state for the information of the House?

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells): I have to inform the hon. Member that the Resolution at which the Committee arrived is in the following terms:—

"On consideration of the Resolution passed by the General Committee on Railway and Canal Bills in 1861, to the effect 'That Counsel shall not cross-examine a witness unless he has been present during the entire examination in chief—and That Counsel shall not re-examine unless he has been present during the entire cross-examination,' Resolved that the enforcement of such a Resolution is undoubtedly within the privilege of any Railway Committee for the better order of their proceedings."

POLICE SUPERANNUATION.

MR. P. STANHOPE (Wednesbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a police constable appointed under Section 19 of the Act 3 & 4 Victoria, chapter 88, is entitled to superannuation under the English Superannuation Act of 1890, in the same manner as other county constables?

MR. MATTHEWS: The question does not arise in the Metropolis; but with regard to other forces the question is not free from legal doubt. So far as I can judge, if the police constable appointed under Section 19 has been engaged on the ordinary terms of contribution towards superannuation and otherwise, and has fulfilled the conditions of age and service appointed by the pension scale of the force to which he belongs, he would be entitled to superannuation in the same manner as other constables. As a rule, however, the service under Section 19 is temporary, and in some cases it has been on special terms.

THE BOY MESSENGERS AND DISTRICT SERVICES COMPANIES.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will explain to the House the nature of the arrangements into which he has entered with the Boy Messengers and District Service Companies for the carrying on of their business under licence from the Post Office?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that the arrangements in question are as follows:—The Postmaster General grants licences for the electric call system in London (such system not to include telephones), and if requested to connect the offices of the company or other persons licensed with police stations and fire brigade stations on the same terms as those in force in private wires. The licence to be for 12 years, and a royalty of £25 per annum, and 2s. 6d. per instrument to be paid by the licencees. The company (or other licencees) will act as agents of the Postmaster General to deliver single letters stamped with the penny rate of postage, provided that a messenger of the company may carry any number of letters (not exceeding six) handed in by the same sender. The company is not to make collection of letters. The costs of the legal proceedings have been ordered to be paid by the companies. I should perhaps add, the Private Bill promoted by the Boy Messengers Company has been withdrawn.

ABERDEEN, ORKNEY, AND SHETLAND MAILS.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can now state the arrangements which it is intended to make for the provision of an improved mail service between Aberdeen and the Orkney and Shetland Islands?

*MR. RAIKES: I am at present only in a position to state that I have ascertained on what terms the present contractors would be willing to increase the frequency of the sailings of the mail steamers between Aberdeen and the Shetlands by one day a week all the year round, and those terms are now being considered by my noble Friend the Secretary for Scotland and myself.

MR. BRYCE: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when he can give a definite and final answer?

*MR. RAIKES: It will be necessary for the Scotch Office and the Post Office to arrive at a common understanding, and this must be submitted to the Treasury before I can say anything else.

PRIZES AND BADGES FOR THE MILITIA.

VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants, Petersfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if it is the intention of the War Office to accede to the recommendations of the Committee of which Major General Mansfield Clarke, C.B., is President, with regard to money prizes to recruits and trained men of the Militia; and if badges will be issued to marksmen in the Militia?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: In reply to my noble Friend, I have to say the Committee has not yet presented its final Report, and its recommendations are not yet before me.

EGYPTIAN EXILES AT CEYLON.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been drawn to the fact of the decease of Abdul al Helmi Pasha, one of the Egyptian Pashas exiled with Arabi Pasha to Ceylon, from asthma and other complications, notwithstanding the assurances given on a late occasion, that the health of the exiles was not suffering from exposure to the damp and hot climate of their actual place of exile; whether his attention has been drawn to a statement in the Ceylon Mail of 21st March, to the effect that—

“Some of the other Pashas are really not in satisfactory health, Toulba Pasha, for example, has begun to suffer from asthma, while Arabi Pasha himself is not free from rheumatism”; and whether Her Majesty's Government will re-consider the desirability of removing the exiled Pashas to some drier climate?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: On behalf of my right hon. Friend, I have to say that no official information as to the death of Abdul al Helmi has been received. A Report on the subject will be called for.

DUBLIN CATTLE REMOVAL LICENCES.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain why the Privy Council have decided to withhold removal licences for Dublin cattle, which will have the effect of detaining within the city the whole of the many thousands of milch cows now in the dairy yards of Dublin, contrary to the wish of the cowkeepers, who wish to put out the animals to grass for the annual summer pasture, and complain that these beasts, valued at least at £200,000, will be seriously deteriorated by imprisonment during the hot weather, while their owners will be put to much expense for their indoor maintenance; is he aware that many of the Dublin cowkeepers before the decision of the Privy Council had entered into binding contracts for the season's grazing, which will now be useless to them; and in view of the fact that this order extends to every dairy yard, even where there has been no pleuro-pneumonia for years, will he state whether there is any English, Irish, or Scotch precedent for the decision the Privy Council have arrived at?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Privy Council have not decided to withhold removal licences for Dublin cattle. In consequence, however, of continued outbreaks of pleuro-pneumonia among Dublin dairy cattle, an Order was passed in February by the Privy Council restricting the movement of cattle out of certain districts scheduled to the Order without the consent of the Lord Lieutenant. Permission will be granted for the movement of cattle in the scheduled districts to pasture lands outside those districts within the North and South Dublin Unions in all cases in which his Excellency shall be advised that the movement can be effected with safety, having regard to the efforts now being made to stamp out pleuro-pneumonia in Ireland. The circumstances of each application for permission to move cattle will receive careful consideration, and a communication to this effect was sent to the Dublin Cowkeepers' Association yesterday. The Order of the Privy Council referred to, restricting the movement of cattle, was made in accordance with the course adopted by the Board of Agriculture in Great Britain.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for his answer, which I think will give great satisfaction and remove much misapprehension; but will he inform me, as a matter of fact, why a gentleman named Mr. Thomas Cass, who has not had pleuro-pneumonia upon his premises for 10 years, when he applied for a removal order was refused?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot answer that; but if the hon. and learned Member will put down his question for a later day, I will endeavour to obtain the information.

ASHTON-IN-MAKERFIELD LOCAL BOARD.

MR. CALEB WRIGHT (Lancashire, S.W., Leigh): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that at the recent election of the members of the Local Board for the township of Ashton-in-Makerfield, Lancashire, the voting papers were deliberately taken out of the tin boxes in which they had been collected and locked, by the direction of the returning officer, by a member and certain officials of the Board; and that this extraction of voting papers took place on Friday night, 3rd April, 1891, previous to their being counted on the next day by the returning officer; and, if so, whether such conduct by paid officials of the Board is a breach of the Act of Parliament?

*MR. RITCHIE: My attention has not been called to any of the proceedings in connection with the election of members of the Local Board for the district of Ashton-in-Makerfield, and the Local Government Board have no jurisdiction whatever with regard to the election. If it is alleged that there have been any illegal practices which constitute an offence under the Public Health Act, 1875, in connection with this election, I may point out that provision is made by that Act for the punishment of the offence.

ARREARS IN THE LAW COURTS.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Wandsworth (Mr. Kimber), I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he is aware that there are nearly 500 causes, besides motions, petitions, &c., awaiting a hearing in the Chancery Division, and over 1,500 in the Queen's Bench Division, which at the present rate of progress, and with all the Judges working hard, will take more than 12 months to try, irrespective of new causes; and whether, and when, the Government proposes to appoint additional Judges to overcome the very serious damage which the delay is inflicting on a large number of Her Majesty's suitors for justice?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): In answer to the question of the hon. Member, I have to state that I believe that the statements of fact contained in the first paragraph of his question are substantially correct. With regard to the question of the appointment of an additional Judge, I may say that the matter is receiving the careful attention of Her Majesty's Government. It is not possible, however, for me to make any statement with regard to the latter part of the hon. Member's question.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether it is the fact that, in the Queen's Bench Division Courts, two Judges are constantly sitting for deciding questions of no greater importance than those which are decided in the Chancery Division by one Judge; and whether, having regard to the waste of judicial time involved in the present arrangements for the administration of justice in London and at the Assizes, to the accumulation of arrears arising from the long periods during which the Courts are not sitting, and to the dissatisfaction which exists with respect to the increased cost and delay caused by the working of the Judicature Acts, the Government will institute an inquiry, either by a Royal Commission or by a Select Committee, either of this or the other House, to inquire into and report on the whole question?

SIR R. WEBSTER: In answer to the question of the right hon. Gentleman, I have to say that the first paragraph raises a point which was considerably discussed last year upon the occasion of the passing of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Inverness, and that there is a great difference of opinion as to whether more than one Judge should sit in Courts in Banc. There are certainly many cases that come before Divisional Courts of the Queen's Bench Division which require the attention of two Judges. The latter part of the question of the right hon. Gentleman should be addressed to my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury.

General Goldworthy

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Perhaps the First Lord of the Treasury can answer now?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): My attention has not been called to this question until this moment, and I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will see the answer requires a little consideration.

GALLERY OF BRITISH ART.

MR. MUNDELLA: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in proposing to give the large plot of ground opposite the Normal School of Science at South Kensington for a Gallery of British Art, the Government had fully considered the difficulties of interpolating an Art Gallery under an independent management between portions of the Science School and the Science Collections of the Science and Art Department, and the future requirements of the Science Museum and the extension of the Science School, especially in view of the recent great development of technical education, owing to the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Act of last Session, with the demand for teachers caused thereby; and whether the Government would appoint a small Committee to report on the matter? I apologise for the form in which the question appears, for which, however, I am not responsible.

MR. W. H. SMITH: In assigning as a site for a Gallery of British Art the plot of land opposite the Royal College of Science the Government have not overlooked the requirements, immediate or prospective, of the Science and Art Department, either in respect of its Science Collections or in respect of the additional accommodation required for the College of Science. For the Science Collections there will be available, part at once and part within a year or two, a continuous range of galleries, consisting of the present southern, western, and eastern galleries, and the cross gallery which is about to be constructed between the western and eastern galleries, thus affording more than the amount of accommodation which the Committee of 1889 considered to be necessary. Over and above this accommodation, Government has at disposal more than three acres of vacant land facing the Imperial Institute, and considerable areas besides to the south of the present southern galleries. A portion of these vacant lands can be utilised for the extension of the College of Science and for future growth of the Science Collections. Additions to the College of Science must in any case take the form of a separate building, divided from the present building by Exhibition Road; and as access to the lands mentioned above from Exhibition Road will be secured by means of a corridor, the interposition of the Gallery of British Art need have no more serious effect than to increase by some 60 yards (which will be under cover) the distance between the two portions of the Science College. As the Art Gallery will be a distinct and separate building, the fact that it will be under different management need cause no greater difficulty than does the fact that the Natural History Museum is under a different management from that of the adjoining science galleries.

RAILWAY WORKS IN THE CROFTER DISTRICTS.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is now ready to state the arrangements of the Government with regard to railway extension in the crofter districts of Scotland?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sorry that I am not yet in a position to make any definite announcement. We are in negotiation for the construction of a line of railway, and the Government are prepared to recommend that very substantial assistance should be given if adequate security can be obtained for its construction, working, and maintenance by a responsible company. I shall probably be able to say something definite in the course of next week.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman where this line is?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not in a position to give any further information.

DR. R. M'DONALD (Ross and Cromarty): Will the House have an opportunity of discussing the matter?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We feel the importance of the subject, and, as the hon. Gentleman is aware, any undertaking the Government give must, to be effective, have the ratification of the House. We must ask the House to approve our recommendation before it can become effective.

TUESDAY AND FRIDAY SITTINGS.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, seeing that Morning Sittings have now become habitual, he will, if the sense of the House appears to be in favour of the proposal, move a new Standing Order, under which the House should rise not later than half-past 12 o'clock on days on which Morning Sittings are taken? I may say that all the Members with whom I have communicated are in favour of the suggestion in my question, except those who are in favour of rising at 12 o'clock.

MR. LENG (Dundee) also had notice of the following question:—To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the growing feeling in favour of the curtailment of Debates and earlier closing of the Sittings of the House, he will consider the expediency of the Twelve o'clock Rule, now applied on Mondays and Thursdays, being extended to Tuesdays and Fridays, so that discussions may be terminated not later than midnight?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I observe with very considerable satisfaction, so far as I am individually concerned, the expression of a desire in all parts of the House for an earlier conclusion of our Debates on Tuesday and Friday evenings; but it will be obvious to the House that I could not make any proposal of the character suggested unless I was satisfied that it would receive almost unanimous support. I shall endeavour to satisfy myself on that point; and if I am assured that any proposal of the kind will be cordially accepted by the House, I propose to put down a Motion, after 12 o'clock on some evening, because I could not devote important time at the disposal of the Government for the discussion of a question of that kind. If the House be disposed to entertain a Motion of that kind, I will make a proposal shortly after 12 o'clock; and I should rather be disposed to accept the suggestion of the hon. Member for Poplar, that we should fix half-past 12 o'clock as the time for the closing of Debate. [Loud cries of "Twelve!"] I will endeavour, with the assistance of hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, to satisfy myself as to the prevailing feeling in the House.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): The right hon. Gentleman will, perhaps, answer my question: whether he will move a new Standing Order maintaining the Midnight Rule on days on which Morning Sittings are taken, limiting speeches at such Evening Sittings to the space of half-an-hour?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have always been disinclined, and I remain disinclined, to put a limit on the speeches of hon. Gentlemen. I do not know how I could do so successfully; and I am satisfied that such a limitation, unless it was imposed by the sense of the House itself, would be one which would be absolutely futile, and would not be attended with satisfactory results.

TRAINING SHIP AT STORNOWAY.

DR. R. M'DONALD: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, as was recommended by the Crofters' Commission, the Government will cause a training ship to be stationed in Stornoway, in order to utilise the services of a large number of young men anxious for such employment, in view of the deficiency which this year exists in the number of Naval Reserve men, and in the interests of the Island of Lewis?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it would have been more satisfactory if this question had been addressed to my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty; but in reply to the question of the hon. Member, I have to inform him that drill ships for the Royal Naval Reserve are only placed where there are no batteries. At Stornoway there is the largest battery the Admiralty has anywhere, and between 1,900 and 2,000 men are trained at it. There is no difficulty in maintaining the numbers of the Royal Naval Reserve voted; but when an increase of the force is ordered, the additional numbers are not all at once available. If a training ship for boys is referred to, the Admiralty could not recommend one being placed so far North. If boys are willing to join the Royal Navy from Lewis, they will, of course, be received, as are boys from any other part of the coast.

Mr. W. H. Smith

THE NEWFOUNDLAND BILL.

MR. M. FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government intend to take the Second Reading of the Newfoundland Bill before the delegates from that Colony have been heard?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Her Majesty's Government are not yet aware whether the delegates desire to be heard; but I would point out that, according to invariable precedent, Counsel would not be heard till after the Second Reading of the Bill in the House of Lords. The matter will, however, receive full consideration.

RELIEF WORKS, WEST DONEGAL.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what steps, if any, have been taken to start relief works in Ranafast, Ranomona, and Loughnanoran, in West Donegal; whether he is aware that there is much fever in these districts; and what means of subsistence there are for the 783 inhabitants from this time till June, and for the women and children from June till the return of the wage-earners from the Scotch harvest in August?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The condition of the districts mentioned is being carefully watched, but I am happy to say no necessity has arisen to start relief works. As the result of local inquiry, I cannot find that fever exists there. An outbreak of scarlatina had occurred in Dungloe dispensary district, but it was practically over on the 25th ult. It is not anticipated that any distress will arise to deprive the inhabitants of their present means of subsistence, or to derange the practice followed by the heads of families in previous years with regard to the maintenance of their families while they themselves are wage-earning in Scotland.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

MR. S. BUXTON: On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst), I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Employers' Liability Bill during the present Session?

MR. MATTHEWS: It must depend on the course of Public Business, and on the progress made with other Government measures, whether any practical result can be attained by proceeding with the Employers' Liability Bill this Session. I should not proceed with it unless there is a reasonable prospect that the House will have time to carry it through its stages.

MANICALAND.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any Despatches have been received from the Portuguese territory impugning the statements of the agents of the South Africa Chartered Company in respect to transactions in Manica; whether the House will have an opportunity to see the correspondence that has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Portuguese Government in regard to these transactions before the Colonial Vote is taken; whether he is aware that Mr. Colquhoun, who is now the leading official of the Chartered Company in Manicaland, was removed from his appointment as Deputy Commissioner of Burma by the Government of India, for having been proved to have instigated attacks, by the Times correspondent at Rangoon, on the Chief Commissioner of Burma, whilst, at the same time, assuring the Chief Commissioner in private letters of his complete confidence and loyal devotion; and whether the information of Her Majesty's Government, in regard to matters in Manica, is derived from Mr. Colquhoun?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Reports which have been communicated to us by the Portuguese Government give, in some respects, a different account of the events in Manica from those sent by the agents of the South Africa Company. It would be inconvenient, and contrary to established usage, to publish the correspondence while negotiations are pending between the two Governments. I am informed that Mr. Colquhoun was removed from his office in Burma on account of his conduct to the Chief Commissioner. The information in the possession of Her Majesty's Government respecting the events in Manica is derived from various sources: the Chief Commissioner at the Cape, the South Africa Company, and the Portuguese Government. I am unable to say what portion of it, if any, may have been furnished by Mr. Colquhoun. But the officer who took part in the affairs at Mutassa's Kraal and reported on them was not Mr. Colquhoun, but Captain Forbes.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Can the right hon. Gentleman give us any information proving or disproving the Report of the conduct of Mr. Colquhoun in reference to his removal from the Service?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I must ask for notice of any further question. I may point out that Mr. Colquhoun was not removed from the Service, but only from the special appointment in Burma.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Removed afterwards, I suppose?

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there are two gentlemen of the name of Colquhoun up there, one of whom did not serve in Burma?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am not aware; but my answer refers to the one who did.

RATING OF SCHOOLS BILL.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been drawn to the heavy additional burden which will be imposed on the ratepayers of the poorest districts in London by the Rating of Schools Bill, which proposes to exempt public elementary schools from rateability; and whether it is the intention of the Government to support the Bill; and, if so, whether they will move or support an Amendment (in the event of the Bill being read a second time) excluding the London School Board district from its operation?

MR. RITCHIE: No doubt, Sir, if schools were exempted from rating, the additional burden, so far as they are at present rated, would have to be borne by the other ratepayers. I would, however, point out that if, as is alleged, the result of assessing voluntary schools on their full rateable value were to be the closing of voluntary schools, the effect on the ratepayers would probably be much more serious than their exemption from rating. The Government will state the course they intend to pursue when the Bill comes on for discussion.

BRIXTON MILITARY PRISON.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is true, as reported, that he proposes to place Brixton Military Prison under the charge of a chief warder; what are the wages and qualifications of a chief warder; whether it is the legal duty of the chief officer of a prison to "observe the conduct of the prison officers, and enforce on each of them the due execution of his duties"; and whether, under the new arrangement, the chaplain and surgeon at Brixton will thus be subordinate to the chief warder; and, if not, to whom will they be subordinate?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The question relates to my Department, and the hon. Member will allow me to answer. From the present small number of military prisoners at Brixton, it is considered that a chief warder will be sufficient for the charge of the prison. The pay is £125 a year, with a yearly increment to £150, with quarters; and the qualifications of the present chief warder are experience and good conduct in a similar capacity. As the chief warder is generally responsible for the prison, the other officials are necessarily in a sense subordinate to him, as in many other military prisons; but, of course, the chaplain and the medical officer are responsible for their technical duties, whether the officer in charge is styled governor or chief warder.

WOMEN'S DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL.—(No. 175.)

Order for Second Reading upon Wednesday 13th May, read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

PROVISION FOR OLD AGE (FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS).

Address for—

"Return of the assistance afforded, or facilities given, by the Governments of Europe to the provision of the industrial population for old age, whether in the shape of compulsory insurance, State annuities, State guarantee of the security of industrial savings, or grants to Friendly or Benefit Societies, and sociétés de secours mutuels."—(Mr. Howard Vincent.)

Mr. Ritchie .

MOTION.

ARREST AND IMPRISONMENT OF AN INDIAN SUBJECT.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

(4.55.) MR. CONYBEARE, Member for the Camborne Division of Cornwall, rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, "the Arrest of an Indian Subject in Bombay and his Imprisonment for nine months in the Gaol of Assergarh, and his subsequent deportation to London without trial and without any charge or accusation having been brought against him;" but the pleasure of the House not having been signified, Mr. Speaker called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places, and not less than 40 Members having accordingly risen:—

MR. CONYBEARE: I am loth to trouble the House with a Motion of this kind; but there are Members in the House who will recollect that I have again and again pressed the Government of India with questions on the subject without receiving any reply I could consider sufficient, and it is not only because the question involves a case of very great hardship and maltreatment to a particular Mahomedan subject of Her Majesty, but also because it involves a question of principle relating to the Government of India generally, that I consider it to be of sufficient importance to justify the step I am taking this evening. I am sure there are not many Members in this House who would have credited the statement had anyone told them before this case arose that it is in the power of Her Majesty's Government in India to act as they have acted in relation to this Mahomedan gentleman, Sheikh Abdul Rasoul. I will briefly recapitulate the facts as they are stated to me, and as they have been admitted to be in the answers I have received from Members of the Government, to questions I have put in the House. All I can say is, whether the Government can justify their action under old-fashioned regulations which they admit to be the authority under which they have acted, or not, I hope, at any rate, the House will come to the conclusion that old regulations passed in time of turmoil and confusion and warfare in the early days of our Indian Empire, are quite unsuited to the requirements of modern times, and ought either to be repealed at once, or at any rate, ought not to be acted upon without far more than the bare suspicion which I believe Her Majesty's Government now allege to be the ground of their action. Sheikh Abdul Rasoul was born in Kashmir, which city he left 35 years ago. He remained one year in Mecca, and lived in Constantinople for 30 years, where he received 45 guineas per month as a Professor of Languages to the college, and where he was a member of the Academy. After the Russian war he left Constantinople, and came to London, where, having a little money, he published an Arabic and Persian newspaper, called Gairat. He remained in London 10 years, and then returned to Constantinople. During his residence in London, Sheikh Abdul Rasoul maintained himself partly by teaching languages, and received support also from his countryman, Porbukah. He left Constantinople again after three months stay, and went to Moscow where he stopped four months. He was supported all this time by friends. From Moscow he journeyed to Berlin, where he stayed 10 days, and then went to Paris. He left that city for London after one month's stay. After remaining in London for one month, he went to Cairo where he lived for two years. He again returned to Paris for two months whence he went to Cairo and Bombay. He was travelling all this time for pleasure. He corresponded with the Government during his travels. He took a great deal of interest in the Soudan War. I place these details before the House to show that there is nothing this gentleman desires to conceal. His life has been more or less a public one, for at any rate portions of his time, and if he has been in correspondence with Members of the Government—I do not mean this Government in particular—and with the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh—that, in the absence of far more weighty evidence than has been vouchsafed by the Government, does not entitle the Government to treat him as he has been treated. What was that treatment? When he arrived at

Bombay, in January last year, he was arrested by the Commissioner of Police, his clothes and boots were cut to pieces on pretence of discovering if he had any treasonable communications concealed about his person, he was then placed on the railway and carried to the inland fortress of Assirgad, and there detained, nine months after which he was removed to Bombay under arrest, placed on board a Peninsular and Oriental steamer, and landed friendless, penniless, and homeless, in the London docks; and but for the care taken of him by certain friends, who fortunately have the means of ascertaining these facts, taking up a case like this, and bringing it before the House and the country, this unfortunate man, for aught the Government cared, might have perished of starvation in this city. Now the answer of the Government, so far as the question of deportation is concerned, is that they did not deport—that this gentleman asked to come back to England of his own free will. Well, that is an official explanation. I place before the House by the side of it, and in direct opposition to it, the deliberate statement of Abdul Rasoul himself, and I will ask the House to say which party is most worthy of credence, the Government who have deported this unfortunate man under a regulation which, according to the admission of the Government, does not give authority to deport any person from India—I will call attention to this particular regulation presently—whether the explanation suggested by the motive of getting out of the difficulty this deportation landed the Government in, is to be accepted, or whether the statement of this gentleman does not bear evidence of its truth, and that the statement of the Indian Government is not true. As to the way in which he was brought down to Bombay, he declares that he was 26 hours travelling from Assirgad. He says—

“I was under a guard of eight police; hence the Government of India has paid all our rents of the railway and food.”

I would ask the House to consider the improbability of a man being sent back to England at his own wish under a guard of police. He says—

“The new Commissioner of Bombay has informed me that he has received telegram from the Viceroy that he should send me back to London.”

Will the right hon. Gentleman deny that that is the case? Is this telegram in existence; and, if so, will he produce it? He goes on to say—

"Then I replied to him in the presence of one of my companions Khan Saheli that I am not going back to London by my own wish because I have not any means for my living there."

The man he refers to is capable of production, and I challenge the Government to produce him. Abdul therefore said distinctly, when he was under this escort of police, he was not going to London at his own wish, but against it. He goes on to say—

"In reply he said that the India Office of London knows very well all this matter and it will arrange for you any sufficient pension, whether from the said office or from 'Dhuleep'; then he immediately sent me back to London with a passage of second class, from the office of the Commissioner to the port of Bombay under a guard of six police and one English officer with three carriages. The Government has paid all our rents for the said carriages, and from that port to the Assam steamer we were carried by a steamboat of the Government."

He asks—

"Hence how can you believe now that I came to London with my own wish?"

I find, further, that Rasoul declares that his arrest, when he arrived at Bombay, was—

"Because of communications received from the India Office by the Commissioner of Police at Bombay, so that the India Office knows all about the matter."

I have asked the Representative of the India Office in this House whether that is the case, and I have been met with a denial of the fact. But then I want to question the Government in reference to the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman this afternoon. He intimates now, for the first time only, after I have been harrassing him with questions again and again, that it was in consequence of a supposed treasonable communication with Dhuleep Singh that this gentleman was arrested. I ask the Government to state whether it is not the fact that Dhuleep Singh was in Europe at that time? I have not heard that when Dhuleep Singh issued the proclamation, that is said to have been treasonable, he was in India. I always understood that he was in Paris or some other part of the Continent. I ask the right hon. Gentleman opposite whether as a matter of fact Dhuleep Singh was not in Europe at that time, and if he was, I ask the House to consider whether there is not, at any rate, a great deal of probability in the statement of Abdul Rasoul when he says that the orders came from this side to the Viceroy to arrest and imprison him, and that therefore the statement made to me by the Government is not correct—that is to say, the statement that they knew nothing about the matter, and could not do anything until they had communicated with the Viceroy as to the circumstances of the case. It will be found by those who may have followed this matter that, in reply to the questions I have addressed to them from time to time, the Government have again and again objected to give me information on the ground that they were seeking information from India. I first mooted this question in the House on the 17th February, and as late as the 16th March I was being informed by the Government that they had no information because they had received none from the Government of India. There is this curious discrepancy and contradiction in the answers which have been given to me by the Government: After telling me that Abdul Rasoul had been sent to London at his own request, they informed me that the Secretary of State was not in possession of information which enabled him to state the cause of complaint or to prefer any charge. In the same answer the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester, who represented the Under Secretary of State for India for the time being, said the Government had offered to refund the expenses of Abdul Rasoul in this country since his arrival in November, 1890, and that he had been offered a passage to Bombay, with permission to return to Kashmir. Now, I want to know whether at the time that answer was given to me the Government knew the reason this gentleman had been arrested and imprisoned? If they had no information to give me as to the character of the suspicions against Abdul Rasoul, or the evidence upon which he was arrested, I want to know why it is—how they can explain the anomaly of their conduct in offering this gentleman such compensation as would refund him his expenses in this country and enable him to reach Bombay and Kashmir? The Government are in this difficulty: First of all they tell us they have no evidence against the man, and know nothing of the reasons why the Viceroy thought it right to have him arrested, and they promise to give us the information, which promise they wait until to-night to carry out; and then, at the same time, they say, "We will send this gentleman back free of charge at the expense of the nation." But if the man was guilty of any offence at all, we have a right to demand what character the accusation assumes. If he is guilty, we have the right to say that the Government are not justified in sending him back to Kashmir and offering him a safe conduct. And if he is not criminal—and this is the chief ground of my complaint—there was no ground for his detention at all. I claim that the Government ought to go further, and give him some kind of compensation for the atrocious ill-treatment he has received. That is not all. It was not sufficient that this gentleman should thus be treated in India—insulted on his arrival at Bombay, taken up without a word of warning, imprisoned for nine months in India, and then sent back in the charge of a posse of police against his will. That is not sufficient. When he comes to this country, what happens? He applies to the India Office to be allowed to place his case before the authorities of the India Office. I would ask the House to observe that if the Government are correct in saying that he came to this country at his own request, it was for the purpose of being able to prefer a charge against the Government and the police as regards his grievances before the supreme authorities at the India Office. Yet when he was brought here by the Government at his own request, and surely for no other purpose than to seek redress, how do they treat one of our fellow-subjects in India, when he has so serious a grievance to prefer against the Indian Government? This gentleman first of all waited upon Lord Cross at the India Office. I think the statement he made to me—for I have personally examined him and tested his veracity in every way—was that he waited three hours on one occasion at the India Office without seeing Lord Cross, and he was treated as a beggar or a dog and refused permission to see any of the authorities at the India Office. He then wrote a letter preferring his complaint and asking permission to expose his grievance. No notice was taken of that letter. Then he wrote a second letter, which was witnessed for him by a friend in London and which he took the precaution of having registered, and sent it to the India Office. That letter was also disregarded. Not a single syllable of reply was vouchsafed to this poor Mahomedan fellow-subject of ours; and if it had not been for the fact that the matter was brought by me before this House at the instance of friends in London, no more, probably, would have been heard of the matter, and nothing would have been done by the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues at the India Office. In consequence of the questions I repeatedly put to him, the right hon. Gentleman admitted that it was, at the least, uncivil that his office did not take the trouble to reply to those letters. I say it was not only uncivil, but positively unbusiness-like, and I want to know if this is the usual manner in which the business of the office is conducted. It is a monstrous thing that, because a man happens to be a Mahomedan and a native of Kashmir, he should be treated like a dog, when he has a solid grievance to bring before the Government of the country. No other person would be so treated as long as he was not a native of India or some other foreign portion of Her Majesty's dominions. The Government seem to have got a little frightened at last when I pursued my inquiries in this House; and so I find that on the 24th of February, Abdul Rasoul was requested to go to the India Office and see one of the officials. He saw Sir Gerald Fitzgerald, who offered him £10 for maintenance, and said: "I suppose you are willing to go back to India." I want to point out that at this time the Government were informing me in this House that they knew nothing of the circumstances of the case, and were waiting for information from India. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Gorst) shakes his head, but the official reply in the pages of Hansard proves that it was so. The interview to which I refer took place at the India Office before the 24th of February. On the 9th of March I got this answer from the Government—

"Abdul Rasoul was offered the refund of his expenses since arrival in November, 1890; a passage to Bombay and permission to return to Kashmir. He was sent to London at his own request. If Abdul Rasoul demands compensation, he should address himself in the first instance to the Government of India, and, in the event of their refusing him redress, appeal to the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State is not in possession of information which enables him to state the cause of complaint or prefer any charge."

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): What I said in reply to the first question was that the Government could take no steps to deal with Abdul Rasoul until they received information from India. Two days after that the information came that the Government of India paid the passage of this man to London. Immediately after that we offered to pay his passage back again.

MR. CONYBEARE: That is all very well; but the question I have been hammering at, and could get no answer from the Government to, was as to the guilt or innocence of this man. Why should this man be treated in this infamous way, and then be sent back in this hugger-mugger fashion, in order to shut the matter up in this House? Why should he be sent back before we were informed whether he was guilty or not? The information I asked for in the first place I tried to obtain again and again, and only to-day, for the first time, have I been able to get a clear answer. What was the cause of complaint, if any, against this gentleman? At the time the right hon. Gentleman gave me the answer I have read he had not learned, or, if he had, he took very good care not to tell me, the cause of complaint against this gentleman. His words are—

"The Secretary of State is not in possession of information which enables him to state the cause of complaint or prefer any charge."

Yet, without knowing whether this man was guilty or not, they offered to pay his debts in this country and to send him back to India free of expense. I say, if the man was innocent he had no business to be treated in that way. If he was not innocent he ought to have been brought to justice; and, in any case, we have a right to know definitely what was the charge the Government were prepared to bring against him, and whether they have now become convinced that there was no ground whatever for that charge. It is not a charge really, but merely a matter of suspicion. The right hon. Gentleman says the Government had reason to believe or suspect that Abdul Rasoul was in communication with Dhuleep Singh, who had issued a treasonable Proclamation. A more humbugging way of dealing with one of Her Majesty's subjects I never heard of. If the Government had any solid ground for suspecting that there was any treasonable communication between this man and Dhuleep Singh, I say we have a right to know exactly whether they have come to the conclusion or not that the man was not guilty of any such treasonable practice as they thought he might be guilty of at the time of his arrest. But the importance of that is this: If this gentleman was kidnapped and imprisoned for nine months without a single charge or accusation being brought against him, and if the Government now—and they have by their action in offering him money, and offering to send him back to Kashmir—if the Government admit that there was no ground for the accusation against him, if he was not guilty of the matters of which he was suspected, have we no right to demand that this unfortunate man should have something in the way of compensation? They say, "We won't consider the question of compensation." I have a letter from the India Office saying, "We will simply pay your debts within certain limits; we will pay your passage to Bombay, and give you a safe conduct to Kashmir," and in the event of his refusing these terms, in the event of his pressing for something in the shape of compensation for these grievous wrongs which the action of the Government showed that they believed to exist, and were not justified by reason of there being no guilt attaching to him at all, they say they will have nothing more to do with him. Now, I do not know that it is of any use pressing the right hon. Gentleman further on this question of compensation. But the House and the country will realise what this state of things is—that a man may be kidnapped and imprisoned in this way upon the harrest suspicion, and treated with all sorts of indignity, and brought against his will, under police escort, to this country; and then the Government, by their action, admit that there was nothing against him whatever; that he was an innocent man, and when he asks for some compensation and redress of his wrongs he is thrown back on what I venture to call a very illusionary promise or statement of the Government. They said the right persons to apply to are the Government of India. I should like to know what sort of redress this man would get from the Viceroy? How is he to proceed, I should like to know? In India he would have no chance whatever of getting any compensation. Is there any Court in India before which this gentleman could bring his complaint against the Viceroy? Could he in any way attack the Viceroy in the Courts with a view to obtaining any redress? And probably the only answer he would get if he were to bring this matter before any Court in India, would be to be told "This is not a matter that concerns us; we derive our instructions and our information from London, and you must go to Lord Cross, who is the supreme authority in this matter, to whom these demands should be in the first place made." That is a style of playing at battledore and shuttlecock with the rights of our Indian fellow-subjects which is disgraceful, and it would be a novelty to most Members to find that such a thing could be possible at all. Therefore, I must again press the Government to re-consider their position in this matter. I think I have shown, and it must be clear to everybody, first, that this man has been wronged; and, secondly, that the Government know that they were wrong and that they have dealt unjustly by him, and I want the House to realise the effect upon the minds of our Indian fellow-subjects of such treatment. It is all very well to treat this matter as a matter affecting an individual. The effect of an incident of this kind will be far-reaching. It will permeate through every corner of India, and quite right, that it should. And then, what effect do you suppose it will have upon the feelings of loyalty towards this country on the part of the people of India? How can you expect that the people of India will be satisfied with the paternal despotism of which we are always boasting in India, when they find that Europeans go scot-free, that the fact of a man being a European is enough to prevent his being touched under these old-fashioned Regulations, while any unfortunate native may not only be detained in the way this gentleman was, but may have all his possessions and lands attacked and taken from him as well? I will just refer for one moment to the Regulations under which this matter takes place, and I want to draw attention to them for this reason: In the question I asked this afternoon the right hon. Gentleman was forced to admit that his previous answer to me was wrong when he said this gentleman was arrested under Regulation 3 of 1818. And it shows how little the right hon. Gentleman knows about this matter himself. There are several Regulations, and Regulation 3 of 1818 applies solely to Bengal. The Government had no more power to deal with this gentleman under Regulation 3 of 1818 than they had to deal with him under the Habeas Corpus Act, which unfortunately does not affect India in the smallest degree. The Regulation which the Government did act under was the Regulation passed in 1827, No. 25. The Regulation 3 of 1818 applies solely to Bengal; this Regulation of 1827 applies solely to Bombay. This is the Act under which this incident has taken place, and the Preamble of this Regulation states that,

"Whereas reasons of State embracing the due maintenance of alliances formed by the British Government with foreign Powers, the preservation of tranquillity in native territory, and the security of British dominions from foreign hostility and internal commotion, occasionally render it necessary to place under restraint individuals against whom there may not be sufficient ground for instituting any judicial proceedings, when such proceedings might not be adapted to the nature of the case, or may from other reasons be inadvisable and imprudent."

Then the Regulation follows, which enables the Government to arrest and detain any native gentleman whom they may suspect, and so on. That is Chapter I. of this Regulation. The second chapter contains rules for the attachment of lands for reasons of State, and for the removing of such attachments. Therefore, you have by the two classes of Regulations, which are no doubt very similar in both territories—Bengal and

Bombay—first of all enabled the Government on the barest suspicion, or for no reason at all, to arrest and imprison a native gentleman; and, secondly, to deprive him of his property and his estates. I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman upon that point whether it is not the case that these Regulations apply solely to natives, and whether it would be possible to attack any European subject under these Regulations? If I am not misinformed, these Regulations are strictly limited to natives of India. And I want to know why at the present time should such a Regulation as that be maintained with this odious distinction between the English Governors of the country and our native fellow-subjects, considering that it might not be inconceivable that European emissaries might also—if there is any ground for supposing that native emissaries do—create disturbances and disaffection? Now I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I have made this matter perfectly clear. As I have said before, I have brought this matter forward because I believe that it will be a perfectly new thing to most people that this Regulation exists. I repeat that these Regulations under which the Government acts are old-fashioned Regulations belonging to the year 1818 and 1827, when the circumstances were totally different to what they are at the present time. I venture to think that most people will agree with me that whatever may be done in this particular case of Abdul Rasoul, it is quite time that these Regulations should, in the interests of good government in India, be abrogated, or, at all events, no longer acted upon. I cannot conceive anything more calculated to destroy confidence in the justice of our rule in India than the maintenance and exercise of Regulations such as that which I have brought under the notice of this House. There is another point I want to address the Government upon before I resume my seat. It has reference to a question which I have asked several times as to the number of persons who have been imprisoned under this Regulation. I asked, in the first place, for the names and numbers of the persons so imprisoned, but the right hon. Gentleman said it would be prejudicial to the interests of the country to give such particulars. But there can be nothing prejudicial to the interests of the country in giving the numbers of the persons over a series of years who have been thus treated. We want to know how these extraordinary Regulations have been put in force. I again ask the right hon. Gentleman why he objects to give a Return showing the number of persons who since 1815 have been deprived either of their lands or their liberty? I thank the House for having allowed me to bring the matter forward, and I hope I shall not be considered as having unduly trespassed upon the time of the House, having regard to the magnitude of the subject. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be able to give us some satisfactory assurance on the point. If not, I am afraid we will have to avail ourselves of the alteration of the Rule by putting down an Amendment to the Motion to go into Committee on the Indian Budget for the purpose of further discussing this matter.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Conybeare.)

*(5.35.) SIR J. GORST: I hope in a very words to be able to assure the House that my noble Friend the Secretary for India is desirous not only of treating this unfortunate man with justice, but with kindness and generosity. There are four matters which the hon. Member for Camborne has dealt with in his Motion for the Adjournment of the House, and I may be permitted to say that he has rather mixed them together, but I will endeavour to keep them distinct. The first question is whether this Abdul Rasoul was properly arrested and put in prison by the Government of India. The second is the question whether he was deported or not to this country. The third is the question, what is to be done with Abdul Rasoul now he is in this country. And the fourth is the claim of Abdul Rasoul for compensation for imprisonment, which the hon. Member has rather mixed up with the other points. I shall take each of these four points separately, and deal with them frankly to the House. The first question is, was the Government of India justified in arresting and imprisoning Abdul Rasoul in India? That is a question which this House, even if it wishes to do so, is not yet in a position to discuss, because, as I have repeatedly stated to the hon. and learned Member, in answer to his questions, we are not in possession of the information which will enable the Secretary of State himself to judge whether the Government of India, in arresting Abdul Rasoul, has exercised wisely or not the discretion entrusted to it by law. Now, the hon. Member has found great fault with the existence of the arbitrary and despotic power given by these Regulations to the Government in India. That is a large question which this House might discuss if it is disposed to do so. But India, it must be remembered, is a despotic country; it is not a free country; it is a country which is governed by a very arbitrary and a very strong despotism, and the power given by these Regulations to which the hon. Member refers, is one of those powers which are put into the hands of arbitrary Governments, and which must be exercised by an arbitrary and despotic Government from time to time. The hon. Member asks me whether these Regulations are applied only to natives and not to Europeans. They apply to everybody who goes to India. If the hon. Member for Camborne were to go into the Province of Bombay, and were suspected of acting in a manner which was likely to interfere with the security of the British dominions from foreign hostility, it would be the duty of the Viceroy of India to arrest the hon. Member, and to detain him for such time as would prevent him from carrying out his nefarious intentions. The hon. Member says he has experienced great difficulty in drawing from me the reason of the arrest of Abdul Rasoul. That is quite true. I have had the information dragged from me with great reluctance, and it is the hon. Member for Camborne, and not the noble Lord the Secretary of State or myself, who is responsible for the publication of the facts. During the last two months I have been most anxious not to state the reason. The Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, having made his submission to Her Majesty, I was most reluctant to rake up those matters which for the Maharajah's sake ought to be forgotten. But the hon. Member, by his reiterated question, has compelled my noble Friend to tell the House the reason why this man was arrested. He was arrested because the Government of India had reason to believe that this Sheikh was an emissary of the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, and arrived in India for the purpose of stirring up discussion and commotion in our Indian Empire.

MR. CONYBEARE: On what evidence?

*SIR J. GORST: I refer the hon. Member to the Regulation, which places the discretion in the hands of the Government of India. It says that—“When the considerations stated in the Preamble of this Regulation require it, the Governor in Council has power,” &c.

Considerations of public safety required it. What evidence has the hon. Member that the Governor in Council has exercised his power unwisely or corruptly in this matter? Is the House of Commons going to act without Papers, without any information whatever, and merely upon the ipse dixit of the hon. Member for Camborne? Is it, in the absence of the necessary material, going to discuss whether the Government of India have exercised the very great power conferred upon it by Statute, with proper discretion or not? If the House of Commons wishes to discuss it; if any hon. Member raises a Motion on the subject, and discusses it when the Papers have been received from India, of course it will be my duty to defend the Government of India in this House. But I strongly appeal to this House not to discuss any matter of the kind, unless it has some prima facie evidence brought forward to show that the Government of India was animated by some personal or corrupt motive. I ask the House to leave the discretion where the law has put it, with the Government of India, and not to discuss whether their discretion has been properly exercised or not, in the absence of information. Abdul Rasoul was arrested according to law; the arrest was made on the responsibility of the Government of India; and we have no means at present of knowing whether the discretion of the Government of India was rightly or wrongly exercised. With regard to the second question: Was he deported? The hon. Member has used the word deported in order to show that the man was sent to London against his will, whereas he was sent at his own request, and was not deported. Fortunately, by a piece of very good fortune, there has been transmitted from India a copy of the Petition which was presented from the Sheikh Abdul Rasoul to Mr. Mackenzie, Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces, for his release. This is a remarkable document, and it disposes so entirely of the ingenious conjectures of the hon. Member for Camborne, that the House will permit me to read it—

"I take the liberty of craving your gracious attention to my following poor Petition. In short, His Highness Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, who is my old friend and master, has received pardon of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Empress of India. I also lay before your honour my humble Petition, that you will be pleased to solicit my release. If I should be released I give my most solemn undertaking that I will in no way in future do or join in anything against the Government of Her Most Gracious Majesty. If I should be graciously released I will request the Committee to return to my native place, Srinigar, in Kashmir. On the other hand, if the Government shall not accept my return to Kashmir, then I request to be sent back to England. I am without funds or means of paying my passage, or any means of support. His Highness the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh would supply the necessary funds for my passage to England, and for my future a sufficient year's salary."

The hon. Member for Camborne spoke of the cruelty of the Government of India in landing a man at London Docks without a penny for his support. But the Government of India, when they sent him, had reason to suppose that if he got back to London His Highness the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh would support him. On arrival, however, Abdul Rasoul did not go to his old friend and master Dhuleep Singh, but he went to the hon. Member for Camborne, who has treated him ever since as having a grievance. That leads me to a third point, namely; What is to be done with this man? Well, as the hon. Member for Camborne himself admits there was this unfortunate man over here in London without a penny to call his own, longing to get back to his native home at Srinigar in Kashmir, from which he had been absent for a period of 35 years. Taking him at his word, my noble Friend the Secretary of State said to the man, "If you desire it I will pay your passage back to India. I will pay the debts you have contracted in London, and I will also guarantee that the Government of India shall not arrest you when you get there, and that you shall be permitted to go to your native home at Srinigar." But the moment this was said the man turned completely round. I do not know whether it was at the instigation of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Camborne, but at any rate he said "I will not go without compensation." Matters were thus brought to a deadlock.

Sir J. Gorst

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. I did not make any such suggestion.

*SIR J. GORST: The hon. Gentleman may take it that that remark was merely in the nature of a flower of rhetoric. At all events, we have the fact that this man, Abdul Rasoul, was here in London expressing the desire to get back to his native place, and that when made acquainted with that fact the Secretary of State was ready and willing to pay his fare home, and that the moment this offer was made to him the man refused to go because he wanted to get compensation, and thought he might be able to get it through the medium of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Camborne and the House of Commons. Now, Sir, it has been said that the offer made by the Secretary of State to send the man back to Kashmir was a proof that my noble Friend knew that he had not been justly treated. I reply that it was nothing of the kind. The Secretary of State has the most perfect confidence in the discretion of the Government of India; and when, in consideration of the altered circumstances, the Government of India expressed no objection to the man's return, the Secretary of State was glad to help him to return; just as when he found that the Government of India were of opinion that the man was a danger to the peace of India, he had no doubt the discretion of the Government of India had been very properly exercised in arresting him.

MR. CONYBEARE: What was the evidence?

*SIR J. GORST: That I have declined, and must decline, to state. I have not got the evidence here, and if I had I should certainly decline to state it unless I were called upon by an overwhelming majority of the Members of this House to do so. I believe, however, that the majority of Members in this House are sufficiently inspired with good sense that they would not ask for that evidence unless they believed that it was of a character which it was absolutely necessary to produce. With regard to the question of compensation which has been raised in this case, I may say at once that that claim is not one which I have shown the slightest desire or inclination to shirk. All I can say on that subject is, that if it is brought forward in a proper manner it shall be fully considered. But the proper course to take would be, in the first instance, to bring the claim before the Government of India, who are acquainted with all the facts of the case. Abdul Rasoul must petition the Government of India for compensation, and put forward in support of this claim the grounds of injustice and ill-treatment upon which he founds it, and if, on full consideration of all the circumstances, the Government of India should refuse his request, he will then have a right to appeal to the Secretary of State, by whom, I may say, in answer to the rhetoric of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Camborne, his application will be fully and fairly considered. This is what the man has to do if he wants compensation. There is no such thing in the present state of the case as getting compensation from the India Office. We could only give the man compensation on an appeal from a refusal of the Government of India. The hon. Member for Camborne is derivative of this point, but I would remind him that you do not tell a man to go direct to the House of Lords for justice, you only go there by way of appeal. In the same way, you cannot allow a man to apply for compensation directly to the Secretary of State. He must, in the first instance, submit his case to those who are acquainted with the circumstances. I have now dealt with the case as it has been brought before the House as shortly as I could consistently with the facts, and I hope I have said sufficient to convince this House, that the Secretary of State is desirous of doing everything he possibly can that is not only fair but even generous in this matter; that there is no wish on his part, or on the part of the Government of India, to oppress or persecute Abdul Rasoul, and that if that person had only placed himself in the hands of good advisers—instead of his case being now made the occasion for a Motion for the Adjournment of the House, and used for Parliamentary purposes of Party—if this native had been advised by those whom he consulted to accept the offer made by the Secretary of State and had gone back to India, he would have been very much happier and better off than he is likely to be while he remains in the hands of his present advisers.

(5.55.) MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House are very glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India back again in his place in better health and vigour. Having said so much in reference to the right hon. Gentleman himself, I now have in my place in Parliament to make a serious complaint against the Indian Government. Their conduct is, in point of fact, so bad that Irish officials are becoming respectable by comparison. Now, Sir, about 130 years ago—[Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen do not seem to be very fond of ancient history, but I wish to remind them that about 130 years ago the elder Pitt got up in the House of Commons and said—

“The iniquities of Indian Administration are so rife that they smell from earth to heaven and from heaven to earth again.”

Well, Sir, what have we here? We have before us the case of a poor poverty-stricken and a defenceless man. We have that man, by the confession of the Indian Government themselves, arrested on no charge whatever, and not only on no charge, but also on no warrant. He is then kept in gaol for a period of nine months without the shadow of a pretence or any excuse except the mere suspicion which has been communicated to the Indian Government. Let us compare the position of this man to that of the noble Lord the Secretary for India. Lord Cross receives a handsome salary from this country, whereas the average income of an ordinary native of India is something like 1½d. a day. Against this 1½d. Lord Cross is in receipt of £5,000 a year. When this poor, wretched, poverty-stricken man goes to Lord Cross and states his case, and the reasons which induced him to bring it forward, Lord

Cross turns him with contumely from his door. Let us again consider by way of contrast and comparison the amount of personal liberty which is revealed by this transaction as possessed by the natives of India. Why, Sir, if this kind of thing is to go on a man might as well be in Ireland as India. Even the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for India is compelled to admit that that great bulwark of liberty of the subject, the Habeas Corpus, has no operation in India. No doubt it is a pleasant confession to hon. Members opposite that there is no Habeas Corpus Act in India. But let me recall the facts of this case. For nine months this man was kept in gaol without warrant and without charge. Had he been in England he could have demanded to be brought up under the Habeas Corpus Act. According to his own account that man has been deported from his own country to a country where he was perfectly friendless, and where he had no means of support. Why, I ask, will not the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for India lay the evidence in this case before the House? If India is to be retained under the British flag and the British Constitution, why should not the House of Commons, having regard to the interests of the 250,000,000 of people over whom this country exercises the rule, have the Return they ask for laid upon the Table, so that hon. Members might be able to go into the question and form their own judgment upon it? Why, I ask, should not the people of India have afforded to them the same comfort and consolation that are afforded to every oppressed man who has the knowledge that his grievance will be justly and properly investigated, and that injustice will be exposed before the British public. The right hon. Gentleman has referred at great length to the Regulations of 1827 having been endorsed by Parliament. No doubt that is so, but I would point out to the House that those Regulations were made 30 years before the East India Company were disestablished, and that they were made by a Board of Control, which was practically outside the control of the House of Commons. There was undoubtedly a revision of these Regulations every 30 years, but that, after all, was merely a formal matter; and even though they were endorsed by the House of Commons, they were endorsed by the House of Commons of 1828, which was very differently composed to the present House of Commons. If the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs should think it necessary to speak on this question, he may tell me that those Regulations were Bombay Regulations, and that the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for India, whose administration I admit is marked with great ability, is not in Bombay. But I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Foreign Under Secretary whether he will get up and say he ever knew of a single case in which a European was arrested under such circumstances, and by the exercise of such powers as these. It may seem a strange term to use if I speak of "bullying the natives," but, Sir, I do use that phrase, and I find it has been used by no less a person than Lord Lytton, when holding the high office of Governor General of India. Lord Lytton is reported to have said in a private letter, and the statement has never been denied, that he, as Governor General, had only two courses to pursue—"to cheat them or to bully them, and he preferred to cheat them." Will Lord Lytton deny that he said this? The question may be put to him in Paris by telegraph to-morrow, and an answer can easily be obtained if the Government wish to obtain it. Now, here is a case in which a man has been absolutely bullied, and only on suspicion of having taken part with Dhuleep Singh; but when Dhuleep Singh has been forgiven for his part in what took place, his accomplice is kept in prison many months after the principal has been released. The right hon. Gentleman commented upon the document the man wrote. It must be remembered Abdul Rasoul had been in prison many months when he wrote the document, and that people who are imprisoned and who suffer keenly will do almost anything to secure release. I certainly hope my hon. Friend will press his Motion to a Division. It ought to be pressed to a Division if this were only a case involving the liberty of this poor man. I agree with what was once said by a great countryman of my own—Edmund Burke—with reference to India; he said he hoped the time would come when the personal liberty of the subject would be as respected and as secure in the heart of our Indian Possessions as it was in the Strand in the City of London. We govern the people of India and impose on them burdens that we have not ourselves. Mr. Bright once said that the Government of India was a pure despotism. Do we work that despotism for the good of the natives or for our own gain? Her Majesty's Government have tried for four months to suppress this case, and therefore it is, I trust, my hon. Friend will go to a Division. I know very well he will be abused to-morrow morning in the Tory papers; but he will have this satisfaction, that what he has said and what I have said will be read by those by whom we most wish it to be read, namely, by the native populations of India.

*(6.3.) MR. W. MCARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell): Had time permitted, I should have found it necessary to differ very widely indeed from the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, but I want to make a few remarks with reference to what fell from the Under Secretary of State for India. We are not used to hearing from him flowers of rhetoric, but are accustomed to the more solid fodder he is in the habit of giving us in reply to questions and Motions. I am bound to say, I think that on the whole the Under Secretary made out a fairly reasonable case, except in one particular to which I wish to address my observations. I have always been one of those people who, having seen something of native races, appreciate the great difficulty English people have in dealing with them; and I think if there is anything about which this House ought to be most careful, it is in passing votes of indiscriminate censure against the action of Englishmen who very often do their duty under circumstances of very great difficulty. As I say, I do not altogether sympathise with the speech of my hon. Friend (Mr. Mac Neill) after the speech of the Under Secretary; but I think a great deal of harm is done abroad, and very wrong impression often conveyed of Englishmen in authority abroad, by the kind of defence their action receives in this House from responsible Ministers. I do not say whether this man was right, or wrong. I do not intend to argue whether the Regulations are right, or wrong. I am inclined to think they are right. I think it is necessary to make this kind of Regulations in India. But it is unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman should have chaffed my hon. Friend the Member for Camborne (Mr. Conybeare) because he called attention to the case of a native in India who he thought had been unfairly treated. If there is anything which can excuse a Motion for the Adjournment of the House it is surely the case of some supposed injustice to a native subject of the Queen, because what does our great Empire abroad rest upon? No one will say we can maintain our Empire simply by the number of soldiers we have got. We maintain it in India, as we maintain it elsewhere, because this country has always been able to convince coloured races that in the main our rule is a fair and just rule, and that as far as the English people can provide, and as far as the House of Commons can provide, every native, wherever he lives, will get as fair treatment from English officials as he would if he were an Englishman. But if you are going to scoff at everybody who calls attention to a case of injustice, if you are going to protest against giving the House of Commons any information on these subjects, it seems to me you are going the best way to convince every native in India and throughout the world that you have got something to conceal and that you are afraid to explain. I put it to the Under Secretary whether he would not have saved a great deal of time by giving us a frank and straightforward answer when he was first asked for the information? I assure the right hon. Gentleman that there is no desire on the part of hon. Members who put questions on Indian and colonial matters to be regarded as opposed to him. We ask questions because we are anxious for information, and I do not think it ought to be thought we ask them for the purpose of damaging the Government, or of making Party capital. Indian and Colonial questions are not Party questions, and when we on this side interrogate the Under Secretary, we do not want flowers of rhetoric from him, but frank and plain answers. If he gives us such answers he may rest assured we shall not make Party capital out of them, but these questions should be fully and fairly answered, so that we may feel satisfied that justice has been done.

Question put, and negatived.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

TAXES (REGULATION OF REMUNERATION) BILL (changed from "ASSESSMENT OF TAXES (REGULATION OF REMUNERATION BILL.")—(No. 221.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

(6.10.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I should like to take the opportunity to express my appreciation of the great step forward which the passing of this Bill marks, because it puts an end to the whole system of poundage in the collection of Income Tax. I thank the Government very sincerely for having fulfilled their pledge to carry this great reform. Under this Bill neither assessors of Income Tax, collectors, nor clerks will be financially interested in the amount they collect or in the assessments they arrange.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

*(6.16.) MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): Before proceeding to conclude the remarks which I commenced on Tuesday, I desire to be permitted to call attention to one fact, and that is that I was unable to finish my speech on Tuesday evening solely owing to the obstruction of the Government and the young lions of the Tory Party. It will be in the recollection of the Committee that a great deal of time was wasted in consequence of the refusal of the Government to afford information on the most essential and fundamental points. The arithmetic of the Government is all wrong, and they now know it. They consequently wish to avoid discussion, trusting implicitly to the mechanical majority which they usually keep at hand in the pellucid atmosphere of the smoking room. I only wish they would keep it there, and not bring it into the House of Commons to disturb the calm deliberations of hon. Members. The Amendment is to strike out certain words with the view of preventing the general assets of the taxpayers of this country from being pledged to secure the Land Stock. I have already pointed out to the Committee that the proposal in this Bill, namely, that the purchase price shall be a capitalisation of the gross rent of the holdings, and that the instalment payable shall be a fixed one for 49 years, must reduce the tenant purchasers to bankruptcy, but the Government, in spite of the recommendation of their own Royal Commission which sat in 1887, and which recommended that judicial rents should be revisable every five years, now recommend that rents should not be revisable for 49 years. The Return, which on the Motion of the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division (Mr. J. E. Ellis) has been issued with regard to the operations under the Ashbourne Acts, shows that a considerable number of tenants have defaulted already. I find that one poor man was made to buy at as much as 38 years' purchase, another at 37½ years, and so on. I will not go into the details of the Return, but simply remind the Committee that the average price of purchase was 25 years. What does this mean? It means simply that the instalment to be paid to the State on the extortionate sale price is as high as the Poor Law valuation. That will not be denied. These tenants who are now defaulting, and whose instalments are being paid by the British taxpayer, have defaulted because their instalments instead of being reduced from £100 to £68, which the right hon. Gentleman assured us was the scheme of his Bill—

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I never said anything of the kind.

*MR. KEAY: I am surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman dispute it. He certainly took a supposititious average of 17 years' purchase, but that is exactly where my point comes in. I say that when I take an average of the actual cases of default under the Ashbourne Acts, the average turns out to be, not 17 years, but 25 years' purchase. The right hon. Gentleman said that looking to the general average of 17 years' purchase at which the tenants would get their land, the result would be that the tenants who paid £100 now as rent would pay £68 of normal annuity under the Bill. I hope I have convinced the right hon. Gentleman that I am right, and he is wrong, in regard to the words he used on 24th March of last year. There is not a single clause in this Bill that is of a character to check or prevent the indefinite enlargement of this evil of the systematic over-valuation of holdings, and the consequent bankruptcy of the tenants. That I hold to be a most urgent reason why the risk of the British taxpayer should be eliminated from this Bill. Moreover, the Consolidated Fund is brought in for the purpose of making a "temporary advance." I hold that in the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman's Bill the idea of a temporary advance is perfectly illusory, impossible, and absurd. I am prepared, in the face of the right hon. Gentleman and of the Committee, to prove that fact by the hardest possible arithmetic. We must consider what the word "temporary" means, and I would urge gentlemen on the Treasury Bench to analyse it and tell us what it means. I endeavoured in February last to ascertain this by a certain question addressed to the Government. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in his reply to me laid great stress on the alleged temporary character of the advance; so much so, indeed, that he told me I had "suppressed the fact" of its temporary character, and had by so doing suppressed a material fact. He said that the Consolidated Fund would be "at once recouped" from the Guarantee Fund. Now, I say that this is an arithmetical impossibility. The right hon. Gentleman at the instance of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) promised a Return showing the working of the Sinking Fund as connected with the Guarantee Fund, and I have that Return here. He first made it for 10 years only, but very kindly, at our suggestion, he extended it to 30 years. I am sorry to say, however, that he positively declined to extend it to the whole 49 years, although I represented to him that the fresh advances to be made increased between the 30th and the 49th year immensely more than between the 1st and 30th year. I have, however, made a Return for the 49 years myself. The right hon. Gentleman said it would be very costly to produce such a Return, but I had it made by a clerk at an expenditure of about £2. The right hon. Gentleman shows, however, on page 4 of his own Return, that at the end of the 30th year there will be due from the tenant purchasers instalments amounting to £1,845,000. But the whole of the Guarantee Fund of the right hon. Gentleman has a fixed annual income for 49 years of, in round numbers, £1,200,000. The matter is one, therefore, of simple subtraction: you have only to subtract £1,200,000 from £1,845,000, and the result is a deficit of £645,000 arising in the 30th year alone, which deficit the Consolidated Fund has got to pay. The right hon. Gentleman has asserted that the Guarantee Fund covers all the risk, and that these advances from the Consolidated Fund are to be merely temporary. But assuming that he can get in the whole of the £1,200,000, that is, both the cash portion and the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund, a so-called temporary advance will have to be made from the Consolidated Fund of £645,000 on that year's operations, and each year the deficit thus made up will be added to. I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to solve this arithmetical puzzle arising out of his own Bill. I say the Government are declaring that they are going to do impossibilities. I will take the figures a step further. In the 40th year, supposing repudiation does not take place till then, the deficit will have risen from £645,000 to £1,055,000 on that 40th year's transactions alone, and thus the Consolidated Fund will have to go on increasing its advances year by year until at the end of the 49th year the sum owing to it will be something like £10,000,000 sterling, or even double that amount, if the re-lending is still continued. I hope I have made myself clear to the right hon. Gentleman. As he cannot make up these vast yearly deficits out of the current year's income of the Guarantee Fund the deficit in the Consolidated Fund will necessarily increase year by year, instead of being temporary and reducible, as asserted by this clause. I ventured the other night to say that the right hon. Gentleman was disregarding the old saying that it was impossible to put a quart of water into a pint pot, but the Government hydraulic machinery is so powerful that he has apparently succeeded in getting it in, and now, in this clause, he is preparing to take it out again. There is only one remark to be made with regard to this network of securities, and that is that it is a network in the sense that a net holds no water. But another, and in fact the crowning, monstrosity of this enormous financial scheme is exposed by my Amendment, for the words which I propose to leave out must be read alongside of Clause 6, Sub-section 3. I think the effect of so reading them will surprise the Committee very much, and I think it would have surprised the right hon. Gentleman had I not already taken so much trouble to educate him. The advances which are to be made from the Consolidated Fund are necessary to pay up all the different Sinking Funds as well as to pay the dividends to the public. Supposing that the tenants have, through famine or repudiation, committed default, and the Consolidated Fund has had at the end of the 40th year to provide a sum of £1,055,000, the Bill provides that while the British taxpayer is to go on year after year meeting the deficits and swelling the Sinking Funds with new British money, this new money is to be re-lent in the same way to another set of rotten landlords and rotten tenants year by year. I am glad to see the right hon. Gentleman is able to laugh at this. I asked a plain question on the subject and got a straightforward, honest answer. I asked if it were true that the new moneys thus forced from the British taxpayer were to be re-lent, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the 5th February admitted that it was so, but qualified the answer by what? By the astounding statement that it would always be optional to and not compulsory on the Treasury to sanction these additional advances of the resources of the British nation. It actually comes to this, therefore, that the House of Commons is asked to resign to the Treasury its duty of looking after the public money. I decline to be a party to any such breach of trust. And I believe that no one in this House would dare to face his constituents on such an issue. We know that all this is painful to the Chief Secretary to listen to, because he has not got his young lions here to interrupt me, and my task of explaining the Amendment has consequently been made so much the easier. If the right hon. Gentleman will give me a fair hearing and will keep his young lions in order, I will promise to occupy as little time as possible in discussing this Bill. I think that even he will admit that this is a grave matter. As all reply has been deliberately withheld up to this time, I shall, in order to secure an answer on the present occasion, conclude with these four pointed questions to the Chief Secretary. (1) Is there any precedent for purchasing a fixed property at a price based on capitalising the gross instead of the net annual income, and can any such purchase be a safe transaction to be guaranteed by the State? (2) Have not the defaulters under the Ashbourne Acts, by paying an average of 25 years' purchase, now saddled themselves with instalments to the State about 20 per cent. higher than they would have paid of judicial rent to their landlord if they had not bought at all, but instead of buying had gone into the Land Court? Hon. Members opposite may laugh at that, but the right hon. Gentleman will not deny that the thesis on which he has all along defended his Bill is that the tenants will not fail to pay because they are getting £100 of rent lowered down to £68 of annuity. But Returns show that the defaulting tenants have been made to pay an annuity to the State £100; whereas, if they had gone into the Land Court and got judicial rents fixed, they would only have had to pay £80. My third question is: How will the £645,000, which is the right hon. Gentleman's admitted deficit arising on the transactions of the 30th year, be "at once recouped?"

(4) Is it not the fact that, under this clause, read with Clause 6, Sub-section 3, the Bill provides for a continued further advance going on equivalent to the capital of the Sinking Funds, even if these Sinking Funds are filled up year by year entirely by yearly drafts on the Consolidated Fund to pay the default?

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 26, to leave out from the word "paid," to the word "out," in page 2, line 1.—(Mr. Keay.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'as a temporary advance out' stand part of the Clause."

(6.49.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Committee have just heard from the hon. Member a recapitulation of a speech made before, garnished with a large number of abusive comments on the Government for not having dealt with the speech on a previous occasion. The hon. Member, who is not a very old Member of this House, must be aware that undoubtedly it is the duty of the Government to lay before the Committee arguments in support of their Bill, but it is not their duty to take seriatim every point, good, bad, or indifferent—and the hon. Member's points are usually bad or indifferent—and to waste time discussing at length, not the case itself, but certain aspects of it which the hon. Member who made the speech thinks are adequate to the merit of his own performance. The Amendment, with regard to which it has pleased the hon. Member to read the Government a lecture, alleges want of security to the British taxpayer. That question was discussed on the First Reading of the Bill last year, on the Second Reading also, on the introduction of the Bill this year, and on an Amendment brought forward earlier in this Committee. If any point has been thoroughly threshed out from beginning to end it has been this. Everything that can be said on the point has been said; and, therefore, I do not think it necessary to go into the character of the security again. I may, however, point out one or two of the grosser fallacies into which the hon. Member appears to have fallen. In the first place, the hon. Member says it is impossible that a proper price should be given for holdings estimated on a gross and not a net rental. The business of the Land Commissioners is to see that the price does not exceed the fair amount which the tenant may properly give for the holding, and it does not in the least matter whether they calculate on the gross rent or on the net rent. They cannot be compelled to adopt as the basis of their calculations the net rental as defined by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian in the Bill of 1886. The hon. Member has brought up an ancient mare's nest which troubled him much last year. He seems to think that directly repayments begin the solvency of the Guarantee Fund will be imperilled. This cannot be so. In proportion as the loans are paid they are let out again, and the original security is not impaired. I do not think the hon. Member raised any other point which it is worth while troubling the House with.

MR. KEAY: The right hon. Gentleman has not said how the £645,000 is to be recouped.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Member will reflect—if the security provided for the £30,000,000 is sufficient, it will be equally good for the advances to be made accordingly as the original loan is repaid. The question whether or not it should be a continuous operation does not arise under this clause. I hope I have satisfied the hon. Member.

MR. KEAY: No.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: At any rate, I have given him the best information in my power. No doubt it is my own stupidity which is responsible, if he does not understand the explanation.

(6.56.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): There was one incidental remark made by the right hon. Gentleman which I considered to be surprising in its character. If the right hon. Gentleman has said one thing more often than another in the course of the present Parliament in connection with land purchase it is that the Land Commissioners are to regard nothing but security. But now the right hon. Gentleman says it is the duty and the business of the Commissioners to see that a fair price or value is given for the land.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What I meant was this: The hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs says that as the holdings in Ireland are sold at the gross rent this is a method always leading to a high price. I replied to the hon. Member that this would not be the case, because it would be the business of the Commissioners to see that the security was ample. My speech must be taken in connection with the speech I answered, and it has no other meaning.

MR. J. MORLEY: If the right hon. Gentleman means security he——

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The whole point of the Debate is in regard to security.

MR. J. MORLEY: The right hon. Gentleman said that it was the business of the Commissioners to see that a fair price or value was given.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should have said, to see that no excessive price or value was given.

MR. J. MORLEY: But whether fair price or excessive price, it is one of the duties of the Commissioners to have regard to the price. He may have said it by inadvertence. I submit that it is a denial of the language used by the right hon. Gentleman during the course of the present Parliament.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I may have used the phrase, but the duty of the Land Commissioners is this: They have to see that no more money is advanced on the holdings than it will properly bear. If I did not convey that meaning I regret it. I hope that I have now made it clear.

(6.59.) MR. G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I shall support the Amendment, not merely on the grounds put forward by the Mover, but on the broad ground also that I object altogether to bleeding the British taxpayer in the last resort. The crux of the whole matter is the security offered by the British taxpayer. It is a tortuous and unintelligible Bill, and this peculiarity is particularly manifest in this clause. This liability of the British taxpayer is, I find, here expressed indirectly as it were, and I may say by surprise, in this apparently small provision in regard to temporary advances. If, under certain circumstances, the Land

Purchase Account should be insufficient, then payments to the extent of the deficiency are to be made as a temporary advance from the Consolidated Fund, and every such advance shall be repaid to the Consolidated Fund out of the Guarantee Fund as provided by this Act. I have searched the Bill through from beginning to end, and I cannot find in any other shape any arrangement in regard to these British advances. What I understand is that the British taxpayer is to make these temporary advances, and get the money back the best way he can. We are asked by this unobtrusive, innocent-looking clause to accept all the liability, and I think we are bound to take good care that we understand the effect of it and the enormous liability it brings upon the British taxpayer. It is a very serious clause. What does it mean? Two or three irremovable Commissioners are to have a statutory right to ladle out enormous sums from the Consolidated Fund for the benefit of Irish landlords and tenants. That is the meaning of the clause, and I think we should fully understand this before we pass it. I daresay these Land Commissioners—Irishmen as they are—are very respectable men, but they are Irishmen; and they would be very degenerate Irishmen if they did not ladle out this British money with a liberal hand when Parliament has entrusted them with this power under this innocent-looking clause. I confess I am rather anxious in my mind when I find the Bill does not meet with more resistance. Irish Members have accepted the Bill, and the only Amendments they will propose, so far as I can gather, are in the direction of asking for more, of doing away with the faint and illusory Irish security the Bill contains, and throwing the whole of the risk upon the British taxpayer. I must say I hoped that this tremendous burden on the British taxpayer would have been vigorously resisted by the leaders of our Party. I was surprised and distressed when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Morley) got up just now to speak to the Amendment to find that he only raised one partial point. I hoped he was going to denounce altogether this proposal to put this enormous liability upon the British taxpayer, but unfortunately he has done nothing of the kind.

MR. J. MORLEY: It has been settled before.

*SIR G. CAMPBELL: My right hon. Friend says it is settled, but I think he accepts that a great deal too easily. We are told of preliminary Resolutions that do not bind the House to anything, and I think this point is not yet settled; it is to be settled by the clause at which we have arrived. I was in hopes that this portion of the Bill would have been vigorously resisted, but I find my right hon. Friend and other right hon. Gentlemen seem to be very easily satisfied with the belief that this question has been settled by a previous vote of the House and do not care to fight it vigorously, as I hoped and expected they would. But while I find so little resistance on the part of our leaders, I cannot help having some faint suspicion that they think that the passing of this Bill may in the future make their course easier; and leading up to their proposals in 1886, which the constituencies so strenuously resisted, I am inclined to think that if £30,000,000 or £40,000,000 are added to the Ashbourne Act, we may find that £50,000,000 or £60,000,000 will have gone for the benefit of the landlord party; and that when the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) returns to power, as we hope he will, and comes to deal with the problem of Home Rule, perhaps we may find in the Home Rule Bill some innocent little clause enabling the remaining Irish landlords to claim the same privileges already given to many of them under the Ashbourne Act and by the Bill now before us.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is travelling very far beyond the immediate Amendment before the Committee. I may also take the opportunity of pointing out to the hon. Members for Kilkenny and Cavan that their Amendments, which are for the omission of the same words, should be discussed at the same time as this.

*SIR G. CAMPBELL: The Amendment before us is to omit the words which authorise these temporary advances out of the Consolidated Fund in case of any deficiency in the payment of these loans, and in that view I venture to submit that that is not a process which will really settle this land question as we were told it might be settled. The land question will always be with us. But we can do this by the Bill: enable landlords who do not like Home Rule in Ireland to sell their estates and clear out of the country.

THE CHAIRMAN: Instead of addressing himself to the Amendment, the hon. Member is discussing the principle of the Bill.

*SIR G. CAMPBELL: I really wish to confine myself to what seems to me to be the principle of the Bill, the burden laid upon the British taxpayer. I venture to think that is the backbone of the Bill contained in the clause we are now discussing. I am opposed to that burden. I am very much opposed to it, even while we retain the power of coercing Irish tenants to repay the advances; but I confess I am still more opposed to it in the view of a Home Rule system, under which we shall lose that power of coercion to compel payment. I am not only opposed to the clause in the Bill which throws such an enormous burden upon the British taxpayer, but I am also uneasy in my mind because the proposal is not more vigorously resisted by our Front Bench, for I am afraid it might lead to the burden being increased when we come to the consideration of Home Rule, and the appropriation of £150,000,000 or £200,000,000 to the object of enabling Irish landlords to clear out of the country.

(7.10.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): With reference to your ruling, Sir, as to the several Amendments, I submit to you that the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. Chance) comes in after the word "as," in the last line, and he moves the omission of words for the purpose of proposing the insertion of words having directly the contrary effect of those proposed by the hon. Member for Elgin, who wishes to discharge the Consolidated Fund of all liability. My hon. Friend desires to place the liability, in case of deficiency, on the Consolidated Fund.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is quite true that the hon. Member for Kilkenny wished to insert words after "as," but that insertion in that line would make nonsense of the clause. It is associated with words in a subsequent Amendment, but his proposal to strike out the words in reference to the temporary advance is the same as that of the hon. Member for Cavan. Although the proposals after the striking out are opposite in their sense, the Debate must take place on the proposal to strike out the words.

(7.11.) MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I must have made a mistake in the form of my Amendment. It was not intended to strike out the word "as," but, adopting that, to go on with the words I propose. I submit that my Amendment has a totally different object, and I would suggest that, as a matter of form, the question should be the retention of the word "as."

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not at all necessary. The real point is whether the words "temporary advance" should be inserted, and whether the advance should be temporary or perpetual. The question of omission must be the subject of our Debate.

*(7.12.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): The object of my Amendment is not, as that of the hon. Member for Elgin, to prevent any advance from the Consolidated Fund, but to substitute a permanent contribution for a temporary advance. My object is to prevent any contribution being made from Irish local resources. There is a difficulty which arises owing to the wording of the clause; and though the Amendment might come in on the first line of the next page, if these words remain in the clause, it becomes nonsense, so that I am obliged first to move the omission of these words.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): May I suggest to the hon. Member that he might attain his object by moving an Amendment to Clause 4?

MR. KNOX: The right hon. Gentleman mistakes the meaning of my Amendment. We object not merely to the contingent guarantee, but to all the local Irish guarantees; and that is the point we want to raise.

Mr. Courtney

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member wishes to provide that the payments shall be made once and finally out of the Consolidated Fund; and that is secured by leaving out the words "temporary advance;" and though the propositions move in divergent directions, they must be discussed on the omission of the same words. The hon. Member is now entitled to discuss his.

(7.15.) MR. CHANCE: I regret that it is necessary to debate two distinct propositions upon one Amendment, but it cannot be helped, and illustrates the great difficulty Members have in dealing with these matters of a highly technical character; and the Bill is drawn in a manner that does not offer facilities for discussion, and really two sets of Members whose objects are completely different are compelled to go into the same Lobby. My proposal is an exceedingly simple one; but I am under the difficulty that, while my Motion is to insert certain words, the Committee are now only cognisant of the Motion for the omission of certain words with a wholly different object to mine. My proposal is an exceedingly simple one, and I would recommend the Government to consider carefully before rejecting it. The words I would propose would come in after the word "as," and run as follows:—

"That is to say, out of the guarantee deposits in the first place provided, and if this should prove insufficient, then by a contribution from the Consolidated Fund."

The effect will be to provide that any deficiency which may arise shall be borne by the Consolidated Fund, and to strike away once for all the whole provision for local guarantees. That will leave the Bill precisely in the same position as the law stands under the Ashbourne Acts, with the one exception that, instead of advances in cash, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will advance Two and Three-quarter per Cent. Stock. I want to know why the Government have departed from the Ashbourne Acts in this matter and proposed this system of checks. It was a Conservative Government which passed those Acts, and they always maintain that they are a success. The distinction which is now made is in favour of the State. The tenant under the Ashbourne Acts gets £100 in gold and pays back £100 in gold. But under this Bill he will not get £100 worth of Stock, but only the value of £100 Stock in the open market, which may be 98½ or 99. Therefore the National Debt Commissioners, if they purchase this Stock at anything under par, will gain by it.

(7.20.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I am glad the hon. Member seems to have come round to my view that the higher the Stock stands the better for the tenant. Now, the hon. Member for Elgin has proposed an Amendment which is extremely bad for the tenants, and the hon. Member for Kilkenny intends to support it. That is not very consistent with the argument of the hon. Member for Kilkenny, that any deficiency ought to be borne by the Consolidated Fund. It appears to me that the hon. Member should have given notice of his Amendment before the hon. Member for Elgin. If an Amendment is bad I would vote against it, and I am not prepared to vote for it because there is a good one which cannot be put. If the hon. Member for Cavan can move his Amendment later on in Committee or on the Report stage I shall be glad, though, I think, it rather cuts at the whole machinery of the Bill, and something else would have to be substituted.

(7.31.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): The hon. Member is in the proverbial difficulty in this matter. He cannot be in two places at the same time—both in the "Aye" Lobby and the "No" Lobby. I think it is the duty of all on this side of the House to recognise the great debt of gratitude we owe to the hon. Member for Elgin and Nairn (Mr. Keay). I thought at first the Bill was a bad Bill, but every time my hon. Friend gets up I am more conclusively convinced that it is an execrable one. My hon. Friend has been a great deal in India, engaged in financial transactions there. He has had a great deal to do with the Hindoos. The Hindoos could not get the better of my hon. Friend, so that I can understand the Chief Secretary and the Chancellor of the Exchequer giving up the attempt to answer the hon. Member as a bad job.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!

MR. LABOUCHERE: The right hon. Gentleman says "hear, hear!" He gives it up. He says he cannot answer my hon. Friend. The right hon. Gentleman used a most extraordinary argument in reply to the able and exhaustive speech of my hon. Friend. He said that when a Minister prepared a Bill it was his business to lay down certain facts and not to reply to arguments made against them; and, therefore, he says he will not reply to the important facts and questions addressed to him by my hon. Friend. He went even further. When the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy was making a very valuable contribution to the discussion, the right hon. Gentleman opposite said "Divide." Apparently the Government do not intend that this important and complicated Bill shall be discussed. When cogent arguments are urged against certain provisions of the measure the right hon. Gentleman calls "Divide," as much as to say, "I despise you so much that I am not going to argue with you." That is not the way in which a Bill like this should be dealt with. One thing the right hon. Gentleman did say which shows me that my hon. Friend's observations did have some effect upon him. Previously he has stated that the estimate is to be made on the net rental, but to-day, when the hon. Member insisted that it is on the gross rental, the right hon. Gentleman admitted that that was so. He contradicts himself. He says at one time that the thing is black and at another that it is white, just to suit the exigencies of his position. For my part I hold that the views of the hon. Member for Elgin are very sound, and if the hon. Member goes to a Division I shall support him as a humble follower. I promise to do the same every time the hon. Member, who so thoroughly understands the Bill and whose views with regard to it are so sound, brings forward an Amendment.

(7.36.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must congratulate the hon. Member for Northampton on his new leader. The Committee, I think, are now in an awkward position, because those who wish to throw the loss caused by any possible default upon the Exchequer, and those who wish to throw it upon the locality concerned, are apparently going to vote in the same Lobby. I address myself to the Members of the first Party—those who wish to throw the default, if default there be, upon the Exchequer. The hon. Member for South Kilkenny asks why the Government have not adopted the provisions of the Ashbourne Acts in the present instance. There are two reasons why they have not done so. When the last Ashbourne Act was passed pledges of the most specific character were given by the Government that the £5,000,000 asked for should be the last £5,000,000 that the House would be asked to grant on the terms specified in the measure. Therefore, if the Government were to take the course suggested by the hon. Member they would violate their pledges. But there is a second reason. If hon. Members desire to have Land Purchase in Ireland they can only have it by assistance from the British Exchequer. The Member for Bradford told us that money borrowed on Irish security could not be borrowed for less than 5 per cent., and that being so an Exchequer guarantee is necessary. Well, it is impossible for the British Exchequer to give this additional loan of £30,000,000, except upon terms which will absolutely secure the public from loss. I believe that Ireland can and will pay, and that there will not be any serious conspiracy against the payment of the instalments; but my own opinion upon the point is not in question. The fact which has to be faced is, that the British public will not pledge its security for the purchase of Irish land except upon terms that will safeguard it against loss. However much hon. Members opposite may desire to remove all risk from the shoulders of the local taxpayer, and to put it upon the shoulders of the British taxpayer, the idea does not come within the sphere of practical politics. The hon. Member put this dilemma to me. He said, "If the tenants do not pay it will be because the Land Purchase Commissioners have permitted too large a price to be given for the holdings." Without going into controversial matter, I would say that the hon. Member must be aware that, rightly or wrongly, the British public are of opinion that there is such a thing possible in Ireland as conspiracy against the payment of rent and annuities. That is possible, but not probable.

MR. CHANCE: The guarantee deposit would intervene to prevent loss, and all the Commissioners would have to do would be to make the guarantee large enough. You are deliberately throwing away the best security.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The guarantee deposit could not be made to cover the advance, unless you exact such terms from the landlord as would really prevent sales taking place.

*(7.42.) MR. KEAY: I think it is my duty to say a few words after the extraordinary statement we have heard from the other side, as to the four points referred to by me. I promise not to jump upon the Chief Secretary now that he is down, and he is undoubtedly "down" now that these financial matters are being discussed. I do not intend to be hard on him. I must, however, say this, that it is too bad for the right hon. Gentleman, when he feels himself in utter despair and confusion, to avail himself of the absurd and ancient doctrine which was written on a brief, "No defence; abuse the plaintiff's attorney." I do not say he was positively offensive, but he was on the verge of it. He certainly went much nearer to it than I have ever done with regard to him. Speaking of my four points, he said, "The hon. Member's points are usually bad points." Now, when the right hon. Gentleman is laboriously engaged in admitting that he cannot reply, it is too absurd for him to abuse my points. If the right hon. Gentlemen finds it impossible to reply, the inference is that the points are good points. I may not be able as efficiently to support the prominent position I have been reluctantly compelled to assume in regard to the financial part of this Bill as I should like; but I think it will be admitted, even by hon. Members opposite, that it is absurd to call my points bad points, and to refer to them as "what the hon. Member is pleased to call points." The right hon. Gentleman has been guilty of an erroneous statement in addition to many omissions. He has said that the point as to the insolvency of the Guarantee Fund, and the certainty of danger to the Consolidated Fund was threshed out in the Debates on the first and Second Reading of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken. [Cries of "Divide!"] I, and I only, attempted to raise the question on the Second Reading, knowing that the guarantee portion of the measure was rotten. And what a reception I got! The Under Secretary for India came and sat opposite, below the Gangway, and positively jeered, hoping thereby to discourage me from touching this raw spot. Moreover, I myself was unable to prosecute the argument owing to an error of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, who omitted to tell us that the Ashbourne Act moneys had been taken out of this Bill. Later on I obtained the proper figures, and on the main question of the Second Reading I endeavoured to put my case before the House, but was closed. [Cries of "Divide!"] The right hon. Gentleman did me the honour to say he despaired of getting the real arithmetical facts of the case into my head. Well, I do not despair of being able to get the arithmetical facts of the case into the head of the right hon. Gentleman. [Renewed cries of "Divide!"] I will tell him where the crux lies. The Bill is so complex, that the financial part of it is a sort of Frankenstein to the right hon. Gentleman. The point he does not understand is this—and if he gets up the fact it will save him hours in Committee. He truly says that the amount of the first loans will be £30,000,000, that there will be a partial repayment, and that the money repaid will be re-lent, but he utterly forgets that with every re-lending there will be an increase of the aggregate annual amount of the instalments due from the tenant purchasers. He must remember that in connection with the £30,000,000 there is only one Sinking Fund, and that in connection with every annual advance there will have to be another Sinking Fund, all the payments to which will have to come out of the Consolidated Fund in case of default. Does he not see that if you have 49 Sinking Funds all running parallel to each other, all having run for different terms of years, and all demanding that their annual 1 per cent. should be paid into them, it must take more money to fill them up than it would take to fill up the one original Sinking Fund only?

*(7.53.) MR. KNOX: It will be admitted that this matter has not been dealt with from the Irish point of view at inordinate length; and that we are within our rights in asking the House to bear with us while we continue the discussion from that point of view. We have no sympathy with the attitude of the hon. Member for Elgin on this subject. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy spoke of us as "Irish" in a tone of unutterable contempt. The word "Irish" seemed to convey to his mind the same meaning as the word "jobbery." He said the Commissioners would be Irishmen, meaning that they might be expected to job away the public money. Well, I must protest against that treatment of Irishmen. I would remind the hon. Member for Elgin and the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy of a story told of Dr. Johnson. It is said that he was once discussing with an Irishman the question of the Union, and he said to the Irishman—

"Do not unite with us. If we unite with you it will be to rob you. We should have robbed Scotland if she had had anything to take."

I consider that Dr. Johnson's prophecy has come true. The Union has been brought about, and we have been robbed in consequence, and now we want to get back a little of that which has been stolen from us. I do not find Irish Members continually making protests when money is proposed to be spent on Scotland; but Scotch Members are continually raising such protests when it is proposed to give money to Ireland. They protest against the principle of the Bill, although some of them have had the frankness to declare that if it were proposed to apply it to Scotland they would not oppose it. If hon. Gentlemen above the Gangway take up an attitude thoroughly and deliberately selfish we can understand it; but we cannot understand the point of view of hon. Gentlemen who rise to protest against the use of the Imperial guarantee in the Bill while they never raise any protest against the use of Imperial money or guarantee in case of their own improvements. I did not know whether the House is aware that the principle of Imperial guarantee in the case of English allotments was allowed to go through the House without protest from these Benches. The Public Works Loan Commissioners have the right to lend money for the purpose of providing allotments in villages in England—that is to say use Imperial credit. Ireland, as well as England, is to provide allotments for the English agricultural labourers. Well, no Irish Member rose to protest against that, and we do ask that if hon. Gentlemen object to the use of Imperial credit in the manner set forth in the Bill they should, at least, spare us insult at the same time. I support the Amendment from the Irish point of view, and protest against the local guarantees which the Government have devised. Our position on this point is clear. We candidly admit that if we had Home Rule in Ireland it would be necessary for us to deal with the land question out of our own resources. But we protest against having these resources pledged for us while we are denied the right of self-government. The guarantees provided by the Government are described in some quarters as trumpery. It is supposed that they are of no real value. It is supposed that no real damage could be done to the Irish taxpayer. I believe the risk to the taxpayer has been greatly exaggerated by minimising the amount of the Irish security pledged by this Bill, and I believe there is great and imminent risk to the Irish cesspayer in the mortgaging of the rates, and I believe also that the great and imminent risk to the Irish cesspayer in the mortgaging of the rates has likewise been greatly minimised. The Government propose, firstly, that certain cash sums usually paid to Ireland shall be mortgaged without in any way consulting the Local Authorities. The first of these is the Probate Duty Grant. The Probate Duty Grant consists of £5,000 paid annually to the Royal Dublin Society for improving the breed of horses, and also about £200,000, excluding the exempted cities, which is paid partly in relief of the county cess and road rates, and partly in relief of the poor rate. Last Session, in order to explain the Bill of that year, the Government published a Return showing the amount of the resources in each locality in Ireland which are pledged by the Bill. Although those figures may not now be correct, owing to certain changes that have since been made, I may use them for the purposes of argument. I find that the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund amounts to £200,000 of Irish securities. I say it is a serious thing to pledge Irish securities to that amount without consulting the Local Authorities, because they will need the money, and do already grievously need it in many cases. The Chief Secretary as President of the Irish Local Government Board is aware of the great difficulty experienced by the Local Authorities of the West of Ireland in making both ends meet. He knows that in certain cases, Vice-Guardians have had to be appointed because the Poor Law Guardians through no fault of theirs, had found that the Unions were practically insolvent. Of the sum I have mentioned more than half is county cess. There might have been some fairness in it had the poor rate only been charged, because the poor rate is paid partly by landlords and partly by tenants, whereas the county cess is paid only by the tenants. So that, while the landlord gets the major part of the benefit conferred by the Bill, the tenant has to find the greater part of the security. We, therefore, object to this part of the Bill, and we point out that the difficulties attending the collection of the county cess in certain contingencies do not apply to the cash guarantee, because in that case the money, if needed, will come directly from the Probate Grant, and the Local Authorities will simply have to do without it, they not being in a position to resist. We are, however, somewhat reconciled to the contingent portion of the guarantee, because we know that if an attempt were made to raise the money by county cess, at something like an extra 3s. in any Irish county, we could, without difficulty, organise such hostility to that action, that the Government would have to spend more in police and other military forces than the sum they might attempt to recover. We know we have enormous power in our hands in that matter, and can insist that, in the end, the consent of the Irish people shall be given before the money is so taken; but as regards the cash portion of the guarantee, we have not the same security. If the Bill is passed, we shall have no way of resisting the non-payment of these sums; they would simply be stopped. We say, therefore, that this provision ought not to be made, unless, as was proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, it was accompanied by some means of obtaining the assent of the Local Authorities. In introducing the Bill this year, the Chief Secretary suggested, as a possible way of getting the assent of the localities, that after the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund had been paid, the consent of the people might be asked before the contingent portion came to be paid. But we say that this is the wrong way about. We can resist payment of the contingent guarantee, and so in a rough and lawless way show that those resources cannot be mortgaged without our consent, but we cannot resist payment of the cash guarantee. If the form of local assent is to be given at all, it ought to be given to the cash rather than to the contingent portion. We know the Government will not be content to leave the country without control over pauper lunatics, schools, and so forth, coming under the contingent branch; but the greater part of the cash portion may be cut off independently of the Local Authorities. It may be said that these guarantees are more or less on paper only, and will not be called up. I admit if the administration of the Bill were to remain in the hands of the present Land Purchase Commissioners, and we were sure that Mr. McCarthy and Mr. Lynch would not die, and the Chief Secretary would not appoint jobbers in their places, there would be very small need for any of these guarantees. But this may not always be as it is, and if the Bill is jobbed it may hereafter be possible to force the tenants to agree to prices they will not be able to meet, whereby considerable charges may fall upon the guarantee; whether the charge falls on the cash or the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund the effect will be very serious on the Irish Local Authorities. The Government professes the intention to establish County Councils in Ireland. If these bodies are established it will be necessary for them to borrow money as has already been the case with the County Councils in England. What would be the position of the Irish County Councils when they go to the men they want to borrow money from? Those men would say "you need not come to us, the Government have pledged all your rates beforehand up to 3s. in the £1; you cannot come to us as you have no security to offer." What I ask would be the position of the Public Works Loans Commissioners if this Bill were passed? Could they say the security for their advances would be the same as it has hitherto been? Obviously they could not if the Government mean these guarantees to be on the same footing as other guarantees in the case of the County Authorities, such for instance as those for the light railways. I venture to say it would be impossible for the Local Authorities to borrow money for any purpose whatever. Therefore if the Bill is passed in its present form, the Irish Local Authorities would be unable to improve the country or perform any of the duties as to Public Works which the Local Authorities perform elsewhere. Why does the Government want these provisions? It admits that English credit is due to Ireland. England has maintained the nuisance of Irish landlordism, and it is only fair that England should pay the cost of abating that nuisance. We know that the Government has to satisfy the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and others who have made pledges on this subject. Hon. Members opposite have broken those pledges long ago, not to allow English credit to be pledged for the purpose of buying out Irish landlords. Having broken them once, I ask them to honestly and frankly break them altogether. You admit that England owes a debt to Ireland in this matter. Why not also admit that the Irish people have a right to demand that the whole working of Local Government in Ireland shall not be hampered by these guarantees to such an extent that if this Bill be carried in its present form it would be almost impossible, within the next half century, for the Irish Local Authorities to perform those beneficial functions for the improvement of Ireland, which are performed by Local Authorities in this country?

*(8.20.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I am unable to vote for this Amendment. The House has been placed in some difficulty by the Amendment being supported from two totally different points of view. In the first place, my hon. Friend the Member for Elgin has moved the omission of certain words and has raised a difficulty as to the process of re-lending under the Bill. I think he was treated well on that point by the Chief Secretary. But a better opportunity for discussing the re-lending process will be afforded when we come to a later clause. In the meantime, as I understand these particular words in the clause, they are for the purpose of carrying out the guarantee. Although I am opposed to the whole scheme, I shall not be disposed to go into the same question again and again, whenever it is merely raised in a different form. The objects of the words proposed by the hon. Member for Kilkenny reduce the Bill to the exact form of the Ashbourne Acts. So long as the sum involved was the comparatively small amount of £5,000,000 in the first Act, and £5,000,000 in the second, I thought it was very reasonable that the country should look to the holdings themselves and to the Landlords Guarantee Fund as sufficient security. But when so large a sum as £30,000,000 is involved, danger of a totally different character arises mainly from combinations, bad seasons, or other causes, against which it is only reasonable that you should have some other security. For my part, I do not think it is unreasonable that we should look for those securities from Ireland, but I think those securities should be given with the consent of the Irish people. But that is a matter which had better be discussed on the Amendment of my right hon. Friend (Mr. J. Morley). If the Government refuse to make any concession in this direction, I for my part shall certainly vote against any additional securities being placed upon the Irish people.

Mr. Knox

(8.25.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I regard the question of the Imperial guarantee differently from other hon. Members on this side of the House. I quite admit, on the Home Rule principle, with the Kingdom divided into three parts, each part should be made financially responsible. But when you approach the Bill from the Unionist point of view, then we regard the United Kingdom as a whole, and hold that if there be any risk under this Land Purchase scheme, then the loss, if there is to be any loss, should fall, not upon the 5,000,000 of Ireland, but upon the 36,000,000 of the United Kingdom. So far as the Imperial Government is concerned, the object of this Bill is to bring peace to Ireland. With peace in Ireland, a less Constabulary Force will be required, and there will be a saving all round to the whole of the United Kingdom. It is all very well to speak of the responsibility of the British taxpayer and the British working man, but let it be known that if any loss should occur under this Bill, when it becomes law, not a single copper will fall on the the British working man. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will go to the upper classes, where the money is to be got. Why is the Government afraid to face the working classes? If their measure is a sound one—and surely it is a sound one—let them go to the working classes and tell them that it will effect a saving in Imperial charges, and that no loss can occur to them. The very fact that some of these Irish tenants would be too poor to pay their instalments, is a reason why these guarantees should not be placed upon them. I look upon this question from an Imperial point of view, regarding Ireland as part of the United Kingdom. (8.30.)

(9.2.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

(9.5.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 113; Noes 81.—(Div. List, No. 135.)

(9.15.) MR. SEXTON: The Committee are already familiar with the arguments on which we found our claim that this liability should be finally borne by the Imperial Consolidated Fund, and should not fall on what we consider to be properly the funds of Ireland. I am anxious that the right hon. Member for Newcastle should have an immediate opportunity of moving the important Amendment that stands in his name; and, therefore, I will content myself by simply moving my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 1, to leave out from the word "of," to the end of the Clause, and add the words "moneys to be provided by Parliament."
—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*(9.16.) Mr. MAHONY (Meath, N.): I take this opportunity, as being the more convenient one, to object altogether against Irish securities being used in this matter. The adoption of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle might modify the objection to the use of Irish securities, but it would not do away with the great objection. The great objection is that the Irish people whom it is proposed to tax will have no control over the administration of the money advanced. The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman would only give the people the right of saying once for all whether they would allow the Purchase Act to be put in operation in a certain county or not, and if they decided in the affirmative they would have no control over the working of the Act. My object is not in any way to delay the progress of this Bill. The position I take up now is different to that I took up a year ago. Things have happened since then that have modified my views regarding land purchase. We have now to choose between two evils. We may not like the Government Bill—we may not think it a Bill that Ireland is entitled to; but what are we to expect from the Front Opposition Bench or the Liberal Party in regard to land purchase in Ireland? It is perfectly well known there are divided counsels in the Liberal Party on the subject of land purchase, and, therefore, we may find ourselves bound to accept a Bill such as this though we may not think it is as good as it ought to be. We may be told that in objecting to the use of the Irish securities in any form, we are not consistent. It is true the Irish Party raised no objection to the use of the Irish securities in 1886, but then the Bill of 1886 was a very different one to the present Bill. That Bill proposed to settle the Irish land question; this Bill does not propose to do anything of the kind. In addition to that, in 1886 Ireland was prepared to make a sacrifice of her credit because she was getting the right to self-government. Neither of these two advantages are offered us under the present Bill. A very remarkable statement was made this evening by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman said it was not within the range of practical politics for any Government at the present time to propose to advance British money for the purpose of buying out Irish landlords without having adequate Irish securities. The Government have exhausted every means at their disposal to furnish Irish securities; they have furnished many securities which are unjust, and many which are absolutely absurd. But with all these securities, they cannot obtain more than will justify them in advancing more than £30,000,000 for the purchase of land in Ireland. If £30,000,000 will not settle the Irish land question, and it is not within the range of practical political politics to advance money for the purchase of land in Ireland without having Irish securities, what are you going to do when the £30,000,000 are exhausted? You intend to force us to pledge all our available securities not for a permanent settlement, not for a settlement to benefit the whole country. For a settlement that will only benefit one particular class in the country you are going to make the whole country pledge its security. That is unjust. The whole country would have benefited by the financial arrangements under the Land Purchase Bill of 1886. No one will say that £30,000,000 will buy out all the Irish landlords. One of the chief objections to the proposal of 1886 was that it was only intended to provide £50,000,000. The right hon. Gentleman who now leads the House characterised the proposal as illusory, as a very much larger sum would be required. If it was wrong to put £50,000,000 in that Bill, surely it is far worse to put £30,000,000 in this Bill. I hope the Attorney General for Ireland will not tell me that as the money is repaid it will be loaned out again; and that, therefore, in process of time, when he and I and future generations of his and my family are in the grave—some 200 or 300 years hence—the Irish land question will be settled. That will not be satisfactory. What I wish to particularly point out is that by insisting that Irish securities are necessary you are putting a block in the way of the settlement of the Irish land question, because if Irish securities are necessary now they will be necessary in the future. You are going to exhaust them all now; and if you cannot ask for an advance of British money in Ireland now without Irish securities, how can you have the face to ask for an advance at any future time? You are almost pledging yourselves against doing so. There is another reason why you should not introduce into the Bill these Irish securities; and that is that you are doing it without the consent of the Irish people. It is perfectly monstrous that you should take securities for the benefit of one particular class in Ireland and that against the will of the people, without their consent, you should pledge the securities which belong to the whole nation, and do it in order to protect the British Exchequer. The Irish land question is the heritage of bad government in Ireland; it is the British Government who are responsible for the present state of the land question, and it is the British Exchequer that ought to bear the responsibility. I have no doubt that on some platforms in this country this measure will be described as one of extraordinary generosity towards Ireland. The measure displays the very reverse of generosity. It is drawn in a most niggardly spirit because you are taking from Local Authorities in Ireland every available security they have got. If you ever create them what will be the position of these Local Bodies? What credit will they have at their disposal? How will they raise money for their own purposes? If the Imperial Government are sincere in this matter they ought to be only too glad to run some small risk. The Irish question has been for a long time a thorn in the side of the British Government, and Her Majesty's present Government believe, or profess to believe, that it is going to be almost settled by the settlement of the land question in Ireland. Is that not worth risking the British credit for? By pledging Irish securities against the will of the Irish people you make that settlement more difficult, you deprive the Irish people of their securities, and you do this, giving the Local Authority no controlling power over the administration of the Act, or the amount of advances made for the interest of which these local funds are to be made responsible. More than this, you remove from the Land Commissioners, who are the body who have to sanction the amount of these advances, all responsibilities in regard to repayment—that is to say, no matter how great the mistakes they may make in ascertaining that there is proper security for the amount to be advanced, they have no danger or responsibility in the matter, because no matter how unfair, however much too large the amount advanced may be for the security offered there is the local security behind them to make good the losses. So you are going to set up in Ireland a body charged with most important functions and great responsibilities, and yet you are not going to attach to them the consequences of their action should they grossly err in the discharge of their functions. If they advance money on bad security no matter, the loss will be made good by people who have no voice in deciding whether the loan was a proper one or not. This is a monstrous principle to proceed upon, a principle in direct opposition to that upon which, up to this, we have proceeded because, under the Ashbourne Act, the first person who suffers if the Land Commissioners make an improper advance is the landlord when he has received too high a price for his land. But now the people whom you are going to make bear the loss are those who have no voice in, and who derive no benefit whatever from, the advances. This is a very serious change to make, and I think it would be time to ask the Irish people to pledge their local securities when you are prepared to give the Irish people some control over the money to be advanced, some control over the machinery by which the Act is to be administered. You might then be fairly said to be in a position to ask for these pledges, but if the House is going to take upon itself the full responsibility of making the advances, then with Parliament should the responsibility of the payment lie.

(9.35.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): It is not my intention to take up time at length, because the question has been dealt with in a spirit of great clearness and cogency by my hon. Friend the Member for Cavan. My own view is, that it is our duty to strenuously resist every effort to saddle this liability upon Irish local securities, and that to do so in this manner without the consent of the locality amounts to an embezzlement of those local funds. We shall have more to say upon this point on the Amendment which is to be moved by the hon. Member for Newcastle, but still I think the reasonableness of this proposition ought to command a large measure of support.

(9.36.) MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): It is not likely that the use of these guarantees will ever be required, they are not likely to be required at all, and so, I think, the Imperial Government might take the risk, if risk the Government think there is, though I do not believe that a halfpenny will ever have to be paid out of such guarantee. The local guarantee can well be dispensed with, it will only impede the working of the Act.

(9.37.) MR. CHANCE: I submit that it is a dishonest thing to attempt to seize local funds for the benefit of the landlords of Ireland. It is a novel principle that anyone should be compelled to become a surety against his will, and in my opinion a locality would not be under the slightest moral obligation to repay any moneys which it might be called upon to pay under this provision. The measure of the availability of the fund will be precisely the measure of the force by which you will be able to screw it out of the pockets of the Local Authorities. The effect will be that the Commissioners will have a larger margin to operate upon, and considering these Commissioners will have probably very pronounced views on the subject of landlord and tenant, it is to be expected the sale price of holdings will be much enhanced. We have no control over the Land Commissioners; their salaries are paid from the Consolidated Fund, and they can snap their fingers at public opinion and local pressure.

(9.45.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 160; Noes 60.—(Div. List, No. 136.)

(9.54.) MR. J. MORLEY: I think it is not too much to say we now approach what the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary will doubtless himself call the most difficult and critical portion of the Bill. Those who think with me hold that there are many objections to this measure, but of those objections none are so capable of being widely and generally understood as the one I now put forward, namely, that for the benefit of a small number of Irish landlords, and for a larger number, but still a comparatively small number, of Irish agricultural tenants, the Government are going to make whole Irish counties pledge a great and substantial portion of their local revenues to make good any default on the part of those casual and privileged tenants who avail themselves of the provisions of this Bill. Her Majesty's Government insist upon forcibly taking for the purposes of this measure funds which belong to the different Irish counties, without the counties themselves being consulted on the matter, and without their having choice or voice in transactions that may lead to an immense aggravation of the local burdens. The proposition that forms the foundation of my Amendment is that such a policy is contrary to equity, contrary to the practice of Parliament, and wholly inexpedient. The right hon. Gentleman, in introducing his first Bill on this subject, admitted all that I require for the purposes of supporting my Amendment, because he declared that he was about to treat Ireland in a manner in which he knew that the House would not have allowed him to treat England. It is certain that if political troubles arise in Ireland there would be considerable default on the part of the Irish tenants who purchase their holdings under this Bill, and in that case what do the Government propose to do? In the first place, they propose to impound that part of the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund which consists of an annual £40,000 which should in every financial year be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, and of the Irish Probate Duty grant. If this cash portion of the Guarantee Fund should be insufficient to meet the defaults of the tenants, then the Treasury is to stop the deficiency out of the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund, which consists of the Government grants to local purposes. Then comes the third and undoubtedly, the most formidable provision of all, under which the Lord Lieutenant is to order a levy to be made upon the county at large in which the default has taken place, through the Grand Jury. Upon this point I should like to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman which strikes me as being one of great importance. It is this: The Government are going to bring in a Bill for local government in Ireland upon lines analogous to the Act which passed for the local government of this country, which, I presume, will create elective, popular County Councils. Do they intend, when such County Councils are called into existence, that the Lord Lieutenant should order the County Councils in place of the Grand Juries to make this levy? What will you have then? You will have the Lord Lieutenant giving an order for the levy, and you will have a popular elective body assenting or refusing to carry it out. That, especially, if the right hon. Gentleman's views as to Irish national opinion are true, will place the Lord Lieutenant and the County Authority in a position of the greatest difficulty, and will lead to extreme confusion. I put this point to the Chief Secretary, and ask him for this information parenthetically—whether in his contemplation it will be for the Lord Lieutenant to order the County Council, as he is now going to order the Grand Jury, to levy the sum necessary to make good the default of the tenants? However that may be it comes to this—that the Lord Lieutenant can order a levy to be made through a Grand Jury on the county so that the tenants whose landlords decline to sell, and will not give to their tenants the boon conferred by this Bill, will not only have to patiently bear as they best can their own unfavourable, disadvantageous, and inferior position relatively to those whose landlords have been willing to sell, but also to make good the default of people whose landlords have been willing to confer this boon. I am perfectly sure that not only Ireland but England will agree that this is an intolerable injustice and a strong provocation—I will go further and say a justifiable provocation—of disaffection to a Government which imposes so unjust a burden. The Chief Secretary, I must admit, agrees that this is the position as the Bill makes it, and that it is absolutely indefensible. The right hon. Gentleman regards it as being so indefensible that he now assents, as we understood from the speech introducing the Bill, to some modification. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR dissented.] Surely the right hon. Gentleman has admitted the necessity of some modification in the proposals which are in the Bill. I take it that he did so when he talked of a plébiscite, though he said, "I declare that in my judgment I do not think it will be an improvement to my scheme as set forth in the Bill." We wish to know, after the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman, what is the plan of local control which he is prepared to submit to the House. The right hon. Gentleman led the House a certain way into his plan, and said that if we had any plan of local control at all it must be by way of plébiscite to the ratepayers. He said we must put the matter of undertaking this liability and bearing this obligation, "aye" or "no," to the ratepayers under the safety of the ballot, and so take their verdict upon it. Now what is the question to which the ratepayers are to say "aye" or "no"? Are they to say "aye" or "no" to each individual transaction between a landlord and a body of tenants? Is such a plébiscite to be taken from the whole body of ratepayers in a county on each transaction in which a landlord wishes to sell his estate and has come to terms with his tenants? That would be control in the real sense. I understood from the right hon. Gentleman's utterances that he does not intend by this plan to take a plébiscite on individual transactions. That being so the right hon. Gentleman, in my opinion, rejected popular control in what I should have regarded as its most effective and practical shape. I do not believe that popular control would be of any great value in the administration of this Act, unless the localities had some kind of voice in individual transactions. The Chief Secretary gave as his reason for refusing this interpretation of popular control that it would never do to allow men who might, and probably would, themselves become buyers, to "bear" the market and fix the price of the article. That may be a good argument, or a bad one; but if you force a man to become surety for the repayment of purchase money without consulting him at one stage or another as to the amount of that purchase money, without taking his judgment as to the price for which he is to be made bondman, to call such a process popular control is, in my opinion, a sheer mockery. Now, what is the question which the Chief Secretary is going to submit to the "aye" or "no" of the ratepayers by his plébiscite? It is, I understand—and he will correct me if I am wrong—to be taken on the plain question whether or not the ratepayers will assent to the mortgaging of the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund; do they agree to pledge their share in local taxation duties or local grants, or do they not? Do they agree to make good by county levy the default of tenants whose landlords have conferred upon them this immense boon? The Chief Secretary draws a distinction between the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund and the cash portion of the Fund, which, in the opinion of the right hon. Members for Mid Lothian and West Birmingham, and in the opinion, I think, of all men who have given this question impartial consideration is absolutely untenable. The right hon. Gentleman admits that there is no logical distinction between the cash portion and the contingent portion. But he says there is a sentimental distinction. What is it? The right hon. Gentleman says that there is all the difference from the point of view of sentiment between grants that the Irish community have been in the habit from time immemorial of receiving, and grants which Parliament has made to them within a very short time past. I submit that this is one of the most ludicrous, I would even say childish, defences I have ever heard for a distinction which the right hon. Gentleman does not pretend to defend in logic. I will put it as the right hon. Gentleman does. In the Debate on the Second Reading of the Bill the Chief Secretary said—

"You may say that both are the property of the locality. They are contributions given to the locality by the free gift of the Legislature, and may be withdrawn at any moment. The claim of the locality to those contributions is based only on the fact that other localities have the same."

I should have thought, for my part, that it would have been impossible to base a claim on anything much more likely to touch the sentiment of the community, than the fact that you are going to deprive them of control over a fund the full control of which is possessed by all other localities. This disputation as to the distinction between the cash and the contingent portion is not very ingenious, and is, I think, rather idle. If I understand rightly the veto of the country upon the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund, it will have the effect of stopping purchase. The right hon. Gentleman admits as much as that. But I confess that I do not understand when this plébiscite on the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund is going to be taken.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: When the cash portion is exhausted.

*MR. J. MORLEY: Is it to be as soon as 25 times the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund has been exhausted and advances have been made up to that amount? Will the ratepayers then decide? Very well; that was not expressed before, and I do not think it was so understood by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian; but in any case it seems to me that it would be found an extremely inadequate form of popular control. Because—mark this—the whole of their cash portion has been taken, and therefore a very considerable step has been made in the way of purchase and in placing an imposition on the country at large without their consent having been asked. I do not think, therefore, that this plébiscite proposal really meets the foundation of our objection. I would ask the Chief Secretary to say how he proposes to arrange for his plébiscite—what clauses he proposes to introduce? It is against his own judgment; he does not think it will be an improvement in the Bill, but he is prepared to propose it. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR dissented.] I understand that if the Chief Secretary finds a distinct preponderance of opinion in favour of a plébiscite a clause will be introduced to provide for one; but, if not, it will be interesting to know what are the objections to it, because some of the voting upon this Amendment will depend upon the satisfaction with which the proposed plébiscite is received. The Chief Secretary has offered two objections to popular control. First of all, he says that land purchase is a policy in which not merely Ireland but the whole Empire is concerned. I should have thought the answer to that perfectly simple. It was given before you took the Chair, Mr. Courtney, by the hon. Member for the St. Rollox Division of Glasgow. The hon. Member asked, why should one part of the country—meaning the United Kingdom—be saddled with a burden for the sake of a measure which is conceived in the interests of the United Kingdom as a whole? The logic of that is unanswerable, and the Chief Secretary admits it. If we are going to embark on this land purchase for the benefit of the Empire as a whole, why should not the Empire run the risk? The Chief Secretary boasts that he has taken great care to guard British credit against incurring any risk whatever; he says that he is going to throw the whole risk of default in these transactions upon Irish local resources, although he says that the purposes and objects are not merely Irish. The right hon. Gentleman is a very acute dialectician, but I defy him to explain such a paradox as this. He says that "Here is a boon given by the country at large to Ireland for the purpose of improving its social position; do not let the Local Authorities interfere with that boon, but give it freely." By all means prohibit the localities from interfering with the boon, but if you prohibit them from interfering you have no right to impose upon them the burden of the risk. The right hon. Gentleman's second objection to popular control is that the body intrusted with it might use it for political objects. Agrarian discontent, he says, truly enough, at one time or another has been used for political objects, and he contends that if we introduce local control in this business we shall be intrusting the success of the land purchase policy to a body called the National League, which, he says, for its own purposes would stop the operation of the Act. That seems to me as hollow an objection as could possibly be taken. What does it prove? If the National League is strong enough, in American electioneering jargon, to "capture" the Local Authority, and to prevent the Local Authority from sanctioning a purchase, how can the right hon. Gentleman dream it will not also be strong enough with the tenants to prevent them from entering into bargains with the landlords? If the National League is the master of the Local Authority, why should not its influence be strong enough to make it master of the tenants? Then if the Lord Lieutenant orders a levy to be made by the County Council, and if the National League were hostile to the Government policy, what chance would there be that the levy would be carried out? Another objection urged by the right hon. Gentleman is that the introduction of popular control by a Local Authority is absolutely impracticable and unworkable. I have never yet been able to understand the force of that objection. The right hon. Gentleman says you cannot introduce into this Bill provisions for constituting County Councils, and that if we are to wait until a County Councils Bill is passed, at the rate at which the House of Commons does its business, we shall have to wait at least for some months. Well, I hope it is only some months we shall have to wait for the County Councils Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer cheers that, meaning, no doubt, by his cheer that the Bill may be produced any day. Yes; but we have heard that ever since 1886, and I shall believe in the existence of that Bill and in the intention of the Government to pass it, when I hear it explained from that box, and not before. The Chief Secretary says if we put into this Bill a clause saying that the County Councils are to possess a veto on its operations, we may find ourselves in the absurd position of allowing a certain number of sales to be effected, and then County Councils may step in and stop the operations. I do not think that truly describes the case. I will submit to the Committee a hypothetical timetable. Let it be assumed, as stated by the Government, that the unexhausted fund at the disposal of the Purchase Commissioners under the Ashbourne Act is just short of £1,000,000, although I thought it was larger. That is plenty of money with which to continue transactions under the Ashbourne Act. At present there is usually an interval of from four to six months between the date of an application and the date of sanction, and from six to eight months are occupied in proving the title and other matters. I believe it will be June, 1892, before the fund provided by the Ashbourne Act is exhausted, and preliminaries under this Bill will occupy till November, 1892. If the County Councils Bill is to be brought in and passed by next year, there is no reason why County Councils should not have been elected by November, 1892, and be in a position to undertake the supervision of these purchase transactions. Therefore, if my hypothetical time-table be approximately correct, the third argument against the policy of my Amendment falls to the ground. Having now done my best to answer the objections of the Chief Secretary, I will now point out, merely by way of enumeration, the advantages which we who support this Amendment anticipate from its operation. The first advantage would be that we should avoid the admitted, the immense, the formidable peril of bringing the State into the relation of direct creditor with 180,000 or 200,000 tenants. I need not ransack Hansard for proofs that right hon. Gentlemen opposite have always taken that view. The second advantage is that a veto on the transactions would be given to the people in the neighbourhood, who would know far better than anybody else whether a transaction was a good one and the security sound. As it is, the Government would be at the mercy of the valuers of the Land Commissioners. I am the last person to say a disrespectful word of those valuers, of whom I know more than one to be men of great experience and thoroughly conscientious, but not even the most experienced and upright land valuer can know and go into all the local circumstances and details of transactions. He does not know the character of the purchases, nor all the circumstances of the holding. On the other hand, the members of a Local Board would know. That would be a second great advantage—submitting these transactions to people who know all the conditions. The third advantage would be that if the County Council, or some other Local Authority, were to interpose, the tenants would be protected against coercion and duress on the part of the landlords. I know the Chief Secretary has said or written that that is an imaginary alarm, but in a Committee upstairs we had such a case proved by a valuer of the Land Commission concerning the tenants of one of the most powerful companies in the City of London; they had attempted to force a bargain on their tenants under circumstances which the superior officer of the Land Commission decided to be circumstances of coercion and duress. The fourth advantage would be that if the assent of a Local Authority, were secured, it would remove one of the most potent arguments for repudiation in hard times or for political reasons. If you interpose the Local Authority, you at least have got popular assent, though enormously inferior to the assent we proposed in 1886—still some sort of assent which would remove the argument that no assent had been given. The fifth advantage would be a not inconsiderable one. No other plan, except the invocation of Local Bodies to superintend the administration of that Bill, will get over its administrative difficulties. The administrative difficulties, even if the thing worked as smoothly as the Chief Secretary hoped, would be enormous. The interposition of Local Authorities would at least smooth the difficulties of administering the Bill. The difficulties of working the Act by a Central Authority in Dublin would be enormous. Let us picture what a state of confusion Ireland might be in. I agree with the Chief Secretary in hoping it would not be so, but at any rate it is not improbable if the Chief Secretary's opinion of the Irish character is the true one. Let us picture the confusion there would be after this land purchase scheme has been for some time in operation. The Government would be doing three things, each enormously burdensome and calculated to spread confusion. Suppose bad times, with a certain amount of default on the part of the purchasers, the State would be recovering its debts from the defaulters in the Courts. In the second place, the State, after getting its decrees, would have to enforce those decrees by eviction, for I know no other method of enforcement; and, in the third place, it would be exacting the tax levied by the Grand Jury, by order of the Lord Lieutenant, over great districts of Ireland. There would be proceedings in the Courts and on the holdings, and you would have complex proceedings in the county, to collect what must be the most unpopular impost levied by an unpopular body—the Grand Jury. All those who have to pay would protest, and, in my judgment, rightly protest, that it was an unjust impost. Would it not be well to have a Local Authority to share all these burdens? The sixth advantage is that by giving Local Authorities control over those transactions you would take the best means to make the money go furthest. I myself have always regarded a settlement of the land question as an indispensable part of any policy which aims at giving self-government to Ireland, and, of giving that self-government anything like a fair chance. This has always been my position; it is my position now. But I should be blind, if I did not recognise what I believe the Chief Secretary said in effect that this Bill gives the last £30,000,000 which Parliament will ever be likely to lend for the purpose of land purchase in Ireland. It is simply notorious that the constituencies have made up their minds on that point. That being the case, and attaching the importance I do to the land question, it is in the interests of all to take care that the money now to be advanced should go as far as it possibly can be made to go. A Local Authority would exercise a very vigilant supervision over those transactions. It would see that the money was not wasted, and that every sovereign went in the direction for which Parliament destined it. The Government are going the wrong way to work in the order in which they have shaped their policy. I do not believe that Land Purchase plus Local Government will solve the Irish question, but, even taking the point of view of the Government, in placing Land Purchase before Local Government, they are moving in an inverted order. No doubt there are great difficulties in the way of the Party opposite, with their Conservative friends from Ireland especially, in the way of setting up a Local Government they do not want at all. It is easier for the Government to ask the House for £30,000,000 of British money for land purchase. They have taken what is for the moment the easy course, and have introduced one of the very worst and most dangerous Bills I have ever known introduced to Parliament. In evading these temporary difficulties they are preparing for themselves, if they remain long in Office, or their successors when the time comes, a sea of future troubles. In what sort of temper will the Irish County Councils to be created next year approach their duties when they find that a large proportion of the financial resources which they ought to have had to carry on the work of local self-government are already hypothecated and taken out of their control? Nothing is more likely to upset Local Government in Ireland than this hypothecation of local resources with which Local Government ought to be carried on. The Chief Secretary knows the great sentence of a famous divine: "Things are what they are, and the consequences will be what they will be: why, then, do we deceive ourselves?" That was said of morals, but it is just as true of politics, and the question might be put just as aptly to the Chief Secretary, Things in Ireland are what they are, and the consequences which you are bringing about by this Bill will be what they will be. Why, then, does the right hon. Gentleman deceive himself in the first place; and, in the next place, why does he deceive Parliament and the country. I beg to move my Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 2, at the end of the Clause, to add the words, "Provided that no Guaranteed Land Stock shall be issued by way of advance in any county for the purchase of any holding unless the making of such advance in that county shall have been previously approved by a resolution of the County Council elected to represent the county in which the holding is situate under an Act of this or the next ensuing Session of Parliament."—(Mr. John Morley.)

Question proposed,

"That the words 'Provided that no Guaranteed Land Stock shall be issued by way of advance in any county for the purchase of any holding, unless the making of such advance in that county shall have been previously approved,' be there added."

(10.45.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman concluded his speech by making a quotation from Butler to the effect that no greater folly could be committed by mankind than not looking facts in the face, and meeting things as they are. There is no more direct issue than the one raised by the right hon. Gentleman. The question really between us is, which looks at the facts of Irish contemporary life as they are; which of us sees the political forces which have been at work, are at work, and may be at work in the future in the Irish counties, as they are; which of us is deceiving himself by familiar formulae, useful on platforms, and even for perorations, but not always useful, I venture to think, for the practical conduct of great and important affairs. I shall endeavour to meet the points of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman in the order in which he has raised them. The right hon. Gentleman said, and said truly, that I admitted on a previous occasion, on a Bill similar to this, that the elected County Authorities in England and Scotland would be associated with the central Government in the administration of the Bill. I adhere to that. I do not believe that any such Bill as this will be brought in for England or Scotland. It is because the condition of Ireland has happily no parallel in the rest of our dominions that we ask for the use of British credit, and for the expenditure of public money in a machinery which no Government, as far as I know, would ever have been justified in using either in England or Scotland. We have asked ourselves whether the condition of Ireland which justifies a Bill of this kind does not also justify us in not asking that the local elected bodies should help in making, or probably marring, the work of the British Legislature. The right hon. Gentleman told us we might or might not associate these bodies; but that if we created them they would be strong enough to prevent compulsory taxation. I want to know why he thought it would be more difficult after County Councils were created than now to have compulsory presentments? Compulsory presentments exist now, and cannot be destroyed whatever system of Local Government may be started in Ireland, whether it be the circumscribed and limited Local Government, which I hope to be enabled to present to the House, or whether it be the enormous scheme of national self-government, which right hon. Gentlemen opposite hope to present under the name of Home Rule. You may think that you would have compulsory presentments for malicious injuries abolished, and that then malicious injury would become legalised. Putting that aside, you might have compulsory presentments for light railways. Are we going to abolish them when we have County Councils? The County Councils are not consulted about their being undertaken. Capital has been advanced by the country, but they could not be abandoned simply because the County Councils did not happen to like them. The right hon. Gentleman must reconcile himself to this—that whatever the form of Local Government given to Ireland, compulsory presentments will be a necessary part of the social system, and we do not throw upon ourselves an unnecessary burden when we make it an integral part of the present scheme. The right hon. Gentleman then referred to the plan by which a certain amount of local control should be given in respect to a certain part of the Guarantee Fund. I have no objection to the mode in which the right hon. Gentleman stated that scheme. I think that any such limitation of the present Bill would be a misfortune. The suggestion might not destroy the Bill, but it would make it absolutely unworkable. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to argue against the Government scheme as a compromise. The right hon. Gentleman said that an attempt was being made to distinguish between two portions of the Guarantee Fund; that each portion belonged by right to the Local Authority, and that the attempt to distinguish between them was childish and foolish.

Mr. J. MORLEY: Childish.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I entirely differ from the right hon. Gentleman. I think there is a distinct difference between the two portions of the Guarantee Fund. What is the cash portion consisted of? It consists of subventions to the Local Authorities from the Imperial Exchequer, which was never heard of until 1888. What is the contingent portion of the Fund? It consists of contributions from the Imperial Authority to the Local Authorities, which are, I will not say of immemorial usage, but of long standing—contributions to education and pauper lunatics. I see no absurdity in distinguishing between the two. The right hon. Gentleman said that it is illogical. Well, I never yet heard of a compromise that was logical. Almost the essence of a compromise is that it is illogical. My Bill is illogical, and I think it a good Bill. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman is logical, and therefore I think it bad. I am not going into the matter in detail, for this is not the time to discuss it. The time will be on the 6th clause, which will soon come. It will then come naturally, logically—that is, I believe, the word—and I shall not now be tempted into a more close examination of it. Having discussed the Government plan, the right hon. Gentleman then went on to defend the plan which he proposes. He told the Committee that unless we associated the local bodies in Ireland with the mortgage of their rates we would practically throw the whole burden upon Ireland, and lessen the burden upon England and Scotland. I entirely differ from the right hon. Gentleman. My view has always been that we are carrying out great national objects, and that every part of the United Kingdom should aid in the fulfilment of that object. The right hon. Gentleman admits that this great object can only be carried out by the mortgaging of the rates. [Mr. MORLEY expressed dissent.] At all events, the right hon. Gentleman will not differ from me when I say that it would be quite impossible to bring forward any scheme of land purchase which did not have some local guarantee behind the Imperial Exchequer. The Government think, and I am sure rightly think, that the British public will never consent to employ their credit unless there is some local resource behind. This is the sacrifice we ask of the Irish Local Authorities in order to carry out the present scheme of land purchase; but we do not believe the Local Authorities will be called upon to sacrifice their rates, and experience of the Ashbourne Acts warrants that confidence. They are simply asked that their funds may be used as far as security is concerned. But do not the taxpayers of Great Britain give anything on their part? They give a great deal. In the first place they give their credit, although I am bound to say that I do not believe the loan of that credit will cost the British taxpayer 6d. in money. Still, that fact does not prevent the loan being a great boon to Ireland. It is a boon which, by universal admission, no effort of Irishmen could ever obtain for themselves. I venture to say that no Irishman will get up in the House and say that, if Home Rule were granted to-morrow and Irishmen had the settlement of the land question, they could settle that question by the aid of Irish credit. It would be financially an impossible task. While, then, we have asked the Irish localities to help us in this great work by the aid of their rates, the English people, on the other hand, lend them that which they would never obtain for themselves—the solidity which is given by the use of British credit. That is not all we give. This machinery of land purchase is a costly one; it cannot be made cheap, and the whole expense of this machinery is borne, not by the localities in Ireland, not by the ratepayers whose cause hon. Members opposite plead, but by the British ratepayer, for the purpose of settling a question which moreover directly affects only a small corner of the United Kingdom. All parties admit the necessity and desirability of land purchase and that it is a great work, and I contend that under the Bill all will contribute to the great result—the Irish localities by their rates, and the British public by the aid of their credit and also by bearing the whole cost of the machinery—no trifling cost either—required for carrying the scheme into operation.

Mr. KEAY attempted to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman, but he was unable to make himself heard in the cries of "Order" which were raised.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is entitled to continue his speech.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I failed to catch the observations of the hon. Gentleman. So much for the criticisms the right hon. Gentleman has made, partly on the Bill as it stands, and partly on the Bill as it would be modified by the suggestion I threw out in November last. Now I come to the discussion of the right hon. Gentleman's own proposal, which is a very simple one. It is that we should wait until County Councils are created, that when created they should be required to consider each transaction between landlord and tenant and give their decision upon it, and that no purchase should be allowed to take place until the decision had been given in favour of that transaction. Now I say that such a plan is perfectly impossible. Irish Local Authorities, as far as we have had experience of them, in a large number of cases—I will not say all, but certainly the large majority—have been animated very much more by a desire to further a political cause than the particular interest of the people they represent. [Cries of "No" from the Irish Benches.] That statement cannot be denied, at least with any plausibility. I do not intend to go through all the cases I could enumerate, as hon. Members below the Gangway opposite know, to prove what I say—but what, for instance, does the Committee think of a Resolution passed on the 11th of November, 1886, by the Ennis Board of Guardians, in which the Nationalist Guardians pledged themselves to support no candidate in a future election unless he had been a member of the Irish National League for six months previous to the day of election, and unless he produced a certificate to that effect signed by the secretary and the president of the branch? That may or may not be a proper Resolution, but it is certainly a political one, is entirely alien to the administration of the Poor Laws, and shows that these elected bodies in Ireland are not prepared to subordinate politics to every other consideration. I will take a later case. It is that of the New Ross Guardians, who were dissolved. It appears that Lord Emly had some controversy with his agricultural tenants; the National League interfered, and the tenants were induced to join in refusing to pay their rent. The tenants had been evicted, and the Board of Guardians established what was called a "ward of honour" for these non-agricultural town evicted tenants and gave them special and favourable terms. I am not now criticising the action; my point is that this is political and nothing but political, when an elected Board of Guardians throw themselves into a land controversy and take a decided side, with such vigour that they violate every rule that should guide their behaviour. Ultimately they were dissolved. I am not sure that the case is different with regard to the larger Board of Guardians at Cork. They were dissolved because time after time they insisted on discussing politics and political resolutions before they came to their proper business, to the neglect of that business. If I remember rightly the final cause of their abolition was that they discussed for four hours whether or not there should be a resolution of condolence with the senior Member for Cork, with regard to certain incidents of an entirely non-political character. Again, I am not criticising their action, but it shows that politics and politics alone in certain circumstances, to the exclusion of every other consideration, animate these elected bodies. In this connection I think that I shall not be out of order if I remind the Committee of an interruption made, some time ago, by the hon. Member for Longford. The question was asked who would determine the price of the land, and the hon. Member for Longford said, "The Land League." I have no doubt that as far as the efforts of the hon. Member were concerned it would be, if not the Land League, some other organisation which, acting through the Local Authority, would attempt as far as it could to determine the price at which these land transactions should be carried out. I would like to ask the Committee what species of justice would be done under a Bill framed on such lines. The case of Mr. So-and-so and his tenants comes before the County Council, elected on political grounds, and animated by political motives, and perhaps with a desire that the land war should continue. The County Council says, "Mr. So-and-so has evicted tenants, he is a rack-renter," or they will say he is guilty of some of those numerous offences which popularly elected bodies in Ireland are wont to find in landlords, and the bargain will not be allowed to be concluded except on the terms of seven or 10, or 13 years' purchase. Each bargain which has to pass this Local Authority would be criticised, not upon its merits, or with a view of determining from local knowledge whether the transaction was a fair one or not, but with the view of beating down the price of land and bringing the landlord, to use the classic phrase, to his knees. Who can doubt that these Local Authorities would be used for "bearing" the price of land in Ireland, for reducing it below the normal value, and making the position of any landlord who happens to contravene the laws of the League, or whatever organisation may happen to be paramount, a difficult one by saying that unless he gave in he would not be allowed to sell an acre of land to any tenant, however willing that tenant might be to buy, and however capable he might be to pay the annuity? That seems to me to be a perfectly conclusive argument against any form of local control which would allow a popularly-elected body—that is to say, a body elected by those who wish to purchase, and not by those who wish to sell—to determine which transaction should be accomplished and which should not. If any plan is adopted I hope it will not be a plan which gives control over each particular transaction. It would make the Bill not worth passing. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that one of the great recommendations of his plan, if it is adopted, is that we shall not come into direct contact with the purchasing tenant. The right hon. Gentleman has not used the word "buffer," but I understood his argument to imply that his plan would interpose between the State and the tenant, when he had bought his holding, some kind of buffer. For my own part I admit that if it has that effect there may be much to be said for it, but I cannot see how the right hon. Gentleman's proposal is to have that effect. If the Local Authorities were the persons who received the annuity, I think that there would be something in it; but the plan of the right hon. Gentleman proposes nothing of the kind. The Local Authority are simply to give their consent, and when that is given the tenant would be in direct contact with the lending Exchequer as previously.

Mr. J. MORLEY*: Yes; but then in a previous Debate I expressly stated that the advantage of giving the County Council or the Local Authority an interest was so great as to be indispensable to my scheme.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: It would be necessary to have some body in the position of mortgagee. But does the right hon. Gentleman really suppose that the assent of the Local Authority alone would secure us from repudiation? I would think very little of any Local Authority to be created in Ireland if they could not find a plausible excuse for any amount of repudiation. Repudiation has always been by popularly-elected bodies. ["Oh!"] They are the repudiating people of the world, and the fact that a Local Authority has stated that it would permit such a transaction to take place would be no security, moral, financial, or physical against repudiation after the transaction has been completed. The right hon. Gentleman concluded his speech by drawing a picture of the confusion in which Ireland would be if the Government were doing its best by legal process to collect instalments and levy rates in a time of distress. I want to know how the position of things would be worse in a time of distress under this Bill than it would have been under the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman? We have, at all events, contemplated the possibility—nay the probability—that such cases will occur. Rightly or wrongly, we have provided an insurance fund by which such distress can be met. No such insurance fund existed in the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman. In that scheme also there would have been an authority collecting rents in time of distress, and if those rents were not collected there would have been a sacrifice of local resources. It is quite true that in our case the bodies that would be hampered would be the Local Authorities of the county, and that in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the body would have been a Parliament in College Green. But how does that make the matter better? The right hon. Gentleman appears to expect that a scheme of this kind would come to grief if a time of distress occurred. But that difficulty he was ready to throw on the shoulders of the unfortunate Irish taxpayer, and no machinery was provided for dealing with such a contingency. The right hon. Gentleman simply said, "We have to collect an additional tax. If you cannot pay it, manage your own affairs; we cut you adrift."

MR. J. MORLEY: They had 18 per cent. for doing it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: But that does not make the matter better. Though it is true that the scheme of 1886 gave more to the Local Authorities than the present measure, it was given at the expense of the tenant; and therefore the tenant was far less able to meet a time of distress as contemplated under that Bill than he would be under the present measure. Therefore, I say if we are to condemn this Bill, which of all others provides machinery for dealing with distress, because in such a time it might cease to work favourably, you condemn with a double and treble condemnation every Bill which has preceded it, and, most of all, the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman. I have now endeavoured, point by point, to meet the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman. I do not think anyone will say I have failed to face the difficulties of the position, that I have shirked the material issues which have been raised, or that I have not done my best to meet the powerful but laboured argument of the right hon. Gentleman.

(11 24.) MR. PARNELL (Cork): We have had some interesting discussions initiated by English Members as to plans proposed for protecting the British taxpayer from any loss or damage under the operations of this Bill, and I am far from saying that English Members are not entitled to object to the principle of this measure and to propose every possible precaution to save the community from loss. We now come to a different undertaking, and an attempt is being made by the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) to protect the Irish taxpayer from the risk and from what I join with him in considering to be the unfair position in which the Bill proposes to place him. When I saw this very important Amendment appearing in the name of the right hon. Gentleman I wondered why it was that no Representative of the Irish taxpayer had proposed it, and that it had been left to him to protect the interests of the Irish taxpayer. In saying that I do not dispute the right of the right hon. Gentleman to move the Amendment, nor do I in any way seek to cast doubt on his bona fides in moving it. Certainly I do not undervalue the protest which the right hon. Gentleman has made against the absence of local control, for which the Bill is distinguished, and which I think is its greatest blot. The right hon. Gentleman has very justly and very eloquently shown that there ought to be local control in return for the hypothecation of Imperial grants in aid, and that, failing such local control, we are violating one of the first principles of representative self-government which you carried out in establishing County Councils for Great Britain. But the right hon. Gentleman went further, and in doing so I cannot see my way to accompany him, because the right hon. Gentleman says that until local control is given he will not allow any sales to take place under the operations of this Act. If the Amendment be accepted as it stands an absolute end will be put to all further land purchase in Ireland until County Government has been established, except with regard to the unexhausted balance of the Ashbourne Acts, and probably with regard to those sales which have been partially completed in Ireland. I have had an opportunity of learning a good deal about the wishes of the Irish tenants in regard to land purchase, and I do not believe they desire that Irish land purchase should be interrupted. I think they want to get the 40 per cent.

reductions which they hope to obtain under the operation of this Bill. I think it is a fact that will not be denied by any Representative from Ireland representing an agricultural constituency that there is a great anxiety on the part of the Irish tenants to get rid, to some extent, of the crushing burdens of the judicial rents which are now upon them. The Irish tenants welcomed this measure in the hope that their burdens might to some extent be relieved by its operation. The right hon. Gentleman says that Local Government may be established next year or the year after. We do not know that it will. I have been hearing of the probability of its establishment for the last 25 years; and if we placed in the Bill the proviso of the right hon. Gentleman that there should be no further land purchase in Ireland until County Government is established, and if the Liberal Party should come into Office after the next General Election, as I suppose they intend to do, how much County Government would they establish, knowing that by refusing to establish it they would prevent the advance of one single penny for land purchase in Ireland? We do not exactly know what the Liberal Programme is. We have not heard anyhow, that it is County Government. We have heard that it may be Home Rule, or "one man one vote." In more recent times the balance seems rather inclining to "one man one vote" as the pièce de résistance, at all events, for the first year. That programme, if carried out, would postpone the establishment of County Government by the Liberals when they came into Office by at least two years from the present date, assuming we get a General Election within 12 months; and, looking to the fact that during the 25 years that County Government has been spoken of as likely to be passed in a short time the Liberal Party have been mainly in Office, I do not think we are entitled to postpone land purchase indefinitely because of the prospect that it will be probably passed by the Liberal Party in the near future. The opinion of the Irish tenants will probably be found to be that "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush," and while I should be glad to support the right hon. Gentleman in the attempt to obtain local control, I should not wish to go with him in saying that we shall have no land purchase until we get Home Rule. With the view of improving the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman and making it coincide with the ideas I have ventured to put before the Committee, I have drafted a further Amendment. I do not know whether it will meet with his acceptance. I suppose I can hardly hope for the acceptance by him of any suggestion from me, but I offer it to him and to the Committee in the belief that it will amend his proposal in such a fashion as will enable us as far as possible to secure local control without putting a stop to the progress of land purchase. I propose to insert, after the first two words of the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment—

"After the enactment of any measure establishing County Councils in Ireland,"

The Amendment would then read thus:—

"Provided that after the enactment of any measure establishing County Councils in Ireland no guaranteed Land Stock shall be issued," &c., "unless the making of such advance shall be previously approved by a Resolution of the County Council elected to represent the county in which the holding is situate under an Act of this or the next ensuing Session of Parliament."

Having said so much on the Amendment, I wish to express my very great disappointment that we have had no clear pronouncement from the Chief Secretary with regard to his proposed method of plébiscite for ascertaining the views of the Irish ratepayers before this measure comes into operation. May I ask from the right hon. Gentleman that before this Debate closes we shall have some more specific announcement? The Committee is entitled to so much guidance from the right hon. Gentleman before being asked to divide on the Amendment. Undoubtedly it would be advantageous if the ratepayers were afforded an opportunity of watching the operation of the Act from time to time and saying whether they will co-operate in its working. This would be a valuable concession to the principle of local control, for it would give the ratepayers the right of deciding whether their credit shall be pledged or not. If it should be found—which I do not apprehend—that popular opinion is against the operation of the Act, then the County Councils could step in and stop it. Of course, the proposal for handing over to the County Boards the duty of adjudicating upon each separate sale is much preferable, and I hope that before the discussion proceeds much further the Chief Secretary will explain fully the views of the Government on this point. With regard to the larger question of the effect of land purchase upon the future settlement of Ireland and the peace of the country, I certainly think that the policy of the Front Opposition Bench is a false one. The policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, that the land question ought to be first settled, so that the working of Home Rule would be easier, is the true one from his point of view. It is, indeed, surprising that the right hon. Gentleman has not been able to convert his colleagues to his own more sensible views. I have always been amazed that they have been able to carry the right hon. Gentleman so far along with them as they have done. There can be no doubt that the land question will be a difficult one for any Liberal Government, and if they can get one-third or one-fourth of it out of the way, the task of the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues will pro tanto have been undoubtedly and materially facilitated and assisted. However, now that the scruples of the English Radical school have been voted down by the Committee on the previous Amendment, I hope that the measure will be considered from the Irish point of view, and that the Chief Secretary will express his willingness to assent to any reasonable proposals coming from the Irish Benches which will make the measure a more workable one and remove grave objections entertained by many hon. Members from Ireland to it in its present shape.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment,

After the word "that," in line 1, to insert the words "after the establishment of elected County Councils in Ireland."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted in the proposed Amendment."

(11.45.) Mr. FLYNN: It seems to me that the Amendment now before the Committee would act as a premium to any Conservative Government never to establish County Councils in Ireland; and for this reason: that if there were any possibility of the County Councils or Local Bodies unduly hampering the operation of a Land Purchase Act, the Tory Party would not be anxious to facilitate the creation of such bodies with such inconvenient powers. If the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork were accepted, it would act as a strong inducement to the present Government and to any future Tory Government never to establish County Government in Ireland. The speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland naturally divides itself into two parts. With characteristic dexterity he evaded the main point put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, but he addressed himself with great force and, at times, great vehemence of denunciation to a defence of the system of Local Government which he says the Tory Party are to establish next year or the year after. If I understood properly the gesture of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Government have already a Bill on the stocks, but I shall refuse to believe in its reality until I see it launched from the stocks. Why did the Chief Secretary flout and sneer at and deride the operation of Local Government in Ireland? Why did he persist in bringing forward unfavourable examples? Why did he quote cases in which Boards of Guardians had been superseded? Is that the way to recommend Local Government for Ireland? Notwithstanding the platonic affection of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for the Member for Cork, I entertain a wholesome scepticism as to the intentions of the Tory Party to establish Local Government. The Chief Secretary managed to lay delightful emphasis on the phrase which suggested that they will give circumscribed and limited Local Government. In fact, he foreshadowed that the Local Authorities in Ireland are to be shorn of nearly all power, and will, practically, be of no use whatever. I contend that the larger portion of the right hon. Gentleman's speech was not a defence, but a denunciation and condemnation, of Local Government in Ireland, and an attempt to demonstrate that the Irish people were utterly unfit to take advantage of any legitimate or useful measure. The point which he evaded answering was as to what kind of local control he intends to give to the Irish people. What will be the referendum to the rate-payers? And it is important to know this, seeing the suspicious alliance which is now growing up under our eyes. I doubt whether, even to satisfy the Member for Cork, the Chief Secretary will give us the terms of the Reference. All he has done is to tell us in vague terms that he may or may not, in the discussion on Clause 6, outline the intentions of the Government with regard to the plébiscite. I think we are justified in calling for a distinct statement on that point, and we tell the Committee and the country that they are drifting into what may become a very dangerous condition of things by failing to deal with these matters. I contend it is absolutely essential to have Local Bodies established in Ireland in order to have some control over the question of land purchase. It is the very essence of despotism and tyranny to tax a locality for any purpose without giving that locality some voice in the management and disposal of the funds thus raised. If you do not give us the opportunity by means of a National Body established in Dublin, and if, at the same time, you refuse to give us control by means of bodies established in the various localities, then I say the Treasury and the British taxpayer will be incurring serious responsibility. I had intended to bring forward a number of cases in which purchasers under the Ashbourne Acts were already complaining of having been forced under threat of eviction to purchase their holdings on terms so onerous as to be impossible of fulfilment. Are you going to repeat that under this Act, and on a large scale? You have by coercion exhausted our country, you have stopped legitimate combinations among tenants, and I should like to know—

HOUSE OF LORDS,

SAT FIRST.

The Earl of Carnarvon, after the death of his father.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES BILL.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I wish to ask my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies a question of which I have given him private notice. I have looked at the precedent quoted by my noble Friend the other night with regard to Procedure in the House of Commons in hearing Petitioners at the Bar of that House, and I find that in 1832, upon the Canada Bill, they pursued what seems a very singular course—namely, that although the principle of the Bill was objected to by the Canadians, they read the Bill a second time without Debate, and then Mr. Roebuck was heard on behalf of the colony, and afterwards the Debate, as it was distinctly laid down, took place upon the principle as if the Second Reading was not past, upon the question that the House should go into Committee. But I have been informed that there has been found some precedent in this House the other way. If that is so, I am sure my noble Friend will be glad to take advantage of it, and enable us to pursue the more rational course of hearing the Petitioners if they should think fit to Petition the House first, and read the Bill a second time afterwards, when we are in full possession of their case. I desire to ask the noble Lord whether, if it be found on the further consideration of the matter, that that course can be taken, he will put off the Second Reading of the Bill for a reasonable time?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNOTSFORD): I am much obliged to the noble Earl for bringing this question under consideration. When I made some remarks a few nights ago about the invariable practice of having the Bill read a second time before Counsel were heard against it, I confined them strictly to the House of Commons, but since that time I have found that in the Jamaica case in 1839 in this House Counsel were heard upon the Order for the Second Reading. When the Order for Second Reading was read, Counsel were heard and then the Second Reading was taken. Therefore, in hearing Counsel before the Second Reading, we should be acting strictly in accordance with the precedent of 1839, which was the last time that Counsel were heard at the Bar of this House. Moreover, since I made those remarks my attention has been called to the fact that the Procedure of the House of Commons has been altered since 1839, and, whereas formerly after the Second Reading of a Bill there was an opportunity of further Debate on the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair—and that is the Motion to which my noble Friend has referred, and on which the Debate took place—that has now been swept away, and the consequence is that the Speaker leaves the Chair at once on the Bill going into Committee. Therefore, it is probable in the House of Commons, under the altered procedure, if the representatives of Newfoundland desire to be heard in the House of Commons, they would be heard before the Second Reading. In view of that fact, and considering also that it is desirable that there should be uniformity of action between the two Houses, I propose not to move the Second Reading of the Bill on Monday, but to put it down for Thursday or Friday, and that will give plenty of time for the Petition, which I believe is nearly if not quite ready to be presented, and for the Motion to be made that Counsel be heard before the Second Reading.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: Perhaps it would be convenient to your Lordships that I should take this opportunity of saying that I shall have a Petition to present from the Legislature of Newfoundland praying to be heard by Representatives at the Bar of your Lordships' House with reference to the legislative proposals of the Bill which has been introduced by the Government. I shall, therefore, on the Second Reading of the Bill, move that the prayer of the Petition be granted.

THE AUSTRALIAN CONVENTION.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD NORTON: In asking Her Majesty's Government whether they would lay upon the Table of the House Papers relating to the draft constitution agreed to by the Australian Convention, said: My Lords, I know that the Draft Bill for the Constitution agreed to by the Convention for the Australian Colonies has appeared in extenso in the newspapers, and it is for that reason, and because of the comments which have been made upon it in the Press, and in general conversation, that I think it would be most desirable that the noble Lord should, as soon as possible, give what I may call an authoritative correction of a very false impression which has become prevalent of the nature of this Bill, and which, for the great interests involved, requires information before the discussion of the Bill in the Imperial Parliament, and before its ratification by any of the individual Australian Colonies. It seems to be considered by many that the Bill shows an intentional departure from the Constitution of the Mother Country, and that its framers have preferred for its model the more democratic version of that Constitution, which a blunder in policy led our most powerful old colonies, now the United States, to adopt in actual separation from us. I believe that more authoritative information, and the presentation of Papers upon this subject, will show precisely the reverse, that the closest possible reproduction of the Home Constitution has been aimed at by the Australians as far as possible in a distant colony. The circumstances of a new and offset community are, of course, such as not to admit of an actual fac simile of the ancestral Constitution, but as far as they could adhere to it it seems to me they have. The double House of Legislature was at once adopted by the Convention, without any Debate whatever. This point, indeed, is universally agreed upon. It was long ago exhaustively discussed by the founders of our first great colonies, and the celebrated lessons drawn from their English experience, and recorded in the Federalist, have left no rational question as to the necessity, in the interests of freedom, of a Second Chamber in the Legislature to check the tyranny of sudden impulse or inconsiderate changes emanating from the single action of the first. That being conceded without any difficulty, and at once adopted, the principal Debate of the Convention was upon the status of their Senate and its composition, and I think it is clear, as far as we can gather from their Reports, there was a wise consensus that, in imitation of the House of Lords, the Senate should be as differently composed as possible from the Representative Assembly. The object clearly was, and wisely so, to make the two Chambers supplement each other, as the centripetal and centrifugal forces combine in mutual regulation, and to avoid anything like rivalry or conflict which might be caused by similarity of composition. The difficulty, of course, was in a new Assembly to make such a distinction. This old country has the enormous advantage of old-established and long-accustomed emanation of one of the Chambers from the Crown, and of the election of the people, or rather, I would say, the managers of the people, for the constitution of the other. There is a difficulty in that extent of distinction being imitated by a new community. The utmost they can do is to make two Chambers by as different kinds of election as possible, but no difference of election can completely succeed in constituting such an unconflicting partnership as we enjoy in the old country. The Australians seem, as far as possible, to have followed the example of the United States, which adopted, as far as they could, the model in this respect of the Constitution of the old country. I think the Australians in the Convention have shown an anxiety to keep their country within what I may call the popular Monarchy of the British realm, and avoid any appearance of separating themselves from it, or of substituting for themselves a pure Democracy. It is in the hope of this being made clear while the Bills for this purpose are still under discussion that I put the question; and as the subject will soon have to come before this House for discussion, it is desirable that there should be no prejudice from the American terms in the Bill. Therefore I beg to ask the noble Lord if he will furnish these Papers, and, if so, as soon as possible, for I think it is important that they should be presented at an early date?

LORD KNUTSFORD: My Lords, it is not the practice to present to Parliament unauthenticated newspaper reports of proceedings, however important, and at present the Colonial Office has only received, two or three days ago, two numbers of the Official Record of the Debates, and those two numbers carry the account of the proceedings only up to the third day. It would be very undesirable, nor do I imagine that the noble Lord would wish it, to present the Papers in an incomplete form, that is, giving each number of the Record as it comes over here. I propose, therefore, to wait until we have the whole of the Official Record. When complete, I see no objection, on the contrary, I see every reason, why the Papers should be presented to Parliament. The noble Lord asks me to give an authoritative statement as to the point which he has raised. I can conceive nothing more unwise than that the Secretary of State for the Colonies should give his view upon Debates which have recently taken place in Australia. I can give, however, if I may be allowed to do so, an "authoritative statement" of my opinion upon one point, and that is that every one who reads the Debates, even as they appear in the newspapers, must be sensible of the good common-sense judgment and ability with which the proceedings in the Convention have been conducted.

PUBLIC BODIES (PROVISIONAL ORDERS) BILL.—(No. 74.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD THRING: My Lords, this is a Bill to remove a doubt which exists as to certain provisions with regard to the application of borough funds under the Borough Funds Act and the Local Government Act of 1888, when considered in relation to the Railways and Canals Traffic Act. The question, though a very small one, is this: Under the Borough Funds Act and the Local Government Act, Local Bodies are given the power of opposing, at the expense of the rates, any local Act. Under the Canals Traffic Act, the Local Government Board had power to make Provisional Orders, but, instead of calling them Local and Provisional Orders, they have been called Public Acts; and some weighty authority in the law has declared that there is a doubt whether under those circumstances Local Bodies can oppose these Provisional Orders under the Canals Traffic Act. I need not tell your Lordships that there cannot be a shadow of doubt they are more than within the mischief of the Acts. These are provisions which affect all Local Bodies. It was obviously intended that the provisions of the Borough Funds Act and the other Act I have mentioned, the County Act should apply, and that the Local Bodies should be allowed to oppose those Acts which involve matters that may be prejudicial to them. I therefore ask your Lordships to allow this Bill to be read a second time, so as to settle the doubt by placing for this purpose the borough funds under the provisions of the Canals Traffic Act.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

EVIDENCE BILL [H.L.]—(No. 71.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD DENMAN: I have to trouble your Lordships with a few observations upon this Bill. This is a very great change in the law, and the Grand Committee will have considerable trouble in arriving at a conclusion in respect of it. We have had Law of Evidence Amendment Bills passing first in this House and then in the other House, but no decision come to upon them. By this Bill any person accused of murder may be allowed to swear to his innocence—

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Will the noble Lord allow me to interrupt him in order to prevent his speaking under a misapprehension? This Bill contains no such provision as he imagines; it is simply a Bill for the consolidation of the existing law.

LORD DENMAN: I am much obliged to the Lord Chancellor for correcting me, and I will not trouble your Lordships with further remarks.

House in Committee (according to order); Bill reported without Amendment, and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

TRUSTEE BILL (H.L.)—(No. 72.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

*LORD DENMAN: My Lords, this Bill deals with a very important subject. For the protection of Trustees a Bill was brought in on a former occasion saving them from all liability if they had invested money of cestius que trusts in undertakings without limited liability, and that was a great step in advance. There is also a very important alteration in this Bill in reference to the Law of Breach of Promise. My noble Friend who generally sits on the Front Opposition Bench wished to entirely abolish all such actions, and there is a provision in this Bill, as far as I read it, by which those actions will not go forward. This may be just, and probably will be so. In regard to taking evidence, I fear that perjury has greatly increased in County Courts by the admission of parties as witnesses in their own cases. I have watched this as a Magistrate, and I have seen that in certain cases there is almost sure to be unblushing perjury committed, and the persons implicated seem to glory in it. I trust that the Grand Committee will take these few observations of mine into consideration as I am afraid I shall not be able to attend upon it, and I very heartily wish success to this Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Lest any misapprehension should be caused in the mind of any of your Lordships by the remarks of the noble Lord, I wish to say that this also is purely and absolutely a Consolidation Bill. There is not a single alteration in the law proposed by it, and, as I have said, it is simply for consolidating in one Act what is at present spread over a great number of Statutes.

House in Committee (according to order); Bill reported without Amendment, and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

MIDDLESEX REGISTRY BILL—(No. 87.)
COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

*LORD DENMAN: This Bill is certainly a very necessary one, because a very important office has been discontinued, and now there is a power given to the Lord Chancellor to arrange everything under this Bill. The noble and learned Lord will have a most difficult task in arranging how those who have really to do the duty shall be remunerated in future; but in case his Lordship's alterations should not meet the approbation of the country, I do think the country and both Houses of Parliament ought to have an opportunity of seeing what those alterations are. Therefore, I venture to move that this Bill should only be for the space of one year. That course was adopted with regard to the Ballot Bill, and it has been a continuance Bill from year to year. I do not believe that any inconvenience would arise from the adoption of this Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I am afraid I cannot acquiesce in what the noble Lord suggests. Practically, the effect of this Bill is to put into the coffers of the State what has hitherto gone to the holders of a particular office. I may remind your Lordships that the history of the Middlesex Registry has been rather a curious one. From time to time its numbers have been altered. By a Statute of Anne it had consisted of four Registrars. The number was then reduced to two; but, though there was then power to appoint in respect of two, the good feeling of those who had the right of appointment induced them not to exercise that power, and only one was appointed. The effect of the present Bill is that, there being an existing staff in the Registry office which exists for the purpose of registering titles, there shall be amalgamated with it the Middlesex Registry, which for all purposes will have the same staff and be worked in the same manner as formerly, except that there will be a real head actually working. Under those circumstances I cannot recommend to your Lordships that the improvement should only last for one year, the whole object of this Act being to amalgamate the two systems together and to nominate one person as the responsible head for the administration of the office. I must, therefore, ask your Lordships to negative the noble Lord's Amendment.

LORD DENMAN : I am quite satisfied with having been the means of obtaining from the noble and learned Lord an explanation of what his views are upon this question.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Bill reported without Amendment; Standing Committee negatived; and Bill to be read 3^a on Monday next.

ELECTORAL DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL.—(No. 85.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR : My Lords, this Bill is to supply a defect which has been found to exist in the Act with reference to persons exercising the franchise. By a particular decision it has been adjudicated that persons absent, although away on public duties, during the qualifying period, were deprived of their franchise. That has been considered to be unjust, and therefore the object of this Bill, which has passed the other House, is to remove that difficulty by providing that persons absent in the performance of public duties during the qualifying period, not exceeding four months, should not on that account be deprived of the franchise. Your Lordships will no doubt consider that they should be permitted to exercise their right of franchise notwithstanding their absence for that period.

Read 2^a (according to order), and committed to Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

HERRING BRANDING (NORTHUMBERLAND) BILL.—(No. 92.)

TAXES (REGULATION OF REMUNERATION) BILL.—(No. 93.)

Brought from the Commons; read 1^a, and to be printed,

REGISTRATION OF CERTAIN WRITS (SCOTLAND) BILL [R.L.]—(No. 61.)

Returned from the Commons; agreed to.

House adjourned at five minutes before Five o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 17th April, 1891.

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

INDIAN AGRICULTURE—

MR. VOELCKER'S REPORT.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State for India has received a Report from Mr. J. Augustus Voelcker, Ph. D., B.A., B.Sc., recently deputed to inquire into and report upon the agriculture of India, containing his main conclusions and recommendations concerning the improvement of Indian agriculture, more particularly such improvement as might result from the teachings of science; and when the Secretary of State expects to be able to make Dr. Voelcker's Report public?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. Gorst, Chatham): We expect to receive the full Report of Dr. Voelcker in the autumn; and the Secretary of State does not anticipate that there will be any difficulty in making it public.

MR. SCHWANN: After it has been received how long will it be before it is made public?

SIR J. GORST: If the hon. Member will move for it after it has been received, I have no doubt that I shall be able to give it at once.

MANIPUR.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if his attention has been drawn to the statement in Thursday's Times, that all villages in Manipur which offer resistance are to be burned; if the Secretary of State for India will enjoin on Commanders of Columns that no village shall be burned for offering resistance unaccompanied by cruelty to wounded or to prisoners, or by treachery on the part of that particular village; and if it is the custom, in waging war in the Frontier States of India, to depart from the usual customs of civilised war without the personal sanction of the Empress of India?

*SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State has not received any official information as to the statement in the Times that all villages in Manipur which offer resistance are to be burned, or in regard to the operations of the troops at Manipur. He has the fullest confidence that the Government of India will in any Proclamation they may issue act with due regard to those principles of justice and mercy which have always been observed in our Indian frontier wars.

COLONEL NOLAN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to be a little more explicit. Is he prepared to deny that the statement gravely and officially given in the Times is founded on fact; and, if so, is he going to leave it to chance whether villages may be burned down or not, the people probably being engaged only in defending their houses? Will the Government give orders that villages are not to be burned unless there is an absolute necessity for so extreme a course under the rules of civilised warfare?

*SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State will not assume that the Government of India will act with impropriety, and, therefore, there is no necessity to direct them to act properly. He will rather assume that they will act properly, and will take no steps unless there is direct evidence that they have not done so.

COLONEL NOLAN: Will the Under Secretary explain whether a British Column will be allowed to act differently in this expedition from the way in which a German Column would act against France in a European war? Is he not of opinion that that would be improper?

*SIR J. GORST: Certainly, Sir.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): Is it the fact that the troops put to death women and children?

Colonel Nolan

*SIR J. GORST: I have seen such a statement in the newspapers, but there is no official information of the kind.

CHARGE OF CRIMINAL CONSPIRACY.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the case of two men who were tried in the Sheriff Criminal Court, Glasgow, on the 30th of March, and found guilty of criminal conspiracy, on the ground that the accused, being members of a Trades Union, called out, or said they would call out, their fellow-members unless a non-unionist fellow-workman was dismissed; whether his attention has been called to the comments of the learned Sheriff on the novelty of the charge, and his statement that its legality had been ascertained by the trial; and also to the ruling that the exemption from the Common Law of Conspiracy contained in "The Conspiracy and Protection to Property Act, 1875," does not extend to trade disputes between workmen; and whether, having regard to the great importance of the issues involved, he will consent to lay upon the Table an authentic Report of the proceedings, including the Sheriff's charge to the jury?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): These men were convicted by a jury on a Common Law charge of conspiracy to deprive a man of the means of earning his livelihood as a dock labourer by making threats to his employers that if he was retained in their employment the accused would withdraw from their employment all members of the Trade Union. The man who was thus persecuted was a member of the Union, who had a difference with some of the office bearers, and declined to pay some fines which they had imposed. The accused followed him about wherever he got employment and compassed his dismissal in each place. The statements in the second paragraph of the hon. and learned Member's question are inaccurate. The learned Sheriff, I believe, remarked that the case was, he was glad to say, unusual in Scotland, and that all concerned would be made aware through the trial of the illegality of such proceedings. He also directed the jury that there was no evidence that the illegal acts were done in furtherance of a trade dispute between employers and workmen, and that, therefore, the exemption in the 3rd section of the Act of 1875 did not apply. There is no official record of the learned Sheriff's Charge, and the official record of the proceedings is merely in the usual form. I do not propose to lay any Papers on the Table.

MILITIA COMPETITIVE EXAMINATION.

MR. D. SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War when the result of the Militia competitive examination, held on the 17th, 18th, and 19th of last month, will be communicated to the candidates?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The result of the examination will be made known on the 21st of this month.

POISONING AT CRIEFF.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the recent case of wholesale poisoning at Crieff; how many persons were affected with symptoms of poisoning, and in how many did fatal results supervene; whether any official investigation has been made into the occurrence, and by whom; and whether, as reported, the poisoning has been traced to the use of impure sugar; if so, whether the nature and origin of the poisonous impurity have been determined?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I am sorry to learn that about 100 persons were affected with symptoms of poisoning, and that two of them have died. An official investigation is being conducted by the Procurator Fiscal, and is now almost complete. The poisoning seems to have been due to the persons affected having partaken of sugar, the bags conveying which had come in contact, in course of transit in a railway waggon, with a case containing several tins of a preparation called "Climax Weed Killer," a substance which contains arsenic. The case was leaking, and samples of the sugar have been analysed and found to contain arsenic in dangerous quantities.

DR. CAMERON: As the matter is one of very great public interest, will the right hon. Gentleman consider the propriety of obtaining such a Report as he can make public?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: There will be a special inquiry, and Papers will be called for.

SALMON FISHERIES ACTS.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I had intended to ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the Salmon Fisheries Acts and the sections thereof relating to the placing of gratings in watercourses, millraces, or other channels for conveying water for working mills; and whether there are any special provisions relating to mills worked by turbines; and, if so, if he will state the Acts and sections containing these special provisions? At the request of the President of the Board of Trade, I beg to defer the question until Monday.

METROPOLITAN DISTRICT POST OFFICES.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General when the Overseers of the Metropolitan District Post Offices may expect to receive a detailed answer to their Petition of November, 1889, or whether the new scale of pay recently adopted is to be considered an answer; if so, whether he is aware that the Overseers are paid in many cases at a lower rate of wages than sorters over whom they exercise supervision; and if he is prepared to recommend a scale of pay more in accordance with the nature of their duties?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The decision of the Treasury dated the 16th February, 1891, fixed the scale of the Overseers referred to as follows:—First Class, 56s. by 2s. to 66s., in lieu of 52s. by 2s. to 62s., Second Class, 40s. by 2s. to 56s., in lieu of 40s. by 2s. to 50s. It is not the case that a scale of wages has been fixed for Overseers lower than that given to the sorters whom they supervise, although it may be the case that a sorter of long service on his class may receive through special allowance more than an Overseer Class II. of short service on his class. I may mention that new allowances of 5s. a week are given to 83 Second Class Town District Overseers in addition to their wages, in order to mark the distinction between the two classes. I am not now able to say if the Treasury would be disposed to re-consider a decision so recently arrived at, and which has scarcely had time to come into operation.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

MR. BALLANTINE (Coventry): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, by the terms of the Agreement between Great Britain and France, submitting to arbitration questions relating to the lobster fishery on the Coast of Newfoundland, it is open to the arbitrators to decide that the French are entitled to erect permanent lobster factories on the so-called French shore; and whether the names of three Foreign jurists, selected to act as arbitrators, were suggested by the French Government; and, if not, in what manner were they chosen and their qualifications ascertained?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The first Article of the Agreement between Great Britain and France says that the Committee of Arbitration shall judge and decide all the questions which shall be submitted to it by either Government or by their delegates concerning the catching and preparation of lobsters on the Coast of Newfoundland. But it will be seen, on reference to the Correspondence, that the French Government have never attempted to claim a right to erect permanent factories, their argument having been based on the statement that their factories are temporary erections. The terms of the Treaty of Utrecht are quite clear as to forbidding permanent buildings of any kind by the French. For the purpose of the selection of the jurists, several Foreign Governments were requested to suggest names of properly qualified persons, and the choice was then made by common consent.

MINES (EIGHT HOURS) BILL.

MR. PICKARD (York, W.R., Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is now able to arrange a day to continue the Debate on the Second Reading of the Mines (Eight Hours) Bill?

Mr. Raikes

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am unable to arrange a day for the continuance of the Debate on the Second Reading of this Bill.

MR. PICKARD: Will the right hon. Gentleman be able in the course of the Session to grant a day?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It will depend entirely upon the progress of Public Business. I am certainly not encouraged by the present progress that is being made at the present time.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS IN WEXFORD.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in view of the increase of labour which the recent change in the local postal arrangements entails upon the letter carrier from Gorey to Killnerin, County Wexford, the Post Office will allow him an increase of pay sufficient to enable him to keep a cart?

*MR. RAIKES: I find that the wages of the postman referred to by the hon. Member have already been raised in consideration of the recent addition to his work. As a matter of fact, the circumstances did not warrant a mounted service; but as the postman had for several years voluntarily used a pony and cart in performing his official duties, I sanctioned, as a matter of grace and favour, an allowance in aid of the keep of the pony. I think the hon. Baronet will be of opinion that the postman has been justly and even liberally treated.

ILLEGAL FISHING IN LOUGH DERG.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that fishing with an otter has been declared illegal on Lough Derg, County Tipperary; and if he is also aware that licences have been already taken out this season for otter fishing on that lake; and, if so, whether those who have paid for those licences will be allowed to make use of them?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries report that the use of the otter is illegal everywhere in Ireland under statute. Licences have not been issued for otter fishing on Lough Derg, County Tipperary. They have been issued for cross-lines, but this would not authorise the use of the otter, which, as above stated, is expressly prohibited by statute.

THE LAND PURCHASE BILL.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what does he estimate to be the number and acreage of the holdings in each province in Ireland which will be excluded from the operation of the Land Purchase Bill by Clause 6, (a) as pasture, and (b) because the tenant is non-resident; and what are the sources of the information upon which his estimate is based?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not got the figures with me to-day, and I am unable to give the hon. Gentleman an account. Perhaps it will be more convenient to defer the question until I am able to obtain the figures.

MR. KNOX: If I put down a question for Monday, will the right hon. Gentleman be able to answer it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think so.

In reply to a question by MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.),

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: There is no doubt that "pasture" includes both dairy pasture and stockland. I will endeavour, if possible, to obtain particulars in regard to each.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman is probably aware that his Bill is really more stringent than the Land Act of 1881.

MR. M. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the Committee stage of the Land Department (Ireland) Bill will be proceeded with immediately after the Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill has passed through Committee?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think it is desirable at this stage to make any definite promise.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will it be taken before the Third Reading of the Land Purchase Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall be prepared to answer the question when we reach that stage.

IRISH RELIEF WORKS.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any, and if any what, relief works have been commenced in County Cavan; and whether the contemplated roads in the barony of Tullyhaw, for which presentments were refused by the Grand Jury (although the County Surveyor declared them to be works of great public utility) on account of a letter received from the Under Secretary, will be made as relief works?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No necessity has so far arisen for the opening of relief works in the County Cavan. The case stands in this way: In every district in Ireland where it has been thought likely that relief works would be required the Grand Jury have been asked if they would permit the services of the County Surveyor to be utilised. A letter has been written to every county to that effect, perhaps not so well expressed as it might have been.

MR. KNOX: The right hon. Gentleman admits that the letter was not well expressed. It certainly conveyed a false impression to the County of Cavan; and I trust the right hon. Gentleman will consider the desirability of directing such relief works to be made as are urgently needed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think that any misapprehension can have been created in the minds of the Grand Jury of Cavan. It is rather a matter for the Guardians than for the Grand Jury.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any relief works were recommended by the Local Government Board (Ireland) Inspectors in the Ballyvourney and Kilnamartyra districts, in the County of Cork; and, if so, why such works are not being proceeded with?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The districts mentioned are receiving the careful attention of the Government. But I am glad to say there is no present necessity to open relief works in them.

DR. TANNER: Is it not the fact that seeing the absolute destitution which is almost impending it was promised some time ago by the Local Government Inspectors that two roads should be opened?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am unable to answer that question.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the proposed Donoughmore and Blarney Light Railway has been commenced, and how many labourers of the district have been employed on the works?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that the proposed line of light railway has been all surveyed, but that the works have not yet been commenced.

DR. TANNER: I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say two months ago that the works had been commenced, but the information given to the right hon. Gentleman appears to have been misleading and false. Is there any chance of the works being commenced soon?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman should apply to the promoters of the line for that information.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what relief works are in progress in the Tuam and Glenamaddy unions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No relief works are in progress in either of the unions mentioned. I do not think the necessity has yet arisen.

COLONEL NOLAN: Did not the right hon. Gentleman state a month or five weeks ago that works were in contemplation and almost in progress in one of the districts? How does he reconcile that statement with his present answer?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In consequence of representations made, partly by the hon. Member and partly in other quarters, works were started in one of the unions at the ordinary rate of payment.

COLONEL NOLAN: How much?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It was at the ordinary rate, but the people refused to work for it.

COLONEL NOLAN: How much was it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe it was about 5s. a week.

MAIL SERVICE IN THE NORTH OF IRELAND.

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT (Antrim, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, with regard to the establishment of an accelerated mail service to and from the North of Ireland by Larne and Stranraer, and in consideration of the fact that the matter has now been under the consideration of the Government for some 12 months; that public meetings have been held in Belfast under the presidency of the Mayor, and in other large towns; that Memorials have been forwarded from numerous Public Bodies, as well as one signed by Her Majesty's Lieutenants for the Counties of Antrim and Londonderry, and by the Members of Parliament for those counties; and that a large and representative deputation waited on the Postmaster General in June last, all in favour of the route being subsidised without delay, he is now in a position to make any statement with regard to the matter?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The question of an accelerated mail service to Belfast and the North of Ireland has been receiving the most careful consideration of the Postmaster General and the Treasury. At this moment the Postmaster General is considering a suggestion recently made to him to send a portion of the mails by Greenore so as to give a later hour for posting in certain districts. The information obtained appears to point in the direction of an acceleration which could be obtained by utilising for a large portion of the mails the service by Kingstown. The estimated cost of the Larne and Stranraer route is very large. I am aware that my hon. and gallant Friend believes that an increased expenditure of about £15,000 a year would suffice. No proposal, however, in any official form, has been made for less than £25,000. I am inclined to think that it would be impossible to have an improved service to all parts of the North of Ireland at a less cost. I shall be glad to tell the hon. Gentleman anything further if he will speak to me.

In reply to Mr. LEA (Londonderry, S.),

*MR. JACKSON said: It is the duty of the Government to consider in what form and at what cost the best service can be provided. There is every desire to improve the mail service to Belfast and the North of Ireland, but it is necessary that certain communications should take place before a conclusion is arrived at. I hope very shortly to be able to make an announcement.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): Are we to consider that the question of conveying the mails by way of Greenore has been seriously considered?

*MR. JACKSON: My hon and gallant Friend is to understand exactly what I said. I stated that a suggestion had been made to my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General, that a certain portion of the mails might be sent by that route which would enable letters to be posted at a later hour than is possible by any other route. My right hon. Friend is endeavouring to ascertain if it is possible to make a selection.

LOCAL REGISTRATION OF TITLE (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. M. J. KENNY: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he will consent to commit the Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Bill to the Standing Committee on Law, &c.?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The suggestion is one that is deserving of careful consideration, and I shall be glad to confer upon it with hon. Members on both sides of the House who take an interest in the question.

MR. M. J. KENNY: In the preparation of the Bill was Leach's Report taken into consideration?

*MR. MADDEN: As a matter of fact the Bill is, in substance, identical with that which was introduced last year, which was proposed before the Report referred to by the hon. Member was published. In revising the Bill of last year, before re-introducing it, I had regard to this Report, as well as to various suggestions which persons interested in the measure were good enough to offer me.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will consider the desirability, in consequence of so many Members sit-the suggestion of the hon. Member. I have considered, so far as the means at my disposal have allowed me, the suggestion made yesterday with regard to the alteration of the Standing Order affecting the Evening Sittings on Tuesdays and Fridays, when following Morning Sittings, and I intend to put a Motion on the Paper for Monday at 12 o'clock—that is to say, after the ordinary business has been disposed of—for the consideration of the House. If the House is disposed to accept it I should be very glad to move it, but it is one which is entirely for the House itself to decide. It is not in any way a matter which the Government would think it right to press upon the House. The Motion I should make would be that the Sittings on Tuesday and Friday evenings shall be held subject to the rules which regulate the ordinary Day Sittings. The result would be that the Debate would be suspended at 12 o'clock, and that any Opposed Business could not be taken after that hour. If it were possible to dispose of any Motions which are not opposed, or to go through the Orders of the Day for the purpose of fixing them for a future day after 12 o'clock, that I think would be a convenience to hon. Members generally. It would also afford facilities which the present rules deny to hon. Members, to get the stage of an Unopposed Bill, or to get an Unopposed Motion accepted by the House. I make this statement by way of explanation, but I trust the House will understand that in putting the Motion down for 12 o'clock on Monday, I do not wish to urge the House to accept it then if further time is desired for its consideration, or if there is any considerable feeling against it. It would be obviously in the power of any hon. Member to object to the Motion.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask whether the rule as to Unopposed Business or General Business between 12

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Certainly, Sir.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): As several Bills have been referred to the Standing Committee on Law may I ask when the Committee will sit?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have no official information, but I believe the Committee will sit on Thursday next.

MOTION.

FIRE BRIGADES (EXEMPTION FROM JURY SERVICES) BILL.

On the Motion of Viscount Curzon, Bill to exempt Members of Fire Brigades from service on Juries, ordered to be brought in by Viscount Curzon, Sir Edward Birkbeck, Mr. Dixon-Hartland, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Gully, Mr. Baird, and Sir Albert Rollit.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 284.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

REGISTRATION OF CERTAIN WRITS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[Lords.]—(No. 272.) COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee,)

(2.45.) Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Preamble.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this be the Preamble of the Bill."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to move that the Committee do not agree to the Preamble unless we can have it fully explained by the Lord Advocate. As it is drafted, it is unintelligible and meaningless, and it is impossible to understand it.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is unnecessary to move the rejection of the Preamble. All that is requisite is to say "No" to the Question that the Preamble stand part of the Bill.

The House divided:—Ayes 131; Nces 55.—(Div. List, No. 137.)

Bill reported, without Amendment.

Bill read the third time, and passed, without Amendment.

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 111) COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 2, at the end of the Clause, to add the words,—“Provided that no Guaranteed Land Stock shall be issued by way of advance in any county for the purchase of any holding unless the making of such advance in that county shall have been previously approved by a resolution of the county council elected to represent the county in which the holding is situate, under an Act of this or the next ensuing Session of Parliament.”—(Mr. John Morley.)

Question proposed,

“That the words ‘Provided that no Guaranteed Land Stock shall be issued by way of advance in any county for the purchase of any holding unless the making of such advance in that county shall have been previously approved’ be there added.”

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment,

In line 1, after the word “that,” to insert the words “after the establishment of elected county councils in Ireland.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question again proposed, “That those words be inserted in the proposed Amendment.”

(3.0.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): It appears to me that if this House is sensible of its agrarian or financial obligations to Ireland we should not be troubled with this question of local control. You are not established in that country as the friends of the Irish people. The land system has been a fearful curse to the Irish people and a frightful source of misery and crime. If you are now proposing not to put an end to the system, but to modify it, you do so primarily, not for the good of the Irish people, but to rescue the Irish landlords from an untenable position, and secondly, for the greater ease and tranquillity of the Imperial State. It is only ultimately and incidentally that you contemplate the good of the Irish people. The measure is one of Imperial policy, and therefore the responsibility should be Imperial. I have spoken of financial obligations to Ireland. When I remember that you have invested Ireland with full responsibility for your National Debt and that you have been exacting from her for many years a contribution to the Imperial revenue double what she can afford, I say that, far from taking of the favour you confer on us from your Imperial credit, if you were to make Ireland a present of the £30,000,000 it would go a very little way to rid you of the financial obligation you owe to her. I protest against the language employed by the Chief Secretary last night, when he spoke of Imperial credit as being yours in a sense distinct from ours. It is ours as well as yours and ours much more than yours. Ireland gives one-sixth of her earnings to the Imperial credit, while England only gives one-twelfth. The speech of the Chief Secretary in regard to this matter shows the hypocrisy of the theories of Unionism. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to imagine that he was establishing an equipoise by putting a burden upon the Irish people and the credit upon the English people.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): My statement last night was to the effect that without the aid of Imperial credit the scheme of the Bill could not be carried out, because it would be impossible to work it if it were based upon Irish credit alone.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to establish an equipoise of credit on one side and of burden upon the other. He put one against the other. There could not have been laid down a clearer line of demarkation and division. But I maintain that the credit to be pledged is as much Irish as English, and, therefore, what the right hon. Gentleman offers to the Irish people resolves itself into the old formula of "Heads I win, tails you lose." But if you follow the simple rules of equity and common sense an Imperial Guarantee will be unnecessary. If the price given for the land is merely the value of the tenant's interest, plus that of the landlord, there will be no necessity for the scheme to be backed up by Imperial credit, because there will then be a security approximating to double the value of the advance in the value of the land itself.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member appears to be re-opening a question that was determined last night. The question before the Committee is whether the approval of the County Councils shall be required in each case before the purchase takes place.

MR. SEXTON: Last night the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was allowed to roam over the whole field of public policy.

THE CHAIRMAN: Only in connection with this question. I must repeat that the question now before the Committee is solely as to whether the approval of the County Councils should be required in cases of land purchase.

MR. SEXTON: I will close the matter in one sentence by saying that the personal guarantee would be absolutely sufficient except in the event of a public calamity. The argument is that in case of a deficiency arising in Ireland under the provisions of this Bill, which the Government appear to have arranged for, it is proposed to take the control of the matter from the House of Commons, and to hypothecate money which has been guaranteed to Ireland, and is absolutely her property under statutory contract, for the purpose of meeting it. If that argument is to hold good then at this moment Ireland is entitled to have her own Parliament, because the Act which gave it is older than the one which took it away. To hypothecate such money for such a purpose without the consent of the Irish people is an act of plunder which is only to be accomplished by superior force. If by hypothecating the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund the Local Taxation of Ireland is increased, we should be committing an outrage upon the constitutional rights of the Irish people. In the next place, the security is illusory so far as the British taxpayers are concerned, because the Irish cesspayers would never consent to a levy being made, the proceeds of which are to be applied to purposes over which they have no control. I object in principle to hypothecation of Irish moneys under any circumstances whatever, but if the Irish moneys are to be hypothecated, then the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Morley) would mitigate the hardship of the proposal by directing that the transaction out of which liability might arise should be subject to elective popular control. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) in his speech last night entered into a general criticism of the Liberal programme, but as I regard such a topic to be outside the scope of the present discussion I shall not refer to it for this reason, among others, that the arguments of the hon. Member last night were most conclusively answered by his previous speeches. In my judgment the Irish question is unaltered, and the only change in the political situation that I can perceive is that the point of view of the hon. Member for Cork has altered. The hon. Member for Cork has asked why it is that one of the Representatives of the Irish Party has not moved this Amendment, instead of the right hon. Member for Newcastle. In reply to the question I may say that the hon. Member for Cork has often been glad of the co-operation of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): The right hon. Gentleman has often been glad of my co-operation.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Order, order!

MR. SEXTON: The hon. Member for Cork declares the right hon. Gentleman has often been glad of his co-operation. The right hon. Gentleman would, no doubt, be glad of the co-operation of the hon. Member in any sphere and to any degree in which circumstances would allow the Member for Cork to render useful service. The Irish Members are still glad of the co-operation of the right hon. Gentleman, than whom, in this House, Ireland had never found a more capable and a more zealous friend. If the hon. Member for Cork, who in dark, critical, and trying times was glad to avail himself of the services of the right hon. Gentleman, means to convey to the Committee that those services have not an equal value at the present moment, I must respectfully say that the hon. Member for Cork is not expressing the opinion of the majority of the Irish Members, and of the vast body of the people of Ireland. I cannot help remembering that it was upon almost this day 12 months ago that the hon. Member for Cork moved the rejection of a Bill, in some degree absolutely identical with that now before the Committee. [An hon. MEMBER: It was a better Bill.] Yes, in some respects a better Bill—on the ground that it did not sufficiently provide for local control. Last year local control was everything, and was regarded by the hon. Member for Cork as being an indispensable safeguard, and the one crucial point. Last year without local control in every transaction, to use his own graphic language, was nothing but a swindle. This year the Bill is everything. In the matter of local control the hon. Member has become a Laodicean, and he is content to accept that which last year he denounced as little better than a swindle. The hon. Member spoke last night as though the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Newcastle was about to be carried, and he altogether ignored the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, who opposed the Amendment. The hon. Member contended that the proposal of the right hon. Member for Newcastle would involve delay in carrying into effect any scheme for land purchase; but, in my opinion, it would not involve any delay at all. There is a balance of £1,000,000 under the Ashbourne Acts, and the Chief Secretary has promised to introduce words to make it available. That balance would keep the Commissioners going for another year. The Chief Secretary has also promised that the repayments under the Ashbourne Acts should be available; they now amount to a considerable sum, and the balance and repayments together would probably give £2,000,000 available for land purchase, and sufficient for two years to come, by which time the utmost delay alleged by the right hon. Gentleman would have expired. How, then, can the Amendment lead to delay if County Councils are established this year or next?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Bill does not permit of the repayments under the Ashbourne Acts.

MR. SEXTON: Did not the right hon. Gentleman promise that these repayments should be so applied?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I forget exactly how the matter stands; but I came to the conclusion that the re-lending of the £10,000,000 advanced under the Ashbourne Acts would be a new loan incurred by the Guarantee Fund.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Does the right hon. Gentleman announce that change?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think I announced it last year.

MR. SEXTON: Then I invite the attention of the hon. Member for Cork to the fact that the present Bill is much worse than the measure which he opposed last year. It can be proved by Hansard that last year the right hon. Gentleman was willing to allow repayments to be made available, and now he says they are not to be so applied. The right hon. Gentleman's acquiescence in the application of repayments to fresh advances is to be found a dozen times in Hansard, and afterwards, on a copy of the Bill of last year being handed to him, he read a sub-section of a clause authorising the re-lending of the repayments, provided the aggregate of these additional advances did not exceed for the time being the amount to be repaid on account of the advances authorised.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I told the hon. Gentleman I was not quite sure. I had for the moment forgotten that that provision was in the Bill; but it was pointed out in the course of the Debate that it involved an additional pledging of British credit.

MR. SEXTON: If the hon. Member for Cork wished to prevent delay he could not more usefully apply himself than by reinstating in this Bill that provision of the Bill of last year. That would be better than trying to emasculate the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Newcastle. The Tory Party promised in 1886 to give Local Government to Ireland. That promise has remained unfulfilled ever since. If the Amendment is adopted they will be compelled to carry it out either this year or next. For this reason I think it is deserving of the support of every man who desires the extension of Local Government to Ireland. If the Amendment is rejected the Tory Party will not be eager to give County Government this year or next. For the specific and binding words of the Amendment the hon. Member for Cork wishes to substitute words which are no more than the expression of a pious opinion; and if the hon. Member for Cork succeeds, the Tory Party will be under an irresistible temptation to postpone a measure of Local Government, even if they come into power after the General Election. This view is emphasised by the exposition which has been already given of the probable conduct of County Councils, who, in the belief of the Chief Secretary, would materially embarrass the policy of land purchase. The Tory Party would say they believed that, with the expansion of land purchase, national aspirations would die out. [Colonel SAUNDERSON: Hear, hear! and a laugh.] I regard that cheer of the hon. and gallant Member as showing what is the view of the Tory Party, although that view may be a palpable delusion. The Tory Party believe that the establishment of County Councils would kill land purchase, and that will be the argument of the Chief Secretary before English audiences. Is the hon. Member for Cork willing to put such an argument in the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman? It will not bind him to establish County Councils, but is merely a declaration that a certain thing is to be done after they are established. I do not know whether the hon. Member has realised what the effect of his Amendment would be. Whilst the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Newcastle would cause no interruption, that of the hon. Member for Cork would have an effect which he never intends, and even if the Tory Government came in again it would postpone indefinitely, and for as long a period as the Tory Party might remain in power, the concession of Local Government to Ireland. For these reasons I cannot support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork. Even if the Amendment be defeated it will serve a useful public purpose. It will have a salutary effect on the operation of the Land Act by foreshadowing what is to come, and it will have a useful effect in binding the Liberal Party to a specific policy of rapid development of this phase of Local Government in Ireland, and it will stand on record to guide and direct the House of Commons at no distant date. Though now it may be a barren declaration, hereafter it will be an important help and assistance. Now, the hon. Member for Cork fell into an error of fact when he said this question had been left to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, though I say if it had been left to him it would be left in very competent hands; but let me point out to the hon. Member for Cork that there stands on the Paper for discussion at a future day an Amendment in my name which proposes to deal with this very question in a manner I hope will not be objectionable either to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle or the hon. Member for Cork. That Amendment, it will be seen, is in the following terms as an additional sub-section to the clause:—

"(4.) No Guaranteed Land Stock shall be issued by way of advance for the purchase of any holding, unless the making of such advance shall have been previously approved—

(a.) until elective county councils shall have been established in Ireland by a resolution of the board of guardians of the poor law union in which the holding is situate;

(b.) after elective county councils have been established in Ireland by a resolution of the county council elected to represent the county in which the holding is situate."

The Amendment provides for local control, and provides against any delay in the operation of the Act. I admit that Boards of Guardians are not perfect bodies. I admit that they are very imperfect bodies for the purpose; but in this matter we have merely "Hobson's choice," and the Board of Guardians, I may say, is the only body in rural districts which has an elective element upon it. When the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary complains of Boards of Guardians because five years ago they passed resolutions in reference to the qualifications of a Parliamentary candidate, or expressing approval of the conduct of a public man, criticising matters of public policy or condemning the action of the Executive, if they have gone somewhat beyond their functions in those and other matters let it be remembered that they are the only bodies outside the towns which have any element of popular representation, and when the Chief Secretary attacks Boards of Guardians he forgets that they are composed half of ex officio members, Justices of the Peace, and landlords. ["No, no!"] I think I may say that every Justice of the Peace in a rural district is a landlord or an agent to a landlord. ["No, no!"] There may be a few exceptions, but 99 from every 100 are of that class. Now, if Boards of Guardians do sometimes act in a manner objectionable to the taste of the right hon. Gentleman, is that not due to the neglect of these ex officio members to all matters in connection with their office, and that landlords are indifferent to all local matters except those in connection with rent? I submit that the right hon. Gentleman cannot object to Boards of Guardians in this connection, seeing that fully half of the members of those Boards are landlord representatives, and by the plural vote that class no doubt exercises influence over the election of the remainder. To the hon. Member for Cork I say if the Board of Guardians in any case were to allow a transaction under this Act we should be none the worse, and when they veto a transaction it will be because an unusually excessive price is charged for the holding. Therefore, if the hon. Member for Cork thinks, and I agree with him, that the absence of local control is one of the greatest blots on the Bill, he will no doubt give his support to an Amendment which secures some form of local control in the interim before the establishment of County Councils. County Councils cannot be established in a day, and meanwhile I invite the hon. Member for Cork to agree with me in preventing the delay in the operation of the Act by the use of the only means of local control which the state of Irish life renders available to us at the present moment. I shall oppose the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork and support the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle in its original form, and I respectfully invite both the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Cork to consider this Amendment of mine in a friendly spirit.

(3.37.) COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): The Committee will, I think, not deny me the right to occupy a few minutes, seeing that up to the present only one other Irish landlord has taken part in these discussions, and because the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle strikes at the very existence of the Bill and opens a very large scope of criticism as to the effect it will have on the policy of Her Majesty's Government, which we hope may endure for many years to come and have an influence on the Empire at large. The hon. Member for West Belfast has made one statement of which I must take notice. The hon. Member called the Bill a landlords' Bill, a Bill having an Imperial object, and a Bill to satisfy the wishes of the Irish people. I quite agree with the latter part of the definition, but I utterly deny that this is a landlords' Bill. Stating my opinion as a landlord, I should say that I dislike the Bill. If I were asked to state the effect I believe it will have upon the landlord class in Ireland, I should agree with the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who, to my surprise, the other day took up the cudgels on behalf of that class he is in the habit of cudgelling. I believe this Bill will not have a good effect upon the interests of the class to which I belong. I believe the effect of the Bill will be that the incomes of landlords will be diminished by one-half, and sometimes by two-thirds. As a landlord merely, I should oppose the Bill; but I support it for Imperial reasons and for Irish reasons. The first duty of every Irishman is to assist legislation which will benefit his native land, and as I firmly believe that the Bill under discussion will benefit Ireland, I support it. The Imperial reason which will mainly induce the House to pass the Bill—because it will not be passed out of sheer love for Irish landlords or tenants—is that by its operation it will build up a class who will array themselves on the side of law and order. The hon. Member for West Belfast complains that the Bill will throw a burden on the Irish people; but I have never heard of a people who regarded themselves as burdened by having £30,000,000 placed on their shoulders. If a plébiscite were taken in Ireland, there would not be a single county which would not wish to have the Bill in operation within its borders. A strange attitude is taken up by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Last year an Amendment was moved by the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottingham (Mr. J. E. Ellis), an Amendment which most of the Irish Members on the other side supported, and which was to the effect that so long as coercion existed no Imperial advances should be made to Ireland; but now it seems that hon. Gentlemen are so persuaded that coercion is only a term, that they adopt the policy of Her Majesty's Government—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must address himself to the Amendment and not to the policy of the Bill.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I take the Amendment to be this—the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle—that pending the esta-lishment of County Government in Ireland, this Bill should not be effective. The hon. Member for Cork has informed us that he is in favour of the policy initiated by this Bill, and I conceive, therefore, that the more simple and straightforward course on the part of the hon. Member would have been, instead of putting his emasculating Amendment—as the hon. Member for West Belfast has termed it—to speak and vote directly against the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Newcastle. Now what is the meaning of this Amendment? It is a destructive Amendment, which, if carried, will destroy the Bill. Practically, it postpones land purchase in Ireland to the Greek Kalends, because to decide that the policy of the Bill shall not have effect until County Government is established in Ireland is to indefinitely postpone the Bill—to postpone it indefinitely, absolutely indefinitely. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] I do not understand why the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian cheers that statement, because the Government do not intend the Bill to hang in any way upon Local Government. The Bill is to be judged, and accepted or condemned, upon its own merits. If the Government and the House were to accept the Amendment and carry the Bill with it, I should like to ask what would be the effect if at the next General Election the Unionist Party were defeated and the Separatist Party came into Office? We are told that dealing with the land is one of those subjects upon which all the Nationalists of the Irish Party are agreed, whether they belong to one faction or the other, and therefore if we pass a Home Rule Bill—as may be possible if the House of Commons ever goes mad—the result will be that we shall establish a Parliament in Dublin which, in dealing with the land question as it pleases, may upset the system of Local Government introduced by the Amendment and upset what is supposed to be a guarantee for the British taxpayer, and all previous legislation by this House in reference to land purchase will not be worth one rush. All our guarantees founded on County Government will not then be worth a straw. As to the interest taken by Irish ratepayers in the contingent guarantee afforded by the Irish rates, it is absolutely illusory. In the Irish mind there is not conceived the remotest possibility that that guarantee will ever be touched. The Irish people have proved by the way in which they have paid their instalments under the Ashbourne Acts in the past that there need be no anxiety as to their paying in future, and I believe hon. Members opposite are entirely mistaken if they think they will be able to raise any great opposition to the Bill in Ireland on the ground of this possible contingency. Hon. Gentlemen last year did not say so much about this guarantee; they opposed the Bill at first, but they supported it at last because they found the overwhelming voice of their constituents was in favour of it. If they go back to their constituents again they will find they are opposing a measure to which the Irish people look as conferring the greatest benefit to the country and to all classes—except the landlord class. Let me point out what will happen if we carry this Amendment. It will afford limitless scope to the capacity of Debate displayed by the hon. Member for Elgin (Mr. Keay); he will be able to point to the possible action of the Irish County Councils, and again influence the House by the glamour of his eloquence on financial affairs, showing how absolutely worthless is the guarantee in view of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. The point of importance in considering this Amendment, and upon which hangs the very existence of the Bill, is, what is really the view of the Irish people on the subject. We are legislating for Ireland and the Irish people, and I am sure we all hope that our legislation will conduce to their happiness and prosperity. It is important, therefore, to ascertain what are the opinions of the Irish people on this matter. But who represents the Irish people in this House? Only last year hon. Members above the Gangway opposite turned to the hon. Member for Cork to learn the opinions of the Irish people. Now we are informed by his former colleagues that the hon. Member for Cork represents neither the opinions of the people of Ireland nor even those of his own constituents. Then to whom are we turn? Are we to turn to the hon. Member for West Belfast or to the hon. Member for North Longford? But, as far as I know, those hon. Members represent only themselves.

MR. SEXTON: Our constituents.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: The hon. Member for West Belfast says that he represents his constituents, but he certainly will not do so long. Why, there is no place in Ireland at the present moment where either of those two hon. Members would be able to address a meeting in the open air without police protection. Then we come to the hon. Member for Londonderry, but he represents the Irish priests, not the Irish people. Well, on the whole, I think that I myself speak in the name of the largest part of the Irish people. I represent, at any rate, that part of the Irish people who are in favour of law and order, and I believe those are the majority. And I feel perfectly convinced that there is not a county in Ireland which, if asked its opinion of the Bill, would not give overwhelming decision in its favour.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Go to Sligo or Kilkenny.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: Well, I should have thought the hon. and learned Member had had enough attendance at Irish elections. I think I know the feeling of the Irish people as well as hon. Members opposite, who though they represent Irish constituencies live in London. I know as a fact, and can assert without fear of contradiction from any one who knows anything of the desires and feelings of the Irish people, that no measure has ever been introduced into this House which has received in every part of Ireland, North, South, East, West, more approval than the present Land Purchase Bill.

MR. T. M. HEALY: But what about the Amendment?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I say as I said at the outset of my remarks that I support the Bill against the interest of the particular class to which I belong. A rough definition of statesmanship is the making use of past experience embodying it in useful legislation. Past experience, at any rate during the last 30 or 40 years, has shown us that in dealing with the Irish people and successfully governing them, two attributes are required—firmness and justice—and I believe the policy of the Government, which, I repeat, would be destroyed if the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Newcastle were carried, is teaching the Irish people at the present time that if we are just we can also be generous. This is proved by the reception which the Chief Secretary and other Members of the Government met with when they recently travelled through the country, notwithstanding that they had been described in it by Irish Members as persecutors and exterminators; while, on the other hand, the so-called Nationalists cannot hold an open meeting in Ireland without police protection. That fact leads me to believe that our present efforts will be attended with success in Ireland, and, believing that the Bill will conduce to the welfare of the country, I heartily support it. The hon. Member for West Belfast hit the right nail on the head. I believe he struck the right key-note when he said the effect of the passing of this Bill will be to permanently destroy Home Rule. I believe it will. I believe it will erect in Ireland a great class independent of Irish demagogues and agitators, that it will create in Ireland a class which realises at last who their true friends are, and recognises that the Union with this country has been to Ireland a great blessing, and not a curse. I oppose the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, because I believe it would, if carried, continue in Ireland that political fermentation which is really the foundation and basis of the separatist policy, and I believe the Bill as it stands will be for the good of the Empire at large, that it will bring peace in its train, and that it will hold out the hopes of prosperity to my native country.

(4.2.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): The Committee has now really under consideration three separate Amendments—the Amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley), the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), and the alternative Amendment submitted by the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton.) The Committee is aware, from observations I have made on this subject upon previous occasions, that I agree very much with the object which my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle has in view, but it will be no disappointment to my right hon. Friend when I say that I cannot support the form in which his Amendment is put. It is a misfortune of that Amendment that it lends itself to the suspicion that it is a destructive and a dilatory Amendment, intended to prevent the speedy operation of the Bill. Knowing as I do the opinions which my right hon. Friend has formed on the Bill, as a whole, I confess I do not think I am doing him an injustice when I say I think if his Amendment had a dilatory and destructive effect he would not regret it. In that matter I differ from my right hon. Friend. I believe the Bill to be a good Bill. I accept it most cordially, and, although I should like very much to make it better, still I would infinitely rather have it as it is than not have it at all. Consequently I cannot support the Amendment of my right hon. Friend, although I desire to secure some of the objects he has in view. Then there is the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork. To that exception is taken by the hon. Member for West Belfast, because, he says, it would have the effect of postponing Local Government for Ireland. That seems to me a very extraordinary objection. It is only true, if it be the fact, that Local Government is hostile to land purchase, and it is my point in this matter that the introduction of Local Government into a Land Purchase Bill would strengthen land purchase, and consequently that the Government would have no object whatever in postponing Local Government if they carried the Land Purchase Bill first. But I have a different objection to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork, which I take also to the new Amendment which has been suggested by the hon. Member for West Belfast. What are the objects we may fairly have in view in suggesting the intervention of the Local Authority? There were three objects. In the first place we desire that the Local Authority, or the constituencies which the Local Authority represents, should have given their assent to the pledging of their credit. To mortgage their securities without their consent is, at all events, a very strong piece of legislation. As regards that object, it would undoubtedly be secured, not only by the Amendment of the hon. Member, but also by the Amendment suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland—that there should be a plebiscite taken of the district before the Bill is put in operation to obtain its consent to the pledging of its credit. But there are two other objects which we ought also to keep in view, and which the suggestion of the Chief Secretary does not secure, and therefore I take this opportunity of saying, as the suggestion was kindly made by the Chief Secretary, to some extent in the hope of satisfying the objections I made to the Bill in its present form, that it does not satisfy me, and that consequently, if I am unable to persuade the right hon. Gentleman to go a little further, as far as I am concerned, I do not think the introduction of the proposal by itself would be a sufficient improvement to justify a separate Amendment on the subject. The other objects, however, which I want to keep in view are these: In the first place, I say we want to give an interest in land purchase to every class in Ireland, not, as has been said, to a limited proportion of a limited class, and the advantage of all sections of the community would be secured by the intervention of the Local Authority under circumstances which would give to the Local Authority a large interest in the successful administration of the scheme. Further than that we must all feel there is a possibility, although we all hope a distant one, that at some future time, when schemes of land purchase have been largely developed, there may once more be an agitation which would be directed, not against the payment of rent, but against the payment of the instalments, and the best security against such an agitation would undoubtedly be the existence of a healthy public opinion in favour of the honest fulfilment of obligations. What we have to regret in Ireland at the present time is that there is so large an amount of public opinion which justifies the non-fulfilment of obligations. How can we create the public opinion we desire to see in Ireland better than by introducing the locality, through the Local Authority, into the administration of the Act? What I have always thought would be a possibility, and what I have always desired to impress upon the Chief Secretary is a plan of this kind, that the Local Authority should not merely have the right of vetoing or of consenting to the application of its credit, but that after the transaction had taken place, and after the land had been agreed to be bought and sold, the Local Authority should stand in the position of landlord for 49 years until the tenant became the absolute freeholder; that during that period the Local Authority should collect the rent, that it should pay over to the Central Authority the amount due for instalments and interest, and that the whole of the remainder, which would be a very considerable sum, should be for its own use—that is to say, for the advantage of the constituency whose affairs it represented and administered. If that were the case—and I will deal with the objections directly—if you could secure a state of things of that kind, consider how it would necessarily affect public opinion. In that case you would have a Local Authority which, in the course of a short time, would have all the instincts, and perhaps some of the prejudices, of a landlord, and you would have this Local Authority acting on behalf of the whole community with a distinct interest that rent should be fairly and fully paid, knowing that every deficiency in the payment of rent on the part of any tenant would be followed at once by a deficiency in the sum it had to apply to public purposes. What is the objection to it? The objection is one that does apply to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork and the hon. Member for West Belfast. The Chief Secretary says two things, as I understand him. He says, in the first place, that there would be a possibility, if you gave this power to the Local Authority, that, acting under the influence of some class of agitators, they would prevent altogether the adoption of the measure which Parliament is now passing. Well, as to that point I really think a moment's reflection will show that any such action on the part of the Local Authority is absolutely impossible. What have we just heard from the hon. and gallant Member opposite, and what have we heard from hon. Members on this side of the House? More than that, what do the actions of hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House prove but that every class in Ireland is prepared to accept the benefits of the Bill, and will look askance at any one who interposes.

to prevent it? I say what proof have you? Why, just look at the action during the past few days in Committee of such Members as the Member for Longford and of West Belfast in a less degree. The discussions of the past few days has shown perfectly clearly to hon. Members with any intelligence that these hon. Members and some of their friends hate this Bill, and would like to destroy it. ["No."] "No" says one. What did the hon. Member for West Belfast say in the course of his most interesting speech this afternoon? He said that the action of the Tory Party in this Bill was to rescue Irish landlords, and to pour millions into their pockets.

MR. SEXTON: So it is.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Well, if that were the object of the Bill, do you not suppose the hon. Member for West Belfast would oppose it? And am I not justified in saying that the Bill which he describes in these terms is a Bill which, if he could, he would destroy? But what is his position and the position of his friends? The position of hon. Members is this: that they are "willing to wound, but afraid to strike," and they dare not oppose the Bill because they know public opinion in Ireland is strongly in its favour.

MR. SEXTON: What I say is this, that though no doubt the main object of the Tory Party may be to rescue the landlords, the effectuation of that object by the Tory Party does not limit the effect of the Bill. There may be other effects which I value.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I submit gladly to his statement, but when he speaks again I trust he will balance these various effects and give the Committee his conclusion on the whole subject. One effect of the Bill says the hon. Member is to rescue Irish landlords. What I ask are the effects of the Bill on the other side, which the hon. Member sets against it, and the conclusion he arrives at on the whole subject? What I say in the meantime is that the action of the hon. Member and his friends during the last few days has been directed to delay the Bill—I will not say to obstruct it though I think I might say so; and if he does not go farther it is only because the vast majority of his constituents are of a different opinion. If that is the case I say there is absolutely no fear that under any circumstance it will be in the power of the Local Authorities to prevent the Bill coming into operation, and to interpose between their constituents and the benefits the Bill proposes to confer. But there is another objection taken by the Chief Secretary which I think is a more serious one. He said that it would be possible for the Local Authorities to act unfairly and unjustly under the influence of personal or political motives—and from past experience we have no reason to suppose that such a possibility might not arise. Well, that is perfectly true, and that would be the objection to the Amendments of the Members for Belfast and Cork, because, as I understand it, they propose that every separate transaction should come before the Local Authority to be discussed and to be approved by them. I quite admit that would leave room for intrigue and political prejudice, and that it might be open to the most serious objection. But that is not my proposal, and I do not think the suggestion I have made is open to a similar objection. I have suggested that after the Bill has come into operation, whether by the Resolution of the Local Authority or by plébiscite as proposed by the Chief Secretary, then the separate transaction should go, as proposed in the Bill, to the Land Commission—that is, the tenant and landlord, having agreed as to the terms, should go to the Land Commission, who would complete the transaction; and it is only after the Land Commission, who would be an impartial body not open to the objection which I have referred, has decided that the matter would come back to the County Council or other Local Authority, which would then be placed in the position of temporary landlord for 49 years, collect rents and so on. I say, then, that while I admit that there might be serious objection to allowing such Local Authorities as are seen in Ireland, or, indeed, any such Local Authority as it is possible we can hope to create for a considerable time to come, to deal with matters of such deep personal issues as the question of Land Purchase, I think it might be possible to leave to them the first origination of the Act—the decision as to whether or not it shall be applied to a particular district—and the administration of it after the Act of Purchase has been completed. I am not very sanguine that I shall be able to persuade the Chief Secretary to accept any such suggestion as that, because it would involve more than a single Amendment in the Bill. Probably it would involve one or two new clauses in the Bill to carry it out effectually. All I have to say in sitting down is that I have explained why I cannot support the Amendment of the Member for Newcastle, although I desire some of the objects he has in view. If they can be accomplished, I believe the Bill will be improved, that the security of the taxpayer will be increased, that the chances of peace in Ireland will be improved, and that a better feeling will be created between landlord and tenant, because if the tenants of the Local Authority paid regularly, it would have a very considerable effect in inducing the tenants who had not purchased to pay regularly also. While I believe in all these good effects, still I am grateful for the Bill as it stands; and if the Chief Secretary does not see his way to make the alterations suggested, I can only hope that experience may show that the right hon. Gentleman has judged the situation more correctly than I myself have.

(4.22.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I rise for the purpose of asking a question of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary as to a matter of fact raised by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. I warned the Chief Secretary last night that his plébiscite proposal was one of the considerations that would still affect the minds of Members in voting for or against my Amendment. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham gave reasons why he could not support my Amendment, though he is aware of the object in moving it, and, on the whole, agrees with it. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham gave amongst other reasons that the Chief Secretary was about to bring before the House a plebiscitary proposal, but I submit to the right hon. Gentleman that the right hon. Member for West Birmingham has entirely misunderstood the proposal of the Chief Secretary. His interpretation of the plébiscite is quite different from that of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. He imagines it to mean that the vote "aye" or "no" will be taken as to whether or not the Act is to be applied. That is not the case. The inception of the operation of the Act is not in the view of the Chief Secretary to depend on a vote. That is not the question submitted to the ratepayers by plébiscite. According to the proposal of the Bill the Act is to come into operation without any assent from the ratepayers. Then the advances are to be made up to the total amount of 25 times the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund, and then when that is exceeded, £8,000,000 in all, the county constituencies will be consulted as to whether they will sanction any further advance. I will ask the Chief Secretary whether my interpretation is right or that of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) rose, but there were loud calls for the Chief Secretary.

(4.26.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should have preferred to wait until I had heard observations from other parts of the Committee on the subject. The hon. Member for Cork expressed a hope that before the Debate closed I should make a statement as to my intentions as to the proposal for a plébiscite. As the Committee knows, the action of the Government will largely depend upon declarations from various parts of the House. So far I have not heard any distinct demand from below the Gangway.

MR. SEXTON: We do not know anything about it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Nothing in support of it fell from hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. PARNELL: I said I thought it was an element of local control, though deficient.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg the hon. Members pardon. He did give a qualified support to the proposal. A qualified opinion has been advanced, but nothing more. The hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Sanderson), who spoke on the general question just now did not say anything to make me believe that he and his friends in the North of Ireland looked on the proposal with favour, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, if he rightly understood it, would not receive it formally. My proposal never went the length of giving immediate power to the localities to reject the Bill. I did no more than suggest that at a certain stage the locality should be given the opportunity of saying that no further hypothecation of its funds should be allowed. Therefore I am not specially encouraged to make any proposal on paper with regard to a matter which I only threw out as a method of compromising the differences that seem to be in the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite. I say that to explain the attitude of the Government on the question. As I am on my legs I may say one word as to the proposal of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. On that part of it which I dealt with last night I will not add a word to what I then said. Let me make this one remark which is to express my entire concurrence with the right hon. Gentleman in one matter. If we had funds at our disposal to enable us to give a large bonus to the localities to collect the rents and to interest them, in some substantial form, in the payment of the annuities, I should rejoice as much as the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. I entirely agree with his desires on this matter. The only reason why the Government have not adopted that plan is that we have been forced to the conclusion that we have not money to do it with. We could not give the Local Authorities 5s. per cent. without taking money from the tenants, and we thought that to do that would be to interfere with the proper working of the Act. It was not because we differ from the general principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman, but because we could not propose a scheme which would give all the necessary benefits to the tenants, and at the same time confer these benefits on the Local Authorities, that we had to content ourselves with what I admit to be the less satisfactory proposals of the Bill before the House. But on the subject on which I am specially called on to give an opinion, I hope I have adequately explained what is the nature of the suggestion I have thrown out, and what are the views of Her Majesty's Government upon it.

(4.32.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I wish to point out to the Committee that there are now being discussed no fewer than four distinct propositions, each of them involving the principle of local control under the operation of the Bill. There is first of all the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, and, secondly, that of the Member for Cork; thirdly, we have the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast; and, finally, there is that hazy proposal in reference to a plébiscite which has been informally advanced from Members sitting on benches in different quarters of the House. I will deal first of all with the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. What does the right hon. Gentleman propose to do? The first thing he proposes is to arrest land purchase in Ireland. ["No, no."] I say that there can be no dispute on this point. The hon. Member for West Belfast has tried to prove that this is not so, and that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork is not necessary, the reason he advanced for this contention being that there was still a residue of something like £1,000,000 under the Ashbourne Acts, which would be sufficient to carry the Government on until County Councils could be established in Ireland. It is easy to say there is a residue of £1,000,000 under the Ashbourne Acts, but I want to know how much of it has already been applied for? Not less than £9,000,000 out of the £10,000,000 have been sanctioned up to the present time, as I understood from the Chief Secretary, but if that be so the balance of the whole £1,000,000 may have been applied for already so that there may not be a £1 sterling to carry on operations with during the interval between now and the establishment of County Councils. According to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, we are not to have Land Purchase until County Government comes into operation. He and other hon. Members on this side of the House blame the Government for delaying passing a County Councils Bill. Yes, but it should be remembered that more Governments than one are responsible for that delay; ever since I can remember the question of the reform of the Grand Jury Laws in Ireland has been a practical political question, and one Government after another has given that political and burning question the go by. I do not think, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle is justified in simply charging the present Government with delaying County Government in Ireland. The charge is one that applies to every Government in England during the last 25 years. My contention is that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle by his Amendment proposes to hang up the whole operation of the Land Purchase Department and prevent another sale taking place until it is sanctioned by the Local Bodies to be set up under the intended County Government Act. If I take the interpretation put upon the Motion by the hon. Member for West Belfast, the Amendment is one intended to enforce and compel Local Government, and to hang up Land Purchase until that is obtained. Supposing the County Government Bill were passed, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle hinted last night, Irish Members on the other side of the House are opposed to granting Local Government in Ireland. For my part I am not hostile to that proposition, on the contrary I am anxious to see it. I shall support and vote for it when the time comes, but at the present moment, because I am disposed to give to Ireland the same measure in principle as has been conceded to England and Scotland, I am not fool enough to imagine that even after we get Local Government in Ireland, we are going to have the millenium. What is the proposal before the Committee? Before you set up County Boards, and know what kind of Boards they are to be, and the work that will devolve upon them, you are prepared to submit to those bodies a question involving an appeal to every passion and prejudice and selfish interest on the part of the whole body of the farmers of Ireland. We used to hear a great deal in by-gone days of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian having committed a great constitutional question to an entirely new electorate; but if you pass this proposal, you will be committing to an unknown body in Ireland, without any experience of what it has to do, one of the greatest risks which any Government could possibly allow. What would happen amounts to this: that a landlord and tenant may agree for the sale and purchase of the holding, they may be perfectly satisfied as to the terms of the transaction, and consider them fair and reasonable. The Land Commission may have investigated the whole of the circumstances and be satisfied as to the security being ample, and yet, after all this has been brought about, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle proposes to bring each individual transaction before the County Council, which will be fiercely political and selfishly agrarian, case by case, farm by farm, leaving those men subjected, as I have said, to political passions and prejudices the right of vetoing every sale and of absolutely arresting the entire process of land purchase in Ireland. In other words, he proposes to give one party to the bargain, namely, the farmers of Ireland, who will themselves be the purchasers, the absolute right in their position as County Councillors of themselves fixing the price and the managing of the sale. I say that I cannot assent to anything of the kind, and I hope Her Majesty's Government will stand firm in resisting any such proposal. It may be, and probably will be, said that this objection would come more appropriately from the other side of the House. All I can say is that ever since this question of local control was mooted in Parliament—and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham consulted me about it a few months ago—I have taken pains to inform myself in Ireland as to what is the existing state of opinion on the subject in Ulster. I have spoken to the farmers on their own farms, and ascertained their views. Indeed, we have lately had a sort of Ulster land demonstration here in the Lobby of this House when a deputation of Ulster farmers came up upon this question. I say that those farmers are willing to pay a fair price for their land, and that they do not look upon this measure as a landlords' Bill. To call it a landlords' Bill is all very well for an English platform, before those who know no better, but the Irish tenant farmers do know better; they consider this Bill to be the greatest boon ever offered to the Irish tenants by the Imperial Parliament, and they are willing to accept the boon, paying a fair price for the land. I speak on this in the name of the Protestant tenants of Ulster, whose representatives I saw in the Lobby. My hon. Friend immediately below me saw them, hon. Members below the Gangway saw them, the Chief Secretary for Ireland saw them, and not one of those practical agriculturalists, not mere citizens of Belfast, but farmers working on their own land every day of their lives, are unanimously opposed to this County Council arrangement being allowed to come between them and their bargains as to the purchase of their holdings and retarding progress. I have authority for saying that the Gladstonian candidate for North Antrim at the last election is as anxious as any man living that this Bill should be passed, and is giving it as loyal and hearty support as any man in the North of Ireland. With regard to what has been said as to a plébiscite, so far as I understand it, the principle it is proposed to adopt is this: that before this Bill comes into operation, a vote something similar to what takes place under the Borough Funds Act is to be obtained as to whether the funds of the county shall be mortgaged for the purposes proposed, the county being in this way consulted as to whether its funds shall be so used or not. This is not open to the same objection as the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. It does not bring every case into the County Council. There are hon. Members of this House who are also members of English County Councils. What, I ask, would they think of having the sale of every holding in England brought before them? I oppose this Amendment because my constituents oppose it. I have consulted them, and they have given me their directions on the subject. Let us take the case of a county where the majority of the voters are not farmers but labourers. These men are not ratepayers, or rather they do not pay the main portion of the rates as the farmers do. I put it to the Committee what would be likely to happen if this plébiscite were dependent upon such a body? What is likely to be the result if a question regarding the Contingent Fund were submitted to the labourers, whose interests are not only not the same as those of the farmers, but frequently are diametrically hostile to the farmers' interests? They might regard land purchase as not being in their interests, and might consequently put the management of the whole business into the hands of men who would act in direct opposition to the wishes of those who are desirous of this boon and who are responsible for the payment of the rates. I do not say that this would be so, but I say that it is a possible case. Now, apart from all this, what is to be said of the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle? If he were here, I should say much more willingly what I am going to say now, that he is too much accustomed to assume the rôle of Jeremiah. As regards the Irish question, he is eternally on the lament. He wishes the Irish Local Authority to come between the English Government and the Irish farmer, as a kind of buffer. He fears a period of distress, and he conveniently ignores the Insurance Fund which provides against it. He walks past it as if it were not in the Bill. Then he fears what will take place in the time of tumult. I prefer to go by the experience we have had rather than look forward to those evils. The right hon. Gentleman need not be so much afraid. The British taxpayer will know how to recover his money just as well as the Irish landlord, and I do not believe the British taxpayer is in the slightest danger. I believe the money will be honestly and cheerfully paid. The Irish farmers know perfectly well what a boon they are getting, and they are not going to throw it away in any reckless scheme of repudiation. I think the Imperial taxpayer, and especially the British taxpayer, is morally bound to pledge his credit for this purpose. He tore out by the roots the Irish land system, and he planted the English system of tenure with the disastrous results which followed; he planted the Irish landlords where they are, and, therefore, I think the British taxpayer, if he recognises his moral obligation, ought to come to the rescue. But in the case of a general settlement like this, and in face of the general desire to let bygones be bygones, and have this interminable land question disposed of, it is not too much that the Irish taxpayer should be willing also to do his small share of the work—a share which involves no risk to him. I hope the Chief Secretary will resist this proposal, which would hinder the practical working of the Bill.

*(4.50.) Mr. MAHONY (Meath, N.): I find myself for once in agreement with the hon. Member for South Tyrone, in his concluding observations, wherein he pointed out that the present position of the land question is due to the British taxpayer. If he has any influence with the Government I would ask him to use it in inducing the Chief Secretary to omit from the guarantees at any rate the most irritating of them—some of those called the contingent guarantees. The hon. Member says that the Irish taxpayer should take his share because this is a final settlement. I do not think it is.

*Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: I said a general settlement.

*Mr. MAHONY: Well, a general settlement. It is not a general settlement, because it is only going to settle a portion of the question. It was significant last night that the Chief Secretary should say that it was out of the range of practical politics for any Government to propose to advance British money without having Irish security for it. If that is the case we have the Chief Secretary and his supporters to thank for it, because of the speeches they made in their anxiety to oppose the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) in 1886. I ask—What are you going to do when this £30,000,000 is exhausted and you have no further Irish securities to fall back upon? That is a very strong argument in favour of dropping some of these securities, and relying, at any rate to some extent, on what ought to be the real security, the value of the land sold and purchased. Then if, as I hope, this land purchase scheme works well, and you have to come to Parliament again for a further advance, you will still have some Irish securities to fall back upon, and you will find the Irish people very ready to give these securities. As regards the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast says it will bind the present Government to bring forward within a definite period a Local Government Bill for Ireland. I think it is exceedingly unlikely that the present Government will ever bring in a Bill which the hon. Member for West Belfast would care to accept, but if he supports this Amendment, he would be to a certain extent bound to support a Local Government scheme he did not like, in order that land purchase might go on. I believe that the Irish people desire land purchase, and I do not see my way to voting for any Amendment which would endanger the continuance of that system of land purchase in Ireland. We are told that the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell) would practically do away with the whole value of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. I cannot agree with that; I do not think any Amendment you could pass in this House would bind the Government more than they are already bound in honour, by their declarations, to bring in a Local Government Bill. If they break through their obligations, their opponents will know very well how to take advantage of their breach of faith. If the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Belfast were passed, it would in spirit do all that the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Cork proposes to do. It would prevent delay in putting this Act into operation, because there were no County Councils in existence, and that is all that the hon. Member for Cork wants to do. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is anxious that the Local Authorities should have some power of giving or withholding their consent to the use of their securities; but he also wishes that they should derive some direct benefit from the operations of this Act in return for pledging their securities. That appears reasonable upon the face of it, but you cannot get out of this—that if you give to Local Bodies in Ireland a considerable portion of the annuities which are to be paid year by year by the tenants—you must either increase the amount to be paid by the tenants or diminish the amount to be received by the landlords—I would suggest to the Chief Secretary that it is possible to give the Local Bodies some sort of interest in the working of this Bill by continuing some small payment from the purchasers to the Local Bodies after the 49 years have expired. Several hon. Members have objected to giving Local Bodies control over every transaction, on the ground that Local Elective Bodies are not bodies particularly fitted to deal with the exceedingly delicate matters involved in bargains of the kind contemplated, and I admit there is very great force in the objection. In fact, those who ask that Local Bodies in Ireland should have power to consider each individual transaction, ask that these Local Bodies should have more power given to them in return for their security than the Imperial Parliament has ever required, it should have in return for the security it has given in the past. The Imperial Parliament has had another security and a very important one; it has had security in the fact that it has had under its control the body charged with the examination of the security for the advances under the Act—namely, the Land Commission. No one would propose to set up a number of bodies for the administration of the Act under the control of the Local Bodies. The control of the administration of the Act must remain under the Land Commission, but I want to suggest to the Chief Secretary a compromise, which I think he might very fairly accept. As I understand his proposal it is that by a plébiscite localities should have the power of saying whether the Act is to operate in their localities or not, but that they shall only have that power after the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund is exhausted. The concession I ask the right hon. Gentleman to make is to alter that so as to make it immediately applicable. The cash portion of the Guarantee Fund belongs to the localities just as much as the contingent portion. Whether there is any default in payment or not it is proposed to take away £40,000 of the Contingent Fund for a period of years, and the right hon. Gentleman proposes to do that at a time when local taxation is pressing very heavily on the people. In Kerry, my own county, I have to pay at the present moment in county cess alone about 5s. in the £1, and in poor rate close on 3s. in the £1. And yet, whether there is any repudiation or not, the right hon. Gentleman proposes to take away £40,000 a year. That is his idea of generosity towards the Irish people. I ask him to re-consider that scheme for locking up this £40,000.

Another proposition I make is that the right hon. Gentleman should, in the first instance, allow the people of the locality to decide by plébiscite whether they would pledge the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund, and then if they decide to pledge that which guarantees about £8,000,000, then after the sum has been expended, they should be asked whether they would pledge the contingent securities. The advantage of that would be that when the £8,000,000 were exhausted the localities would be in a position to judge whether the Act had been fairly administered or not. If it had been fairly administered, they would have no difficulty in deciding by a fresh plébiscite to pledge their other securities. The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh said land purchase is so popular that there is not a single county in Ireland where the people would not decide to pledge their securities. Hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House have asserted that they also are in favour of land purchase. Under such circumstances, I do not see why the right hon. Gentleman should hesitate to give the people the control I suggest.

*(5.10.) MR. PINKERTON (Galway): The hon. Member (Mr. Mahony) is much surprised to find himself in accord with the hon. Member for South Tyrone. I am not surprised at that, seeing that the hon. Members are supporters of the present Government. In fact, I myself am very strongly in sympathy with the major portion of the remarks which fell from the hon. Member for South Tyrone. The hon. Member alluded to the deputation from the North of Ireland which waited upon the Government upon this question. I met that deputation, and I can assure the Committee that while that deputation was intensely in favour of land purchase, it was very strongly opposed to all guarantees. Every member of the deputation, with one exception, was a practical farmer, and every practical farmer in Ireland knows that there is no necessity whatever for any guarantee. It is proposed to pledge both the tenants' interest and the landlords' interest for the repayment of the money, but everyone who has spoken to-day has advanced a fresh theory. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham has suggested that some bonus should be given to the Local Authority for collecting the rents, but the hon. Member for South Tyrone has gone far beyond that, for he practically says the guarantee scheme is humbug, and there is no necessity for it. I am anxious that land purchase should be carried, but carried upon lines which will confer benefit to the tenant, and not seriously injure the landlord. I do not for a moment advocate a system of landlord robbery in Ireland. I believe it is possible to benefit the landlord and also to benefit the tenant at the same time; but, so far as delay is concerned, I hold that you may pass county government and Home Rule before purchase is carried out. I hold in my hand a statement with regard to an estate in the North of Ireland, where an agreement was signed by landlord and tenant four years ago, and the bargain is not yet completed. An Inspector was sent down from the land purchase authorities to inspect the holdings, and the objections put forward were of such a character as to indefinitely postpone the settlement on that particular estate. I am particularly interested in the matter, as I am a tenant upon the estate. It was cast in my teeth that I had signed an agreement to purchase years ago, and had opposed land purchase. If land purchase is to be carried out on the principle suggested, I am prepared to oppose it, because it is only a palpable attempt on the part of the authorities to fill the mouths of the tenants with an empty spoon. The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh said that, as an Irish landlord, he is opposed to land purchase; but, as an Imperialist, he is prepared to risk British credit to promote land purchase. I hold that this measure is framed so as to benefit the landlords in the South of Ireland, where rents are not regularly paid.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! So far the hon. Gentleman has not said anything about the Amendment.

MR. PINKERTON: I admit I am out of order; but I am only following the hon. and gallant Gentleman.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must remember that the hon. and gallant Member was rebuked.

MR. PINKERTON: As a farmer I object to be taxed in order to guarantee the repayment of the annual instalments of, it may be, an improvident neighbour. If I accept responsibility for a neighbour I ought to have a voice in the making of the bargain. It is a fact that men who have no intention to pay are the men who rush in and express a readiness to give 25 and 30 years' purchase. The men of Ulster are men who are prepared to pay 20s. in the £1, and they are most anxious that bargains are made on such a basis that no repudiation will be necessary. The purchase scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton was opposed in the North of Ireland because of the baronial guarantee. Seventeen years was the average number of years' purchase last year. Tenant right in Ulster is selling for 20, 24, and sometimes 25 years' purchase. Can any man imagine that the Government would allow tenants to run 16 or 17 years in arrear even if they were foolish enough to wish to do so? In the tenant right alone the Government have ample guarantee, so anxious are the people for land purchase that in spite of all its shortcomings nine-tenths of them will support this scheme; but is the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh prepared to put his sincerity to the test by offering his tenants an opportunity of purchasing? It is all very well to talk of general principles—
Mr. Pinkerton

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. PINKERTON: I am most anxious the measure should be passed, but I am strongly of opinion that it should be passed in no half-hearted fashion; I appeal to the Government to pass the measure in such a way that it will put an end, as far as possible, to the agrarian difficulty which has disturbed Ireland in the past.

(5.22.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The hon. Member for Galway has said a great deal with which I thoroughly agree, but I must say it was a case of very valuable matter in the wrong place. We have already discussed the question of guarantee. All Irish Members are agreed in preferring that the guarantee should come from the Consolidated Fund or from money voted by Parliament, rather than from local resources. We have a strong argument in the enormous taxation we pay. But that is not the question at issue. If the Front Opposition Bench accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork the issue will be a very simple one; it will be that when County Councils are created, they shall have the right of vetoing any purchase. There is a great deal to be said on both sides of the question. There is a great deal to be said for the view of the right hon. Gentleman of West Birmingham. He did not like a general veto. The only objection to that is that perhaps there would be too much red tapeism. On the other hand, it would provide complete local supervision over all sales. Supposing the Amendment suggested by the hon. Member for Cork is not adopted by the Front Opposition Bench, in what position shall we be placed? We shall hang up the Bill for an indefinite time. Fifteen years ago I proposed the establishment of County Boards. County Boards are not yet created, and I am afraid we may have to meet many years before we see them in Ireland. Are we to hang up this purchase scheme until County Boards are set up? Why do my constituents and farmers and small tenants in the West of Ireland generally desire most to be proprietors of the land or to have County Councils to manage their affairs? I unhesitatingly say they prefer to be proprietors of their farms and to take the chance of County Boards.

(5.26.) MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I rise to support the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. I think that Amendment would give the Government an opportunity of redeeming their character; it would compel them to fulfil their promise to bring in a Local Government scheme for Ireland. They won the last General Election with a promise to set up a Local Government system in Ireland; but from that day to this they have made no effort to redeem their pledge. A very interesting observation was made by the Chief Secretary for Ireland last night. Replying to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle the Chief Secretary said—

"This machinery of land purchase is a costly one; it cannot be made cheap, and the whole expense of this machinery is borne, not by the localities in Ireland, not by the ratepayers whose cause hon. Members opposite plead, but by the British ratepayer for the purpose of settling a question which, moreover, directly affects only a small corner of the United Kingdom."

As an Irishman I would be the last person in the world to object to the mulcting of the British taxpayer, and for the reason that I know if a debtor and creditor account were prepared, Ireland would be enormously on the creditors side. The right hon. Gentleman knows that the last General Election was won upon the promise of Her Majesty's Government to redeem their pledge of bringing in a Local Government Bill for Ireland. They also undertook that they would not relieve the Irish landlords at the expense of the British taxpayer, and yet now they are bringing in a Land Bill unchecked and uncontrolled; and if this Amendment be not adopted, the British taxpayer will incur very heavy liability. I should like to direct the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to some observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham—observations to which surely he ought to attach much importance. That right hon. Gentleman said, and said truly, that he had always supposed that the establishment of Elective County Authorities in England and Scotland would be associated with a similar measure for Ireland. I should like to know how the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham can at all reconcile that announcement of his with the vote he is now going to give. I do not desire to trouble the House with any lengthened observations; but before I sit down I should like to remark upon the regret with which I, in common with many other Members, notice the absence from these Debates of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington. I have not the honour of the noble Lord's personal acquaintance, but still we all regret his absence, because we know that in the course of these conversations he would have played the part of a candid friend of the Government; and when he found Her Majesty's Ministers obstructing the proposal to join Local Government with land purchase, he would have said a good deal in condemnation of their conduct. I have often thought that Hansard's Debates form very interesting reading to those who are in the know, and I never was more pleased with the reading than when I commenced the perusal of some of the noble Lord's own observations in reference to his pledge made when he was leader of the House on the question of Local Government for Ireland. I say that you are simply obstructing Irish Local Government in the interests of Irish landlords. I say, also, that the plan of the Government in giving £30,000,000 for land purchase in Ireland is simply a cover for a proposal to divide that sum of money among their own supporters. They know very well that if the operation of the Bill were made dependent upon the adoption of Local Government for Ireland popular veto would prevent the distribution of the money in the channels they desire, and would make it utterly impossible to do as was done with the sum of £1,000,000 provided under the Ashbourne Acts and distributed amongst five supporters of the Government, one of whom was a brother of a Cabinet Minister. Now, I have before me a speech made by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington three years ago, on the 5th April, 1888, in which he said that he adhered in their integrity to the pledges he made at the time he was leader of the House of Commons, in favour of a large and liberal measure of Local Government being granted to Ireland. In one of the speeches he delivered about the same time, the noble Lord remarked that in 1886 the Chief Secretary for Ireland had opposed a measure of Local Government brought forward from the Irish Benches on the ground that Ireland was in a disturbed state and unfit for it. The noble Lord added—

"But whether Ireland be disturbed or not, it is a fundamental principle of our policy that Local Government should be granted."

In conclusion, I can only say that the Government obstruction of this Amendment is really a sacrifice of principle in the interests of the landlords. The Government never intended that the money to be advanced under the Act should go to the tenants, but always have treated it as a largesse for the landlords and their friends.

(5.40.) MR. T. M. HEALY: No doubt the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork has good ground for complaining of the action of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. I should have imagined that the Amendment moved by the hon.

Mr. Mac Neill

Member for Cork to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle was exactly in the view of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, because it would have committed the Government to the expression of nothing but a pious opinion in favour of a general abstract principle of Local Government, and it would still have left at large the question of its final consummation. Yet, for some extraordinary reason which the right hon. Gentleman did not explain in his speech he has left the House in the dark as to whether the hon. Member for Cork will have his support in the Lobby. I rather take it that he will not, because if the hon. Member for Cork, with his corporal's guard of six Members, are found to be the only supporters of the Amendment, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham would cut a remarkable figure as sergeant of the guard. The hon. Member for South Tyrone has declared that there was no value in recalling the pledges given in favour of Local self-Government, because every Government for the last 25 years has been steeped up to the chin in Local Government pledges, and it really was no matter whatever at the present time whether they combined to fulfil those pledges. It is true that every Government for the past 25 years has promised Local Government to Ireland, but no Government except the present Government has passed Local Government schemes for England and Scotland, and has got into Office on a declaration of simultaneity and similarity for the three Kingdoms; and, therefore, we have as against the present Government objections and arguments which cannot be urged with equal force against any Government which has sat at any time upon the Ministerial Benches since the Act of Union was passed. I say, therefore, that as against the present Government we have a peculiar grievance, and that the argument of the hon. Member for South Tyrone will not hold water. I was also much surprised that the Chief Secretary for Ireland did not secure more gratitude from the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. Even the hon. Member for Cork was more complimentary to him. It may be that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was more adroit than the hon. Member for Cork, but I think he might have been a little more effusive in his thanks to the right hon. Gentleman opposite. Nobody has greater admiration for the abilities of the Chief Secretary than I have. In the case of this present Bill, he has managed to load it with every principle objectionable to Irishmen so as to make it difficult for us to accept it, and, at the same time, to give the Tory Party every species of temptation to support him. My hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast dealt very properly with one branch of the Chief Secretary's devices when he said that by pledging local control in Ireland the right hon. Gentleman was setting up additional arguments against the establishment of County Boards. In my judgment, the Chief Secretary gratified both branches of Tory sentiment; Home Rule is staved off by the Imperial guarantee, and Local self-Government by the local guarantee. I have been waiting to hear some explanation of the new enthusiasm of the hon. Member for Cork and his Colleagues for this measure. It cannot be denied that this Bill is a less boon to Ireland than the Ashbourne Act. We know it has been the great boast of the hon. Member for Cork that it was he who in 1885 induced the Government to bring in that Act. That was immediately before the Home Rule Bill was brought in. Three years later the fund out of which the Act was worked required replenishing, and so in 1888, when another £5,000,000 was required for the purposes of that Act, I find that the hon. Members for Cork, Galway, and Meath, who now declare that it is undesirable to postpone this Bill in order even to have a pledge of Local Government, voted en bloc against the proposal to grant the additional sum. What are we to think of gentlemen of this sort? We have heard of the fox who has lost his tail, but we who are not in that predicament stand exactly as we stood in 1888. This new enthusiasm wants explanation. Even in 1890, on the 21st of April, the hon. Member for Cork moved the rejection of the Chief Secretary's Bill of last year; he opposed the Bill, not on a single ground, but firstly, secondly, thirdly, fourthly, fifthly, just like one of those "souping Protestant parsons" he is so fond of denouncing.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I rise to order. I ask, Sir, what right has the hon. Member to call any Protestant minister a souping parson?

MR. T. M. HEALY: The hon. Member for South Tyrone does not see my point. It is a quotation from the hon. Member for Cork himself, and I quoted it for the purpose of denouncing the insult.

*MR. MAHONY: In the absence of the hon. Member for Cork, may I take the liberty of saying that the hon. Member for Longford has misquoted him?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I think it would be convenient if the hon. Member for Longford would approach the Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Imitation is not unnatural. I shall be able, if permitted to do so, to verify this interesting quotation which gives such offence both to the Liberal Unionists above the Gangway and to the Tory Unionists below it. Last night the hon. Member for Cork delivered a very strong speech in favour of this Bill, unfettered by any pledge of Local Government for Ireland, but he opposed the Bill of last year on the grounds of the absence of consent of the locality to the security, and of local control over the application of the money. His words on the 21st April were: "My next objection to the measure is that it exhausts our local credit without our consent." Surely that objection has just as much force to-day as it had in 1890. The hon. Member for Cork also said that the Bill, in the absence of local control, "was a parody on land purchase and a swindle on the British taxpayer." He objected first that the Bill was not an honest Bill; secondly, that it afforded no solution of the question; and, thirdly, that it would lead to further agitation. I declare that the explanation which the hon. Member has attempted to give of his change of attitude this year is "a parody on Parliamentary Debate and a swindle on the Irish public." He admitted in principle his anxiety to give some amount of local control; he put the infant idea before the House, but no one seemed to like the look of the child presented for sponsorship. The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh said it was no child of his; the hon. Member for South Tyrone would not be godfather, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham refused his blessing, and the only person to whom he could look for sympathy and comfort was the hon. Member for Cork—"faithful among the faithless only he." But, for my part, I would thank the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to give us some fuller explanation of his scheme than we have yet had. He may have confined it to the hon. Member for North Armagh; he may have told it in secret to the hon. Member for South Tyrone, to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, or the hon. Member for Cork. But we who are outside the charmed circle of Government confidence are at least entitled to be told what is to be this system of a plébiscite he proposes to invent. We have had in former times some schemes containing remarkable proposals. We had the Drainage Bills, in which it was proposed to expend a million or two and to call for some local contribution. That local contribution would have amounted—I speak offhand and subject to correction—to a few hundred thousand pounds; but the Chief Secretary felt so strongly the necessity of some local opinion upon the expenditure that he invented a species of local representation. Are we not entitled to have to-night, before we proceed further in regard to this clause, some statement of whether he refuses such representation to the people of Ireland with regard to the advance of £30,000,000 and with regard to the hypothecation of all local resources, and, furthermore, the taking away from the localities the grants for education, medicine, pauper lunatics, and a number of other local purposes? Are we not entitled to be told why that which was granted in those drainage questions is to be refused in this far more important matter? It may be that the Chief Secretary does not altogether believe in the sincerity of the support of the Member for Cork—perhaps he has been reading some of the speeches of the hon. Member upon land nationalisation. I do not know whether he has perused these remarkable addresses; but if he has, that would be sufficient ground, perhaps, for the Chief Secretary taking up an attitude of doubt as to the amount of real and effective support that will be given to him by that hon. Gentleman and his supporters, for so recently as the 14th of March last he told the people of Dublin he had always believed in the principle of the nationalisation of land. That being so, it seems to me very remarkable that on an occasion of this kind, when the Government are only asked to insert a proposal to the effect that the Irish people should have over local affairs and local taxation some amount of control, that the gentleman who believes in the nationalisation of land, which involves the giving of local control over this entire land system apart altogether from the question of purchase, should refuse to vote in favour of local control disconnected with nationalisation, and connected only with peasant proprietorship. On these grounds we are entitled, having regard to the present action of the hon. Member for Cork, to vote down his Amendment. I do not believe in the sincerity of his Amendment, I do not believe in it from a gentleman who spoke six weeks ago in favour of land nationalisation. [An hon. MEMBER: Oh! Leinster Hall]—who spoke 12 months ago against this Bill, and three years ago voted against the advance of £3,000,000 under the Ashbourne Act. For my part I am inclined to doubt the sincerity of the Amendment, which, I believe, is put down for the purpose as it were of drawing a red herring across the trail without any effective intention, and accordingly I shall cordially give my support to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle.

(6.7.) MR. PARNELL: I wish to make some reply to one or two remarks which fell from the hon. Member for West Belfast, and which were taken up and repeated, with the acrimony to which we have become accustomed from him, by the hon. Member for Longford. These hon. Gentlemen have called attention to the vote which I gave in 1887 against a grant of £5,000,000 and the vote I gave in 1890 against the Second Reading of a similar Bill to this, and to my action upon the present occasion and this year, in the preceding stages of this Bill, and they have asked me what has happened in the interval to make me change my action in reference to this Bill. I have to say to both these hon. Gentlemen that they should first have asked their own leader, the hon. Member for Londonderry, why he has changed his action also before they address that question to me. And they should have first asked themselves why they have changed their action. Those two hon. Members and their present leader, the hon. Member for Londonderry, also voted in my company, and under my protection, against the grant in 1887, and against the Second Reading of the Bill in 1890. Did the hon. Member for Longford vote against the Bill in 1891? And if he did not have the courage of his convictions of 1887 and 1890—if they were convictions—what has happened in the interval to change the convictions and the mind of the hon. Member for Longford?—

MR. T. M. HEALY: Your misconduct.

MR. PARNELL: And the mind of his leader? And why is it to-day that, instead of having the courage of 1887 and 1890 to openly oppose this Bill, he joins in a combination of the Liberal and Radical Members below the Gangway and above the Gangway, to do that by stealth and by disguised methods which the hon. Member and his leader have not the courage to do openly, and which they know perfectly well their constituents would not allow them to do. I have done with those hon. Gentlemen and their consistency, and I await knowledge of the reasons for their change. Now, let me say to the House why I supported, and was not afraid to support, the Second Reading of this Bill. I did not sneak out of the House to avoid expressing any opinion—aye or no—on the vote for the Second Reading; I did not run away from the Second Reading like the hon. Member for Longford; I voted for the Second Reading because I believe that the Irish tenant farmers want this Bill to pass. They have viewed with disfavour, and will continue to view with disfavour, your attempts to obstruct it. I believe, further, that the method which has been devised by the Chief Secretary of counter-guarantees, although it is glaringly and grossly unfair to us, has satisfied the scruples of the English taxpayer. I do not believe there is any reality in the opposition of the Liberal

Members below the Gangway, or that their constituents care two straws whether the Bill passes or not. So much for my reasons for voting for the Second Reading. Let me go on to say, regarding the present Amendment, that the hon. Member for West Belfast has misrepresented the substance and the effect of the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Newcastle. The hon. Member stated in defence of his conduct in voting for an Amendment which, if carried, will destroy this Bill, and which he knows well will destroy it, that the Amendment, if carried, would pledge the House and the Government to introduce Local Government for Ireland in this or in the next Session. The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman does nothing of the kind. The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, so far from compelling or pledging the House or the Government to propose or carry a Local Government measure for Ireland this Session or next Session, would effect this—that if, owing to any circumstances, it is impossible to pass a complicated measure like a Local Government for Ireland Bill in this or in the next Session of Parliament, and if the House failed in this or in the next Session to carry such a measure of Local Government for Ireland, this Bill would be absolutely destroyed, and never could be brought into operation. So that under the guise of voting for an Amendment to secure local control, some of the Irish Members—and let it be known to their constituents—are voting, in an underhand way, it is true, but nevertheless in an equally effective way, for the destruction of the principle of this measure, and—unless an impossibility can be brought to pass, unless a Local Government Bill for Ireland be passed this or next Session—to prevent this Bill, enabling the reduction of rents of one in every three of the tenants of Ireland by from 30 to 40 per cent. being passed, keeping it inoperative for all time. I do not know whether the Committee will accept the Amendment I have proposed or not, I am tolerably certain they will not. The Amendment which I have proposed will probably have very small support, but it was designed to make the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Newcastle carry out what it pretends to carry out and does not, and what its supporters among the Irish Members have suggested and urged that it does carry out. If they choose to take the responsibility of voting it down, as announced by the hon. Member for Longford, they can do so. It has been said by the hon. Member for West Belfast that I am fighting a shadow in arguing against the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman. If I am doing this, then is not the hon. Member for West Belfast supporting a shadow in supporting that Amendment? It appears to me that if one statement is true the other is true. If I am wrestling with a shadow he is supporting a shadow—

MR. SEXTON: If the hon. Member will allow me to explain, it is, in my opinion, idle to argue against this Amendment as if it were about to be adopted; but, on the other hand, as I said earlier, it is useful to vote for the Amendment, though it may be defeated, because it will place on record a declaration binding the Liberal Party. It may thus be of future use to the people of Ireland.

MR. PARNELL: In the history of Parliaments no more original excuse has ever been heard for voting for a pernicious Amendment. The hon. Member votes for it because he knows it will be defeated! I should have said that it would have been better not to support the right hon. Member for Newcastle in wasting the time of the Committee in arguing for an Amendment which the hon. Member knows is bound to be defeated, and which he would not vote for if he knew it was going to be carried. If the hon. Member votes for the Amendment, then he will vote for an Amendment which would be destructive of the Bill. He is taking a course not calculated to facilitate the progress of this Bill or to advance the wishes of the great majority of the tenant farmers in Ireland. Our time would have been much more profitably occupied if, instead of discussing this inoperative Amendment, we had gone on to the Amendment which stands in the name of the hon. Member for West Belfast—a similar Amendment to mine, and against which every argument the hon. Member has advanced against my Amendment can be used with more crushing force.

(6.20.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I do not know how far the hon. Member for Cork represents Ireland, but he takes very much upon himself when he speaks for the English constituencies. The hon. Member has told the Committee that our constituents do not care whether this Bill is passed or not. If the hon. Member had known anything of what took place at the General Election in England he would be aware that Home Rule was lost because a Land Purchase Bill was brought in by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. It is to that Bill that the Conservative Party owe their seats, and to the fact that they protested against it. We have always been opposed to land purchase, and we shall continue to be opposed to it to the end. But I did not rise to take notice of the observations of the hon. Member, but to say that we shall vote for the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. The Bill is a bad Bill, but it will be made slightly better by the adoption of the Amendment. But I wish it to be clearly understood, and I think I am not speaking for myself alone, but for many Members on this side of the House, that in voting for the Amendment we in no kind of way pledge ourselves to any land purchase scheme for Ireland with an Imperial guarantee, whether approved or disapproved by the ratepayers of Ireland. I do not want to detain the House from a Division for a moment longer. I only want to make our position clear that neither directly or indirectly do we support an Imperial guarantee for land purchase.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I asked a question with reference to the reason of the change of view in 1888, 1890, and the present year. The hon. Member for Cork has not answered that question. I would like to hear him on the point.

(6.22.) MR. PARNELL: I merely wish to say in reference to my Amendment that it has been pointed out to me by the hon. Member for West Belfast that my Amendment may interfere with that of the hon. Member if it is negatived and not withdrawn. I think many Members will agree that both the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Newcastle and my own might be withdrawn, and then the Committee might proceed to divide on the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Belfast, which practically seeks to carry out and does carry out the principle which the right hon. Gentleman has argued for in his Amendment, but which goes a great deal further.

(6.23.) MR. SEXTON: I take the liberty to point out that my Amendment ought to satisfy both the hon. Member for Cork and the right hon. Member for Newcastle, because it provides for local control and no interruption in the proceedings of purchase. I certainly have a preference for my own Amendment, but it is a matter entirely for the discretion of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. PARNELL: Under the circumstances I ask leave of the Committee, and withdraw my Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: I may point out that, on the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman being put last night, the first words only were submitted to the Committee, involving the principle of local control, leaving out the specific way in which that control is to be exercised. If those first words are negatived, the proposed Amendment of the hon. Member for West Belfast, as well as the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork, will also be negatived. Is it your pleasure the Amendment to the Amendment be withdrawn? [Cries of "No."]

Question, "That the proposed words be there inserted in the proposed Amendment," put, and negatived.

MR. SEXTON: In view of your ruling, Sir, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle whether in view of the fact that my Amendment provides for a continuing control pending the passing of a Local Government Act, he proposes to take a Division on his Amendment, or will he consent to take a Division upon mine?

(6.25.) MR. J. MORLEY: In answering the question I may remind the Committee that last year I placed on the Paper an Amendment to the Land Bill making the assent of the Board of Guardians a condition of the operation of the Act. In substance, therefore, I am perfectly willing to assent to the hon. Member's view. While the hon. Member was speaking I felt that there would be no difficulty on my part in allowing the hon. Member's Amendment, to which in substance I have no objection, and which coincides with my view last year, to be accepted. My object would, therefore, be served by accepting the Amendment of the hon. Member instead of my own, and I am willing to withdraw my Amendment in favour of that of the hon. Member.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it your pleasure the Amendment be withdrawn. [Cries of "No."]

Question put,

"That the words 'Provided that no Guaranteed Land Stock shall be issued by way of advance in any county for the purchase of any holdings unless the making of such advance in that county shall have been previously proved' be there added."

(6.30.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 170; Noes 247.—(Div. List, No. 138.)

The next Amendment on the Paper was in the name of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) as follows:—

Clause 1, page 2, line 2, at end, add "In the construction of the Land Purchase Acts for the purposes of this scheme, 'landlord' shall include a mortgagee with power of sale."

The purchase in the name of the Land Commission of a sum of Guaranteed Land Stock, equal in nominal amount to a purchase annuity, shall be a good discharge of such annuity.

Immediately after the passing of this Act the Land Commission shall ascertain as to each county what estates are for sale in the Chancery Division, the tenants upon which are willing to purchase their holdings under this Act, and the Land Commission shall within the limits prescribed by this Act purchase the same for resale to the tenants, and the Guaranteed Land Stock provided by this section shall be applied to such purchases in the first instance.

Where, under the provisions of the Land Purchase Acts, the Land Commission purchase land from the Land Judges of the High Court of Justice in Ireland (Chancery Division), the purchase-money may be paid by the issue to the Accountant General of the said Court of a sum of Guaranteed Land Stock equal in nominal amount to the purchase-money."

THE CHAIRMAN: This Amendment really contains three Amendments, none of them appropriate to this clause. The first is relative to the Interpretation Clause, the second to the 2nd clause, and the third ought to be brought up in the form of a New Clause altogether.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, at end of Clause, to add the words, "Half-yearly returns, ending on the thirtieth day of April and thirty-first day of October respectively, shall be presented to Parliament by the Land Commission, giving the following particulars respecting cases of default in the payment of any purchase annuity:—Name of purchaser; province, county, and townland in which the holding is situate; date of purchase; area (in statute acres) of holding; tenement value of holding; rental of holding when purchased, and whether judicial or non-judicial; amount of purchase-money; amount of instalments paid; amount of instalments in default; proceedings taken for recovery."—(Mr. J. R. Ellis.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no objection to urge to this Amendment.

(6.45.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): The Amendment is defective, so far as I can see, in many particulars. It does not give that which would be the most valuable information—that is to say, the name of the landlord whose land has been sold under the Act. I, therefore, move as an Amendment to insert, after "Name of purchaser," in line 5 of the Amendment, the words "Name of vendor." I think it can hardly be denied that this information would be most desirable, for we know it may be difficult in cases of default to find out the particular landlord who has sold his land, for he may withhold his name through modesty or some other cause. I am sure that no vendor who effects a sale to his tenants fairly will object to allowing his name to be known.

(6.46.) Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to insert after the words "Name of purchaser," the words "Name of vendor."—(Mr. Knox.)

Question proposed "That those words be there inserted."

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I hope the Government will raise no objection to this Amendment.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

(6.47.) MR. M. HEALY (Cork): I would suggest that particulars should be given showing how far the guarantee deposit has been called upon to supply the default in the payment of the annuity; whether or not any attempt has been made to sell the holding, and whether or not such attempt has been successful—

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

FISHERY BOARD (SCOTLAND) BILL [LORDS].—(No. 259.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(6.49.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): May I ask what course the Government propose to take with regard to this Bill?

(6.49.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I will tell the right hon. Gentleman the course we propose to take with reference to this Bill and the Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Bill. We have considered this matter with the single desire of carrying out those matters which are generally agreed upon. I do not think it would serve any good purpose to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. The result, I am afraid, would be to lose time, and the matters upon which there is agreement are sufficiently numerous, I think, to enable us to satisfy general opinion in favour of reform of the Fishery Board, and in regard to the alteration of the law as to mussel beds.

(6.50.) MR. MARJORIBANKS: In regard to this Bill, we cannot accept the Second Reading without discussion, and I would ask the Government to give us a day for the purpose of discussion. I shall always object to having the Bill passed sub silentio.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday next.

TRUSTS AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND)
BILL.—(No. 209.)

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 66)
COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(6.54.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to move that Progress be reported.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): On that Motion I would point out the position in which we stand. In consequence of the opposition of the hon. Member for North Camberwell and some other hon. Members, the Irish Members find it absolutely impossible to pass any Bills through the House, even those which the Government do not oppose. I warn the hon. Member opposite that the Irish Members will in future allow no non-contentious measures promoted by private Conservative Members to pass.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I would point out that in this matter the Irish Members themselves have set a very bad example by the frequent objections which they have made.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camberborne): Both sides of the House ought to act on the principle of give and take.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): No measure brought forward by an Irish Member has been allowed to pass either this or last year.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ADMINISTRATION OF THE POST OFFICE.

*(9.3.) EARL COMPTON (York, W. R., Barnsley): I do not think I need offer any apology for having brought my Motion before the House asking for a Select Committee to inquire into the administration of the Post Office Department. I have made my Motion as broad as possible in its terms, for I am anxious that the proposed Committee of Inquiry should embrace all the subjects connected with the Post Office, not only the internal working of Post Office machinery itself, but also the relations of the Post Office to the general public, and also in regard to all postal reforms which are necessary. I am anxious that postal reform should be inquired into, and also the whole of the machinery of the Post Office, as—having given this matter some consideration in the past 15 months—I am of opinion that this machinery requires over-hauling and setting in order. It was impossible for me to state in a Notice of Motion every one of the details which require attention; it was impossible for me to define, for when I began to define I found that a definition would limit the scope of the inquiry I believe to be absolutely necessary. As regards the extension of benefits to the general public as a question of postal reform, this may, perhaps, be considered a Treasury question; and as I see the Financial Secretary to the Treasury in his place, and not the Postmaster General, I shall direct the first part of my remarks to that point which I think affects the Treasury principally. I hope the Financial Secretary to the Treasury will allow me to say I am one of those who think that perhaps the Treasury may have too great control over the Post Office. I believe that the Post Office, and the chief intention of the Post Office, is to serve the public. But the chief interest of the Treasury is to provide a good Budget, to look after the Revenue much more than the efficiency or good order of the Post Office. Other Members, I am aware, intend to speak on the subject of postal reforms. I had intended to bring forward in my Motion the question of "Boy Messengers" and the relations between the "Boy Messengers Company" and the Post Office; but I am glad to say—very glad to say—that that matter has been already settled. I cannot, however, help expressing the suspicion in my mind that perhaps the fact of my Motion having been on the Notice Paper for a month may have facilitated the arrangements that have been arrived at by the Postmaster General with the "Boy Messengers Company." I do not think anyone can doubt the fact that the Revenue has reaped advantage from each successive reform which has taken place in our Postal Service. Still there remains much to be done. This, I think, will be acknowledged, for instance, that the postal communication with the West Coast of Scotland and to the North of Ireland, decidedly requires improvement, and I am in hope that Members who come from that part of Ireland, and who are at the moment distinctly friendly to the present Government, will support a Motion for more direct communication by the Larne and Stranraer line, which has been a burning question for some time, and is not yet, I believe, settled. Then, also, there is the question of postal reforms as they affect the Savings Bank Department, already alluded to during the Session, and which requires, at all events, inquiry to see what can be done. Many of us believe that the Post Office Savings Bank might be extended with great advantage to the public, more especially to the working classes who use the bank for their savings. I believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not share that view, and is rather friendly to private banks as against the Post Office Bank. Still, I think this is a matter that might fairly come within the scope of the inquiry I am now asking for. I do not think it is at all necessary to refer to the large extension of the postcard system, and the further facilities asked for, or to mention the question of postal facilities for communication with the colonies, which interests a large number of those who reside not only in England, but in every part of the British Empire. But I think it is necessary I should state at once that it is the general opinion—it may be a wrong opinion, but it is generally entertained that there is some hindrance in the way of extending postal facilities—I do not know whether at the Treasury or at the Post Office. If a lever is wanted to effect a movement in the direction required, then this inquiry I recommend will supply that lever. If it is an idea of economy which prevents many extensions the public desire, I believe it is a false idea of economy, because experience has shown that every extra facility has led to an increase of Post Office revenue. But even if it did not increase the Revenue I certainly lay it down as a principle that the huge surplus we get under the Post Office accounts might be used to give additional facilities to all who reside within the British dominions. The increase of revenue has been most remarkable. During the last 15 years I believe the increase of net revenue has been something like £1,500,000 in the Post Office Department alone, excluding the telegraph and other branches. I believe the increase of telegraphic net receipts has been something like £600,000 per annum in the same period. In all these matters I feel that I, perhaps, shall have the sympathy of the Postmaster General for it seems to me he is more or less "under the thumb" of the Treasury. The Treasury seems to keep a tight hold of the Post Office Department, and in some respects it seems to me the Treasury has prevented the Postmaster General from carrying out what he at all events would like to have done. I am aware the Treasury has laid down what seem to be rather stringent rules as regards applications from the various branches of the Department; as, for example, when the claims of one class of postmen were considered the Lords of the Treasury officially declared that further claims of other classes of postmen could not be entertained. A rather sweeping declaration without limit of time or circumstances. However, there are other hon. Members who will address themselves to this part of the question, and I will at once proceed to suggest those points in the organisation and administration into which I think inquiry is necessary. The Post Office Department has practically, like a growing boy, out-grown its clothes. I admit that many new suits have been ordered, but they have been so long in the making that the clothes never fit. I have no intention of making a personal attack upon the Postmaster General. He has been very much attacked in the public Press throughout the country, and has been nicknamed the San Sebastian of the Tory Government. I have no intention of making a personal attack, but I think it is only right that when I bring forward this Motion that I should state truthfully what has really occurred when the Postmaster General has granted privileges and advantages to those employed in the postal service. Where such have been granted they have not been granted, unfortunately, with that ungrudging graciousness of manner that might have been expected, and therefore he has not received such thanks from the recipients as otherwise he would have received. I also wish at once to say that I do not intend to make any attack on the officials of the Post Office. They are not here to answer for themselves, and it would be wrong for me to do so. I look on the Postmaster General as the Member of the Government responsible for all that goes on in the Post Office, and therefore I shall be careful to avoid as far as possible allusions to the officials of the Department. I may say at the same time that I have not had brought to my notice any complaint as regards particular officials the complaints principally are against the system not against individuals. We have had this Session what has been termed a "labour" Session. We have had the question of the employment of railway servants discussed on the appointment of a Royal Commission; we have had Government contracts discussed, and we have had a Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the relations of capital and labour, from which, I am sorry to say, the Post Office has been excluded by Her Majesty's Government. Let me add, that I should far prefer to have a Royal Commission for the inquiry contemplated in my Motion, rather than a Select Committee, but as a Commission was refused when I asked whether this question was to be submitted, I felt that it would be absurd for me to move for a Commission, and so I move that the inquiry shall be by Select Committee. We are about to have inquiry into the status and condition of the servants of many private employers and public bodies, and I do not, therefore, think I can be very far wrong in asking for inquiry into the status and condition of servants of the State. Is such an inquiry required? will be asked by many who have not investigated the conditions of service in the Post Office. I have no doubt the principal argument against my Motion will be that no such inquiry is necessary, but the matter had better be left to the management of the Postmaster General and his Department, and that inquiry will be out of place. But we have, and this the Postmaster General will admit, a large amount of discontent, not limited to a few persons, but permeating the whole service. [Mr. RAIKES expressed dissent]. I am sorry to find the right hon. Gentleman is not well informed on this point—that does permeate to my knowledge the whole service, every branch and every section, not only in London, but throughout the whole of the United Kingdom. I wish the right hon. Gentleman had received half the evidence I have received since I put my notice on the Paper. If he had, it would have opened his eyes to the fact that this discontent undoubtedly exists, not the personal discontent of individuals, but a discontent throughout certain branches of the service as to what are regarded as most serious grievances. But surely the Postmaster General will admit that he has received a very large number of Petitions? Not that he has received all the Petitions that have been sent to him, for in some cases they have been refused and not put before him, but he must be aware that a large number of Petitions have been drawn up asking for certain remedies. I am aware that a Departmental Committee is sitting at this moment inquiring into one point, and there may be others, but these are absolutely useless for the purposes for which I ask inquiry. A Departmental Committee may be all very well to gain information, but the right hon. Gentleman must be well aware that under present conditions he will never get before a Departmental Committee such information as he would from an independent inquiry. He must be aware that at the present moment a large number of men, not junior men but senior men, would not come forward and give evidence not liking to render themselves liable to be marked as discontented and perhaps, as has occurred in some cases, marked for future punishment in case of trivial offences. There is friction, there is irritation within the

Earl Compton

Post Office Department, and the general public know this as well as possible, even if the Postmaster General does not. A good deal of growling is going on, and it seems to me the statesmanlike way of dealing with this is to inquire what is the cause, and obtain information by the appointment of an independent Committee. Now, I go at once to the internal working of the Post Office. Who is it or what is it that works the Post Office? There is a Department within the Department—the Secretary's Department, and there is a very able man at the head of it. I have not the slightest doubt that every man in that Department is doing everything to carry out the wishes of the Postmaster General and working for the public interest; but I have been informed—and I believe this is the kernel of the question—that everything that is connected with the various branches of the Post Office has, first of all, to go through the Secretary's Department before it reaches the Postmaster General. If any branch Department wishes to approach the Postmaster General, its communication must filter through the Secretary's Department, and I am sorry to say that one complaint is that a good many of the communications proceeding from the heads of other Departments stick half-way and do not reach the eyes of the Postmaster General. I am not blaming individuals; but I do say that that the Postmaster General ought to be in communication with the heads of the various Departments, and it ought to be out of the power of a few officials in one Department to stop that communication. I take, for example, the forwarding of Petitions. I will not go into all the examples, I take one. The Association of the London Sorting Department, representing some 2,500 men, held a meeting and drew up resolutions, which they begged the chief officer to forward to the Postmaster General. This was refused because it is non-official to forward resolutions to the Postmaster General, whereupon they drew up a memorial, and in that memorial asked for an inquiry into the Medical Department—a very harmless request, I should think; but that memorial was refused to be forwarded, because, as was stated, it must first of all be proved that an inquiry into the Medical Department was necessary before such an inquiry was asked for. Now it seems to me that in such a case it is desirable that such a Petition should reach the responsible head of the Department. I daresay the gentleman who stopped it acted in pursuance of regulations, but upon this point of difficulty of access between the Postmaster General and the various branches I think inquiry is desirable. And now I come to a Department about which the public have heard a good deal lately, the Savings' Bank Department, and here at once we enter on a question that requires investigation, and a good deal more at the hands of the House of Commons. I mean the question of overtime. I asked the Postmaster General a question on the subject some time ago, and gave certain details which he acknowledged to be correct. It is a fact that the 531 members of the staff in 1890 worked overtime to the extent of 268,000 hours, which is equivalent to the work of a staff of 129 men all the year round. Now the Savings Bank Department has an excessive amount of work to do for, say, three months in the year, when overtime is said to be a matter of necessity; but take the other nine months and we find the staff worked 90,000 hours overtime, equivalent to the ordinary work of a staff of 65 men. I am told these figures are substantially correct. In 1890 the overtime amounted in some cases to four hours a day. I am told that the day's work in some circumstances was from 13 to 16 hours, that the sorting staff averaged 12 hours a day, that one boy worked 16 hours in one day, and another an average of 12½ hours a day during a whole month. When I brought these facts to the attention of the Postmaster General, he said he thought the work was excessive, and he would, therefore, make additional appointments to the junior staff; but it is not a question of these things having gone on for a year, they have been going on for years. What was the recommendation in the Report of the Ridley Commission? That steps should be taken to reduce the hours of employment for the clerical staff to seven, not 13 or 14 hours, but seven; and the Commissioners go on to say that apart from the question of health of the clerks employed for 11 hours a day, they were less capable of giving good work than if they were employed for more reasonable hours. Sir Arthur Blackwood, in his evidence before the Commission, said that the overtime in the Savings Bank was imperative for six weeks in the year—I say for three months—and that temporary clerks could not do the work. The Postmaster General, he said, discouraged overtime. When the Postmaster General was questioned on February 5th, he replied that overtime was not limited by regulations, but the requirements of the Public Service must be provided for. But the requirements of the public service can be provided for by an additional permanent staff, and so this necessity for overtime work can be got rid of. Owing to this practice of overtime, disturbances have occurred in the Savings Bank Department from time to time, and such occurred last year and in the beginning of this year. Why? Because an order was issued by the Postmaster General that the clerks should work two hours overtime daily until further notice, and that any disobedience to this order would be treated as an act of insubordination. During two Sessions I have asked the Postmaster General, time after time, whether the overtime work in the Post Office was voluntary or compulsory, and the right hon. Gentleman assured me over and over again that it was voluntary. I am glad to give him another opportunity of explaining the meaning of the simple English word voluntary, in the face of such an order as this. I can imagine it might be more economical for a pressure to employ temporary or overtime work; but when I find that for the number of hours overtime, the cost is, for overtime work, 1s. 1d. per hour, and that the ordinary pay is 8d. per hour it becomes an expensive matter over some 8,000 hours. The clerks in the Savings Bank Department number 520, but I find in the Estimates they are set down as 552. Where does the extra salary go to? Does it go to the temporary clerks, or where? Then I come to the Telegraph boy messengers. They are about 15 or 16 years of age, and the day-staff work 10 hours a day—seven hours was the time laid down by the Ridley Commission—but nine-tenths of them work 10 hours a day. The night staff of boys work on alternate nights from 8 to 8, and from 6 to 10 or 11 o'clock, and they have to stand from 10 to 4, why, I do not know? There is a case of a boy of 14 being compelled, for a trifling offence, to work two hour's overtime after having worked 10 hours, and he had to walk five miles to his home afterwards. These boys—I daresay it was very imprudent on their part—petitioned for extra pay; but though this was nine months ago they have had no answer yet. I do not know whether the Petition reached the Postmaster General. I doubt it very much. Then I turn to another branch of the Service, the mail cart drivers. I do not know whether the Postmaster General is aware that the mail cart service is contracted for by Messrs. Macnamara & Co. (Limited). The drivers work from 4 o'clock a.m. to 8 o'clock p.m., and their wages begin at 24s. a week. Now, we have laid down this Session what our contracts ought to be. Of course this is an old contract—I understand that—still we know it is possible to put on pressure by threats that the contract will not be renewed—and I believe this contract ends this year—unless the contractors pay their servants decent wages and do not overwork them. Then I come to the postmen. We are told that there is no systematic overtime except in the Savings Bank Department, but the postmen have a grievance in connection with what is called “split” duty, which extends over 14 hours or 16 hours. Though this service is divided over intervals during the time, yet they are away from home for the period I mention, for it is too expensive for them to return home during the intervals of duty. It would cost each man on an average 2s. 6d. a week to travel backwards and forwards twice a day. I believe the Postmaster General, in 1888, admitted that this “split” attendance should not extend over 12 hours daily, but three-fourths of the postmen still continue to perform duties during 14 or 16 hours a day. Then, again, the auxiliary postmen work from 5 to 9.30 or 10 o'clock, and are paid at the rate of 4d. an hour, overtime work being paid sometimes at 3d. an hour. Then the telegraph staff, numbering 3,461 in London, have been doing excessive work since 1887, doing three and five hours a day overtime. I mention these details to show that overtime is a system, and is not confined to the Savings Bank Department. The Comptroller, in an answer given last January with regard to holidays, confessed there was an excessive amount of overtime. Let me say at once that these men who are working in the Post Office are ready and willing to volunteer to do a certain amount of overtime; but when you have a system all the year round of what is called “voluntary overtime,” which is really compulsory overtime, that by degrees breaks down the willingness of the men, and in some cases they have refused to do it. Then there is the whole system of temporary labour, paid at from 18s. to 20s. a week, a system which must be bad both for the men and the Department. There is auxiliary labour in the newspaper department, both inland and foreign; there is a temporary mail staff and what is called the “permanent temporary staff,” the meaning of which, perhaps, the Postmaster General will explain to the House, and there are also season substitutes. Then I come to the question of the female staff. I have been informed by several Members that there has been a statement in the Press that I am going to attack female labour. I have never had the smallest intention of doing so. On the contrary, I am one of those who have always advocated the employment of female labour; and I believe that no man in this House goes further than, or as far as, I do with regard to the rights of women to compete with men in all employments. I have not found that there is any hostility among the Post Office employés to the female staff; but, at the same time, when there is decided over-work for the men, and decided over-work for the women, and when the male staff see large additions being made to the female staff and none to their own, there is perhaps a little discontent, and that may have given rise to the false reports that have appeared in the Press. There has been a good deal of overtime work going on in the female staff. In two divisions, in which about 190 persons are employed, of whom one-third are females, they worked something like 27,000 hours overtime last year. I believe there is one section which worked in three months something like 3,600 hours overtime. In another, where four-fifths of the staff of about 100 are females, something like 22,000 hours overtime were worked last year. There are also many complaints from the ladies who are employed in the news Department. There has been a most erratic system of promotion with regard to the female branch, and they will be glad if their case can be included in the inquiry. With regard to female temporary clerks, when a lady in the Department marries, the order is that she has to leave, but her new name and address are taken, and when temporary work is required she is taken back again temporarily. There are cases of ladies who have been receiving 35s. a week before being married, and who have gone back to do temporary work at 20s. a week. It is impossible for me to mention every case in every branch which in my opinion deserves some consideration at the hands of the House of Commons. I cannot deal with the question of the provincial Establishments, but I am glad to say that the seconder of the Motion will do so. Let me pass now to the question of the reasonableness of the request for an inquiry of some kind. We have already had a Commission, known as the Ridley Commission, to inquire into the question, but it has been impossible for it to go into the whole working of the Post Office. I wish, however, that their recommendations had been carried out. I am told that there is no precedent for a Select Committee inquiring into such a question. To that my first answer is that there is no precedent for such general discontent in a State Department as at present exists in the Post Office: it is an exceptional case which demands exceptional treatment. In the Egyptian affair, when the Commissariat broke down, a Select Committee was appointed by the House of Commons to inquire into the matter, which is a proof that when something has gone wrong in a Department a Select Committee inquires into the matter. That something has gone wrong with regard to the Post Office was, I think, proved the other day, when we had before us a Savings Bank Bill, and a clause was put in it to extend the time for preparing the Savings Bank Returns, in order, I believe, to get the Postmaster General out of a difficulty with regard to the Savings Banks Department. That, however, is not a way in which things ought to be done. On April 20, 1888, the Postmaster General said that he did not approve of boys working overtime, and that arrangements were being made for its discontinuance. It seems to me that the whole organisation and administration are carried on in rather a makeshift fashion. There are, under the present system, extraordinary inequalities of condition, treatment, and position amongst the various branches of the Department. Until that system is inquired into and changed there will, I believe, always be discontent. In the face of that discontent the policy of the Post Office has always been a policy of suppression. I acknowledge that the Postmaster General has done much for those who are serving under him, and I believe he would have done much more if he had not been so fettered by the Treasury. At the same time I think it only right to point out that this policy of suppression has been followed, and that it is a very dangerous policy. The Department has acted in a spirit of hostility to the combinations of its servants; their right of meeting has been suppressed, even when they undertook to notify the time and place of meeting, and admit the official reporter; and they have been told that their meetings would be treated as acts of insubordination. In my opinion the hours of labour are excessive. I believe that overtime is the rule, and not the exception. Promotion is slow, and the temporary employment system does harm to those who are employed under it, and also to the permanent staff. The work is of a harassing nature, and is rapidly increasing in amount, while the permanent staff has not increased proportionately with the labour. I therefore ask that this question shall be inquired into by the House of Commons. I appeal to the Postmaster General to allow an inquiry to be held in order that the great State Department, of which he is the head, may be made thoroughly efficient, and put into good order. I also appeal to the Government who have this Session intervened in questions between employer and employed, and have said that excessive overtime ought not to be allowed, to sanction an inquiry. If these appeals are refused, I appeal to hon.

Members on both sides of the House. This is not a Party question in any degree whatever. I do not say the defects I have pointed out are the fault of the Government or of the Postmaster General; they are the fault of the system, which can only be remedied by full and proper inquiry. Such an inquiry as I ask for cannot do any harm, and I believe it will do much good. I appeal in the interests of good government, and of the efficiency of a State Department, and I also appeal on behalf of a large body of hard-working and deserving men for an inquiry into the whole system of a Department which is a source of large public revenue. I believe there is nothing which would tend to create good feeling and efficiency in that Department, so much as an inquiry into the grievances which have so long existed, and I beg to move the Motion which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House it is desirable that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Administration of the Post Office,"—(Earl Compton.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

(9.51.) MR. LOCKWOOD (York): In seconding the Motion, I wish at the outset to say I cordially agree with the statement of my noble Friend that this Motion is in no way directed at the administration of the present Postmaster General. It would be most unfair, having regard to the complex system which is involved in this Department, to make one particular individual responsible for the very serious condition of things which now exist. My noble Friend has said more than once that he has no wish to make the present Postmaster General responsible. We do not wish to endeavour to fix responsibility upon any individual Postmaster General who preceded the right hon. Gentleman who now holds this very important position, and, for the life of me, I cannot understand why the right hon. Gentleman holding the position he does should not be one of the first to court this inquiry. I do not know how long the right hon. Gentleman anticipates that he may personally hold the office he now occupies, but if he has any idea of that period being a lengthened one, let him have inquiry for selfish reasons and for his own comfort, but, if not, let him consent to this inquiry in order that the comfort of those who follow him may be enhanced. This House has on more than one occasion this Session been brought face to face with the accumulating difficulties between labour and capital. They have already troubled the House, and in all probability they will trouble the House still further. The House has always professed itself anxious and willing to throw itself into any inquiry upon matters relating to labour and capital if it can be shown that anything like a substantial grievance exists. How can any Government possibly endeavour in any way to frustrate inquiry into a Department over which they have control, and at the same time be willing to grant or order inquiries into matters for which they have no direct responsibility? The Postal Department is, fortunately for the country, a great paying Department. It is one of the few Departments of the State which has been remunerative, but none the less, nay all the more, ought we to see that no grievance can properly be put forward by those who assist us in the work. I do not propose to trouble the House at great length, because my noble Friend has gone into great detail. He has, however, dealt more especially with the case as presented by the Metropolitan offices, and I desire to ask the House to devote its attention for a few moments to the case as it exists in the provinces. Let us consider the nature of the employment of these men and women. They hold very responsible positions; the work subjects them to great mental strain, and the work is done frequently under conditions which makes it extremely arduous. In the first place the public expect from the Post Office servants accuracy in the discharge of their duty, they necessarily impose upon the servants great trust, and expect from them in return an honest discharge of their duty. Above all the public expect that the men will bring to bear on their work an unfailing intelligence. It is a very high standard of work that we require at the hands of these people. At the outset they prove themselves efficient by passing, I think in all cases, a competitive examination. Clearly this class of labour is one which is deserving of the very greatest attention, and any grievances the men may have ought not to be ignored. The first fault I have to find with the system is that the organisation works in a most unequal way. Take the case of the special services which are rendered by the servants of the Post Office. It may surprise some hon. Members to know that when the Telegraph Department is called upon to render special services in connection with public meetings, race meetings, and other events, the rule of the Central Office, according to a Minute of the late Secretary to the Post Office, is that the nearest available office shall render the assistance required. But for some reason, which it is not very difficult to understand, those who are responsible for the working of the Central Office have been anxious, in view of the minute investigation of Post Office procedure which has been going on of late, to reduce the amount of overtime at the Central Office; for it appears that when special assistance has been needed in what I may term the home circuit, instead of application being made to the Central Office, in accordance with the Memorandum, men are brought from long distances for the purpose. For example, at a recent race meeting at Epsom, it was necessary to provide telegraphists to do the special work, and instead of assistance being obtained from the Central Office, which was the nearest available office, one man was brought from Leeds, two from Derby, one from York, three from Manchester, three from Southampton, one from Northampton, and three from Birmingham to do the work. Where is the economy to be found in that? What thinks the House of a system under which such things can occur? What does the Financial Secretary, with his great business knowledge, think of it? Would he permit such a state of things in his own business? The assistance required was obtainable at the Central Office. The Memorandum said it should be obtained from that office. Why was it not so obtained? Because you dare not face the amount of overtime it would involve, and so you bring men from North, South, East, and West, in order to distribute the overtime over other offices, and to avoid the criticism which would inevitably ensue. Another general objection is the inequalities in the Regulations. It will doubtless be admitted by the Postmaster General that there is great objection, whether rightly or wrongly, to the system of classification—the system of dividing the employees into two or three classes. That is, I understand, one of the main grievances that exist in the Department. The system may be good, but let me show the right hon. Gentleman how unequally it works. In some places the length of service in, say, the second class is eight years; in other places it is 12 years, so that in some towns a man equally capable will have to work four years longer in the second class than another man in another town before getting into the first class. Surely inequalities of this kind ought not to exist in the system. But there is even a greater evil in connection with this system, and it is that of the classification of towns for the purpose of fixing the maximum weekly salary. I have a list before me, and it is impossible to understand the basis on which it is arranged. I am speaking now of the Telegraph Department. In the list there are groups of towns. I will take the first group. Manchester heads the list, and Birmingham is at the bottom. The maximum remuneration of the group is fixed at 56s. a week. There are 531 employees in the Manchester office and 253 in the Birmingham office. The casual observer will at first suppose that it has been determined by the authorities, for some reason or other, which it is hard to imagine, to make the amount of wages in a particular place depend upon the number of persons employed. Let me test the working of this grouping system. In group one Birmingham, with 253 employees, has a maximum wage of 56s. But when I come to group two, I find that Newcastle heads the list with 260 employees and a maximum wage of 54s. Last down on the list of group two stands Sheffield with 73 employees, but in group three Cardiff stands first with 138 employees, Hull has 87, Aberdeen 82, Plymouth 82, Bradford 82, and Exeter 78, all with a maximum of 52s. I fail to understand upon what intelligible basis this grouping is placed. It is, however, clear that very great discontent must be caused by such an unequal system. The late Mr. Fawcett, in his scheme of 1881, made the maximum remuneration uniform, and a great deal is certainly to be said in favour of that view. I believe that in his Report he urged that labour should be paid what it was worth, and that the remuneration should not depend on the strength of the company in which the individual happened to be engaged. I think that this is a blot on the Post Office system, which may fairly be made a subject of inquiry. Yet another subject of great complaint is that of the system of overtime, for overtime in the Post Office is not an exception: it is a system. A few days ago, when the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire brought forward a Motion about overtime worked by railway servants, the Government agreed to appoint a Committee to inquire into the misdoings [of the companies in that respect. How, then, in face of that fact, can they refuse an inquiry in regard to similar evils in the Post Office? Though I cannot make the case stronger than the noble Lord has put it, yet I wish to give a few figures on this point. I find that in 1890, in Dublin, there were 90,000 hours of overtime worked; in Liverpool, in the same year, 67,000 hours; and in Manchester 57,000 hours; and it must not be forgotten that most of this overtime is worked in the summer months, and is consequently more harmful to those engaged in it. Another point is that this work is chiefly done by the persons of the junior or lower ranks, probationers and substitutes, and the object of this doubtless is to get the work done cheaply. But the system prejudicially affects the Post Office servants, the Service itself, and the public. It affects the servants because it interferes with promotion; the Service, because the work is not done so efficiently as it might otherwise be; and it affects the public because the duty cannot be so accurately performed as if done by persons in higher ranks. I venture to assert that by employing this class of labour the Department is not carrying out fairly the responsibilities which are entailed upon it with regard to the public. This matter of overtime is one of the utmost importance. Another subject to which I wish to allude is the question of promotion. Now, with regard to promotion in the Post Office, two systems are observed—that of selection and that of seniority. Doubtless much is to be said on behalf of both; but should not an opportunity be afforded of inquiring which of those modes is the best in the interests alike of the Service and of the public? We have recently had a revision scheme which no doubt has done something for the upper grades of the Department. But it has practically left the second class untouched, and this, naturally, has given rise to discontent. Let me call attention to the case of the rural postmen—a hard-working class of men who discharge their duties under trying circumstances, but who for some reason appear to be outside the pale of the Post Office, and not to be on the same footing as the other employees. Why is it? I will give the House one instance which has lately been brought to my notice—the case of a postman who has a long service, and who is paid at the rate of 4s. a week.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON (Wick, &c.): Four shillings a day.

MR. LOCKWOOD: No; it is 4s. a week. Two years ago he had four or five miles added to his beat, and was promised an increase of pay, but as yet he has not received it. He now walks 12 miles three days a week, and nine miles on the other three days. In the month of January this year this man delivered 1,221 letters; in February, 1,035 letters. I have no doubt there are hundreds of such cases. This is a pitiable case. What do hon. Gentlemen think of a system which is capable of such things as this? Yet I am told with regard to a system which is capable of this that there is to be no inquiry. We shall very likely be told that the Postmaster General is perfectly satisfied, and that there will be no inquiry. It is in no unfriendly spirit towards the administration of the right hon. Gentleman that I have made these remarks. It would be most unfair if the House were to consider these matters as in any sense reflecting on the personal administration of the right hon. Gentleman. I can only say for myself that whenever I have been brought into personal communication with him, I have met with unflinching courtesy. But there is no doubt the time has now come when this great overgrown system should be overhauled, and overhauled by impartial persons. What good could a departmental inquiry do into such a matter as this? The employés would not believe that it could take an unbiased view of the question. It is for these reasons that I second the Motion, and I hope to have a favourable answer from the right hon. Gentleman with regard to it.

(10.21.) Mr. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): The noble Lord who moved this Resolution told us that the Motion on the Paper was intended to deal not only with the machinery of the Post Office, but also with its working, as it affected the general public. That, too, was the view I took of the Resolution itself, and I confess that I expected to hear from the preceding speakers something as to the deficiency of the Post Office with regard to the general public. I do not know, of course, what Members who may follow will have to say, but certainly not one single point has been made, either by the noble Lord or by my hon. and learned Friend who seconded the Motion, showing that the Post Office has in the letter or the telegraph department failed in the discharge of its duties. So far from cursing the Post Office, indeed, the hon. Members have blessed it. To pass the Resolution submitted to the House would be an affront to the management of the Post Office.

•EARL COMPTON: No.

Mr. AMBROSE: I assure the House that I think it would. The noble Lord comes forward, however, as the best possible witness, for he says the Post Office has outgrown its clothes. Why? Because it has been successful; because it has been a profitable Department; because it has served people well, and the public have appreciated the services the Post Office has rendered. What would have been said if the Post Office had established a great and expensive staff for whom there was no work? Such things have happened. Take, for instance, the Registry of Land Department. A great outcry was made in this House with reference to the expenses of that Department. Provision was made for a staff for that Department, a number of well-qualified officials were appointed, and then it was found that there was very little work for them to do. But the Post Office is a paying Department, showing a surplus on the year of £1,500,000. It has a monopoly which is the property of the nation. But directly you attempt to conduct it on different lines, to pay wages on fancy lines, the surplus will soon disappear. What is the true meaning of the Resolution? It has been said truly that this is a labour question, and I should have thought that it would have been better to have left this struggle to be fought out in the usual way, without taking sides by a Motion in this House. As to the boy messengers, what did my noble Friend say about them? That was a question in which the Government were asserting a monopoly which belonged to the nation, and I hold that the Department were bound to assert the national right, irrespective of sympathy with one side or the other. My noble Friend said that he was glad to hear that that question had been settled, and he took credit to himself—credit that his Motion being on the Paper had had something to do with procuring that settlement. If that is so, all I can say is that it is a very great pity. Questions between capital and labour and between the Government and its employés should not be influenced by Motions in this House. We are all subjected as Members of this House to all manner of whips from employés of the Civil Service and the Post Office, and I know that when the status of the Civil Service clerks was being settled some time ago there was among Members generally a feeling of disgust at the telegrams and letters being received almost every minute from people seeking to influence our votes on some particular question of interest to them. I hope I shall always be sufficiently independent to do my duty in these matters, and not to allow myself to be dictated to on any question of the kind. The noble Lord, after giving us a number of instances of the overtime to which some of the clerks in the Savings Bank Department had been subjected, stated that the Ridley Commission laid it down that no clerk should be bound to work more than seven hours a day. Has the noble Lord read the Report of the Ridley Commission? The fact is, that the clerks were working only six hours a day, and the Commission said that instead of working six they should work seven hours—that is to say, that they should have an hour's additional work.

*EARL COMPTON: I beg the hon. and learned Member's pardon. I have read the Report of the Commission, but I do not think he can have paid much attention to the paragraph, which states that the evidence given by some of the clerks of the Government Office showed that the average amount of overtime work was five hours per day per man, and expresses the opinion that it cannot be right or desirable that such a system shall continue.

MR. AMBROSE: If the noble Lord would have waited for a moment I would have dealt with the question of overtime, which is a totally different question. The question of overtime arises mainly out of the attempt of the clerks to make their own terms. What I wish to point out is that the regular time of the Savings Bank clerks, and I believe of a good many of the Post Office clerks also, was six hours a day, and what the Commission said was that, instead of working only six hours, they should work seven. From that time to this there has been a struggle on the part of the Heads of Departments and the Treasury to get the hours increased accordingly; and the result has been that, so far as the Receiver General's and Accountants Departments are concerned, the men have acceded to the new arrangement, and with an increased pay—I think £30. But the Savings Bank clerks have refused the terms, and the consequence is, there has been a difficulty in getting through the work, and there has necessarily been a resort to overtime. As regards the question of compulsory overtime, the rule is this: the Post Office claim a right, when the Service requires it, to compel every clerk to work overtime, of course, with increased pay; but in practice the increased pay is always sufficient to attract men who will volunteer the labour. The noble Lord said he did not intend to make a personal attack on the Postmaster General; but has he seen a pamphlet published by his clients headed "Mr. Raikes and the Swenting System in the Post Office?" I think the noble Lord might have hesitated before attempting to act as the champion of the author of that pamphlet.

Mr. Ambrose

*EARL COMPTON: May I be allowed to state at once that I have no knowledge whatever of the authorship of any such pamphlet?

MR. AMBROSE: I am very glad to hear it; but it is a fact, nevertheless, though the noble Lord does not know it, that in the pamphlet all sorts of motives are imputed to the Postmaster General and the Financial Secretary. The noble Lord says this is not a Party question. Is it not? Does the noble Lord think the Service of the country can be conducted if the servants of the Government are to be encouraged in rebellion against the Government as these Post Office clerks have been encouraged? [Cries of "Oh!"] Well, what can you call it? Can discipline be maintained with a Select Committee sitting, with the Postmaster General and the Secretary and the Financial Secretary of the Post Office and the Head of every Department standing by, to hear all the servants called to give evidence as to their grievances for years past—

AN HON. MEMBER: The Ridley Commission.

MR. AMBROSE: Well, that Commission is over, and we do not want another. At all events that Commission was general and not directed to any one Department. What would you think of the Great Northern Railway Company or any of our great Railway Companies if they appointed a Select Committee to consider the conduct of the Directors, and to inquire into the grievances of the men, and, if the workmen had votes, in the selection of the Directors? It seems to me that this Resolution is aimed at the Government, and that, whether intended or not, its effect must inevitably be to weaken the Government in the conduct of an important Department—a Department which can only be conducted successfully by maintaining discipline; and I shall certainly, therefore, vote against the Resolution.

*(10.42.) MR. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange): I will not go into the grievances which the servants of the Post Office are subjected to, as I think they have been explained well enough to the House. But I want, as one of the Representatives of a great city, to emphasise the statements which have already been made as to the widespread discontent which does exist in the Postal De-
